An enormous amount of Executive power is being taken to the Secretary of State under cover of this Bill. If we allow it to go through unchallenged this evening—as we have indicated—and if the Government do not accept amendments tomorrow, this House will have agreed to a Secretary of State in our Government having the power, by Order in Council, to amend and to repeal any Act of this Parliament and any Northern Ireland legislation. I do not in any way challenge the personal integrity of the current Secretary of State, but I would caution that the Bill not only hands any future Secretary of State the power to amend or repeal any legislation by Order in Council, but, if they deem it expedient, not even to have to bring it before this House, so there will be no scrutiny or transparency whatsoever. I do not think that any right hon. and hon. Members in this Chamber would countenance such a degree of Executive power being taken to a single Minister in any circumstances—yet we are not discussing emergency or counter-terrorist legislation, but an attempt to restore devolved Government in Northern Ireland.

The aims of the Bill are laudable, but the means that the Government are adopting are deplorable. That brings me back to my argument about the christening of this new creature, the Assembly, which would have been better termed a forum or a talking shop. It strikes me that the Government have done something very clever. It is as if they were parents with two sons—perhaps I should say daughters—one of whom is very bright and the other not so bright. The parents choose to call both children by the same name, so that after a while the public do not know the difference between one and the other. I suspect that the Government have chosen deliberately to give the impression that this is the restored Assembly, but it is no such thing—it is a toothless talking shop. It worries me considerably that the people of Northern Ireland are being led to believe that the Bill will lead to the restoration of something more powerful at Stormont, when that is clearly not going to happen. I urge the Government to listen very carefully to tomorrow's debate and to amend the Bill before it leaves this place.

5.29 pm

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): I shall say only a few words and leave my colleagues to deal with the nitty-gritty of the measure and what the Assembly should be called and how it will be perceived, which the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) mentioned.

I want to make a few comments about what I had the pleasure of saying in Killarney at the British-Irish Parliamentary Body meeting on Monday 24 April. My party is up for a fully functioning Assembly with Executive powers. It is in the interests of our people in Northern Ireland for locally elected representatives to make decisions on local issues that affect the everyday lives of Ulster people. We in the Democratic Unionist party are not the problem. The responsibility to step up to the plate lies with Sinn Fein-IRA.

Too many families are still reeling from the freedom from serving their jail sentences given to murderers when the Belfast agreement was signed, coupled with broken promises, which the Prime Minister made in 1998. He promised that terrorists would not be in government or released from jail. The rest is history.

The debate has covered most of the pertinent points about the Bill. I would simply like to say that Northern Ireland Members look forward to a time when they no longer have to live behind bullet-proof windows, which are installed in their homes along with panic buttons and cameras, or be driven by police escorts. Like my colleagues, I have grown-up children—whose ages range from 33 to 24—and grandchildren, who are aged between 14 and six. They have never known normality and have always had to endure living in an abnormal setting.

[Mrs. Iris Robinson]

I therefore have a vested interest in seeing our long-suffering people, as well as my children and grandchildren, experience proper democratic institutions, which will tackle the genuine problems of the serious position of our health service, our educational future and the water charges, which are being foisted upon us.

However, the caveat is that, when we make our decision in the DUP to go forward, we must ensure that the Assembly is made up of democrats, who are all equal under and subject to the law. No party should have at its disposal an army ready for action if Sinn Fein does not get its way.

We must ensure that the victims of 35 years of terror are considered. Our party is mandated not to repeat the mistakes of the past in-and-out pantomime of an Assembly. We must get it right. That means Sinn Fein being democratised, with no more criminality and paramilitary activities connected directly or indirectly to it.

We will play our full part in a devolved Administration if we are satisfied that all the players use only the weapon of argument.

5.33 pm

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson), who clearly set out the conditions under which the Democratic Unionist party would enter into Executive Government in Northern Ireland, as did my other right hon. and hon. Friends who have already spoken.

I listened carefully to the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon). I am not sure whether her speech had been passed or endorsed by Cunningham house. How much of it will gain assent from the leadership of her party remains to be seen. Given her comments and her attitude today—suggesting that she would divide the House on Second Reading if she were in a position to do so—I wonder whether members of her party will turn up at Stormont to participate in the Assembly when it is called on 15 May.

Lady Hermon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dodds: No, because we have limited time and we have agreed sensibly to allow as many hon. Members as possible to speak by accepting a self-imposed time limit.

The hon. Lady took some time to explain her difficulties with the proposals in the Bill. She railed against the Assembly that the measure sets up, but I wish that she and the wing of her party that so vehemently supported the Assembly that was set up in 1998, with all its fundamental flaws, including IRA-Sinn Fein in government without decommissioning, had expressed even one word of concern about it and its make-up. Had she done so, her complaints today would have had a bit more credibility. Likewise, had she and her colleagues on the wing of the party that she supports opposed the deferral of the election in May 2003, first for four weeks and then until the November—they did not want it even then—her concern about the moving of the election date would have had more credibility.

My party is happy to face the electorate at any time. We will face them quite happily in May 2007, because every time we have gone to the polls, they have endorsed our position and given us a clear mandate. We have no doubt that, when we face them again—we are happy to face them sooner rather than later—they will once again give us a resounding mandate.

I have a lot of sympathy with what the hon. Member for North Down said about executive power in the hands of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, but I would remind her and those in the wing of the Ulster Unionist party that supports her that she supported the handing of full, untrammelled executive power to Ministers in the Northern Ireland Assembly—and to all-Ireland bodies—so that they could carry out enormous acts of damage to the people of Northern Ireland, to its economy and to its health and education systems, as evidenced by the decisions of Bairbre de Brún in a number of cases, and by Martin McGuinness over the 11-plus. So I am glad that a different approach is now being taken, but I shall wait and see whether it will be carried out in practice.

On the matter before us today, the Secretary of State said that there would be serious consequences if the parties involved did not carry out their mandate and act maturely. This party has certainly been elected on a mandate to try to bring about devolution. We were devolutionists when other parties in the Unionist community were fully fledged integrationists that did not want Stormont or any kind of local accountability whatever. There is no doubting our devolutionist credentials. However, our mandate also states that devolution must be based on sound democratic principles, and must involve a complete end to paramilitarism, terrorism, violence and criminality, along with certain changes to the Belfast agreement. I shall not rehearse all those points, because my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) and others have already outlined that mandate.

We have come a long way, in regard to not only the change in the circumstances on the ground in Northern Ireland, but the attitude of the parties and of right hon. and hon. Members. We are now talking about the need for absolute clarity and certainty, and for the completion of the transformation of the paramilitary groups into exclusively peaceful democratic entities, and I am glad that the policies that we put forward for many years, from 1998 and before, are now widely accepted. Everyone in the House now says that the IRA must completely end all criminality, terrorism and paramilitary activity.

Indeed, the Prime Minister talked in his famous Custom House speech about acts of completion. My right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) has talked about adopting a Blairite approach to these matters, but I think that it is the other way round. The Prime Minister has adopted a Democratic Unionist party approach, and that approach is working. It is delivering, and our party deserves credit for that. Previously, the Ulster Unionist party was prepared to go along with the policy that stated, "Bring Sinn Fein and the IRA in and give them positions in government, and they will learn to be democrats". Well, we said that that would not work, and it did not. We said that they would want to have their cake and eat it, and that people would suffer as a result.

The approach that we are now taking demands that, before Sinn Fein-IRA can come anywhere near the Government of Northern Ireland, there has to be a complete end to criminality, terrorism and paramilitary activity and a complete transformation to democracy, with certainty and clarity. That is the right approach, and we must keep working at it. It is delivering, and it is the sound and sensible way to proceed.

As far as the work of the Assembly is concerned, I welcome the opportunity for elected representatives in Northern Ireland to debate and discuss matters of deep concern, but we will want the Government to respond to their views. It is essential that the Secretary of State does not proceed with contentious legislation and change. If he does, that will ultimately act as a major disincentive to the restoration of devolution. Many people will say, "Even if we have devolution back, we will not be able to change some of these matters of vital concern to our people." I urge him, in the interests of his project to restore devolution, not to proceed with some of the more contentious matters mentioned in the House.

There are issues of concern. The IMC report published today had the inevitable spin and hype prior to publication. We have had some selective quotes from the report even today in the House. Of course, we welcome the progress made, but we want more progress so that there is completion. There are major issues, such as the retention of guns. It is now clear that guns have been retained, the report says, without the authorisation of the leadership. Surely we cannot just leave it at that. Something has to be done about it. If members of an organisation are acting outside their authority, we should at least expect the leadership to do something about them. Is it okay simply to say, "That was without the authority of the leadership"? Is it all right if the IRA has now moved from a centralised structure to a federal structure? For the people living in Markethill and elsewhere in South Armagh, Fermanagh and Tyrone along the border, or in my constituency, it will be of little comfort to say that the guns held by the local IRA are not authorised by the brigade headquarters in Belfast, but just by the local IRA commanders. We must grasp that. Movement on that issue will be needed if we are to see progress.

On criminality, I listened to what the IRA said over Easter, and I have listened to it being praised today about that matter. Let us remember that as far as the IRA is concerned, any act that it carries out in pursuance of its objectives cannot be criminal. It is easy for it to condemn criminality, because it does not regard anything that it does as criminal, even to the extent that, as Mitchell McLaughlin famously said, the terrible atrocity of the kidnap and savage murder of Jean McConville, who was then buried for decades, and about which the IRA lied, was not a crime in its eyes, and is still not regarded as a crime by Sinn Fein-IRA. We need to be careful about those matters.

The people of Northern Ireland know how the IRA operates; they know its theology and thinking and how it will interpret everything according to the letter of its constitution and values. Those of us on the ground must judge what it is up to and what it is about. It is important that we do not make the mistakes that were made in the past but that we bring the IRA to the point of completion and bring about a permanent and irreversible transformation to democratic politics. My right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) has made it clear that if we reach that point, we can make real progress, and we will not shy away from the commitments that we have made. Until we reach that point, however, we will stand firm in the interests of democracy.

5.43 pm

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): Some time ago, our party released a document called "Facing Reality". This House is beginning to face some realities, because when I was previously a Member, prior to 1997, many Members did not want to know the realities of the situation in Northern Ireland or of the suffering of the Unionist people and did not want to deal with the IRA. They were closing their eyes to acts of republican terrorism, often because they wanted to keep the trouble in Northern Ireland—as long as it stayed off the streets of London and the mainland, and did not affect them, that was acceptable. There was a famous statement about the "acceptable level of violence".

My party is desirous of the restoration of devolution in Northern Ireland, with Ministers who are democrats dealing with and taking decisions on day-to-day issues in Northern Ireland. There is great distrust, however, and no one can close their eyes to that.

I agree with the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon). We have no intention of misleading the Ulster people. We are going to tell it exactly as it is to them and to the Secretary of State and the Ministers concerned, before and on 24 November. We are not going to shadow-box with anyone: we will tell people the realities of the situation. Even when we have suffered in electoral terms, we have never misled the general public, and we are not going to mislead them now.

I certainly know the realities of how obnoxious it is to sit in a council with those who have been totally wedded to terrorism—for example, one of the three most wanted men in Northern Ireland. The only poster naming three wanted men appeared in what was then my constituency—in Magherafelt, which was in the constituency of Mid-Ulster. Those three persons were Dominic McGlinchey, who was murdered by the IRA when he fell out with it; Francis Hughes, who went on hunger strike, fell out with himself and decided to take his own life; and Ian Milne.

The reality of the situation—what the House does not realise—is that the third most wanted man sits in Magherafelt district council at this moment. He has never been brought to court. It seems to me that there has been a cover-up. I know that a family who believe that he was responsible for the murder of the Speers family are horrified that he is sitting in that council untouched. Another councillor is a famous gunman; another is a famous IRA bomber. These people are sitting in the council in which I have to sit. They destroy, demean and soil democracy, and we cannot close our eyes to the realities of the situation.

I say this clearly: democratic institutions must be built on a solid foundation. It is no use building them on sand; there must be a rock foundation of democracy, integrity and honesty. There can be no equivocation on terrorism and those who are inextricably linked to terrorist organisations. If we want the democratic institution to succeed, those who are engaged in it must be unreservedly opposed to all terrorism and the retention of all terrorist structures. We need to see the dismantling of those structures—not just the disbanding of the IRA, but the dismantling of the structures of terror, and the removal of all the teeth of war—if we are to move forward in a democratic fashion.

Sinn Fein and the IRA are inextricably linked. They are one and the same. That has not changed. It is no use the House closing its eyes to that: at this moment, it is still the reality. Over the past 30 years, Sinn Fein and the IRA have turned on and turned off violence whenever it has suited them. Yes, there has been a change. Let us be honest. As my colleagues have rightly said, the demands of our party, standing resolutely against Sinn Fein-IRA in the past, have certainly brought them to the realisation that they will not wipe the eye of the Ulster electorate or the Ulster people. But we are resolved to do what we promised to do. We will honour the principles that we set out at the time of the election: we will not go back on the principles that we put before the electorate. Yes, 9/11 produced changes, because Sinn Fein-IRA knew that, internationally, they could not go back to what they did best. But we must face the reality: up to this moment, Sinn Fein and the IRA are inextricably linked.

The impression has been given that the IMC report somehow gives a clean bill of health, and that somehow democrats can walk arm in arm with those who have been responsible for some of the most heinous crimes, not only in the past but in the present. We cannot close our eyes to the murder in Dublin of Joseph Rafferty by the IRA. We cannot close our eyes to Robert McCartney's murder. We cannot close our eyes to the murder of Denis Donaldson. We need to know exactly who was responsible and, if the IRA is found guilty, the IRA and its colleagues must pay the price of their compliance and their activity in terrorism. The report clearly rings alarm bells. Even after all the attempts at a whitewash, some members of that organisation—including senior ones—are still involved in crimes such as fuel laundering, money laundering, extortion, tax evasion and smuggling. Imagine anyone suggesting that we should have such people in this House or in government!

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. McCrea: No. I have only a short time in which to make my speech.

Can anyone imagine the howls from the community if it were suggested that such people should be put on the Front Bench of Her Majesty's Government or Opposition? If they were, they would be run out of this House and society would disgrace them completely, and rightly so. A few statements from those who are still linked to activities such as money laundering, fuel laundering, extortion, tax evasion and smuggling are not going to whitewash their compliance in what has been going on. Where is the £20 million linked to the IRA? Where are the disappeared—those who may have been murdered, whose families are still waiting for them to come home? Are we closing our eyes to all this? Are we closing our ears to the cry from such families that these issues must be faced up to?

We must have consistency, integrity and honesty. Neither I nor any of my colleagues is going to mislead the people. The right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) stated today—it is on the record of this House—that, although the IMC report acknowledges that progress has been made, there is still a long way to go. I agree wholeheartedly with that statement, which is factual: there is still a long way to go. We must ensure that our democracy has integrity. When we set up a Government of Northern Ireland, they have to be based solely and completely on democratic lines. There can be no equivocation or trying to move the goalposts. We cannot have those who are democrats by day and terrorists by night—that day has long passed. There were those in the past who accepted such people into government, but this party will not.

Sinn Fein-IRA stand at a crossroads: they must make the choice and come up to the mark. If they do not take that decision, true democrats—such as Members representing the Social, Democratic and Labour party, my own party and others—who want to move forward should do so together. Northern Ireland should not be crucified because of terrorists or those who want to play along with terrorism. We want a democratic process and democratic government, and by the grace of God, that we will have.

5.52 pm

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): I welcome this Bill, which is a means to an end, not an end in itself. I understand the concerns raised by the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon), but the Ulster Unionist party has in the past supported the establishment of talking shops. Indeed, it was its former leader who proposed the establishment of the Northern Ireland Forum for Political Dialogue, and I do not recall it raising major objections to such a body. We hope that the Assembly will move quickly to address issues that are doubtless of as much concern to the constituents of the hon. Member for North Down as they are to mine. Even if, initially, we are only talking about those issues, that is better than sitting on our hands while direct rule Ministers take decisions that we disagree with strongly. I hope that we can reach a consensus on some of these issues quickly, and that the Government will act on that basis. We want a devolved Government to be restored in Northern Ireland as quickly as possible.

Lady Hermon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Donaldson: I will not, because some of my hon. Friends want to get in before the debate concludes.

This has been a long journey, the beginning of which it would probably be difficult to find. In 1994, there was the first IRA ceasefire, moving through to the agreement in 1998. It has been a difficult and challenging time to be involved in politics in Northern Ireland. We have seen many false dawns, but the promise of peace remains and we want to reach out and grasp it. It is the hope of every sane, reasonable and law-abiding person in Northern Ireland that our generation realises the hope of peace and political stability. I echo the comments by my hon. Friend the Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) that we want to move out beyond the cocoon of security and looking over our shoulders in which we have had to live for years. We want to look forward to a future that is free from violence and the organised criminality that we have seen all too often in the past.

We have had the Assembly since 1998, and it has been suspended on at least four occasions. We have got to get it right this time, because if we re-establish the Assembly and get a fully functioning devolved Administration and it collapses again, it will be years before it is restored and the hopes of the people of Northern Ireland will be dashed. That is why my party is committed to getting it absolutely right.

The Government talk of deadlines: we prefer to speak of acts of completion, as my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) mentioned. He repeated what the Prime Minister said. We want completion and closure on what has become known as the troubles. I know that, for many people, closure is difficult. Their lives have been ruined and destroyed by acts of terrorism, on both sides of the community. However, from speaking to them, I know that it would give them some comfort to know that other families will not suffer what they have endured. Indeed, that is my objective. If I were asked what is the one thing that I want to achieve in my political career, it would be that no other family has to suffer what has been visited upon so many families in Northern Ireland over the past 35 years. If I can help to achieve that, I will feel that my political career has been fulfilled. That is my objective and I can say with honesty that it is the objective of all of my hon. Friends, and especially of my right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), the leader of our party. I know that he wants to see that happen, but we want to be sure that it is for real and for good.

That objective is why the decisions that we have to take as a party will not be taken in isolation. We will take them in consultation with the community that we represent and the people who have mandated us to achieve a better future for them and for their children. Earlier this week, my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) made it clear in his contribution to the British-Irish Inter-Parliamentary Body that, when the time comes that we feel that there is the potential to move forward to full devolution, we will consult and we will talk to the people whom we represent. We are not arrogant. We will not move so far ahead of our people that we do not bring them with us.

It is crucial to achieving political stability in Northern Ireland that leaders bring their people with them. We have evidence in the past few years of the inability of some Unionist leaders to bring their people with them, and we know what happened to them. The results of that are very apparent on these Benches today. This party will not allow that to happen. Yes, we will provide leadership—it will be provided ably by my right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim and my colleagues here—but we are determined to bring our people with us. If we do that, we have a better chance of making things work for the future. At the end of the day, it is the people who count.

I say to the hon. Member for North Down that we have no fear of elections. We are prepared and ready for the elections in May 2007. Bring them on. This party will gain and benefit from those elections and we are prepared to go to the people and test our mandate again. I have no doubt that we will get a strong endorsement for that mandate.

Earlier, the Secretary of State asked whether the Democratic Unionist party was committed to making this measure work. Many people have asked the same question. Are we committed to achieving the establishment of a devolved Administration in Northern Ireland that is based on inclusivity but underpinned by the fundamentals of democracy and the rule of law? Our answer is a resounding yes: we are absolutely committed to making this work, because we have fought so hard to get to where we are today and we want to complete the journey.

We want to achieve the end that I have described, but we also want to make sure that it is absolutely right, because the future of the people whom we represent hangs on the decisions that we make. We will be careful and cautious, but courageous too, because that is what leadership is about. When we come to make those decisions, we will want to ensure that they are right, and that the people with whom we will be in government are committed to peace, democracy and the rule of law. As my hon. Friend the Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea) said, that must mean that a complete end is put to criminality and paramilitarism.

We say that not because we want to put obstacles in people's way, but because we want to encourage them to complete the journey. The strategy is working and has brought the results that are evident in today's IMC report. We acknowledge the progress that has been made, but we also know that the journey is not yet complete.

If I am not yet absolutely confident that the IRA has completed the journey, that it now supports the rule of law and that it will abide by the democratic rules, I believe that it is on its way to doing so. It is difficult to assess how far down the road it has come, but I believe that it has recognised that there is no going back to the bad old days. Yes, some IRA members may hark back to those times but most know that going back to the violence of the past, and to bombing, shooting and murder on the scale evident in the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s, would amount to political suicide. They are right.

We want the Assembly established by the Bill to make progress towards the restoration of a full, devolved Administration in Northern Ireland. We are committed to achieving that objective, in the right time scale and based on an assessment that the violence, criminality and paramilitarism are over for good. I hope that people will take us at our word when we say that.

Yesterday, I had the privilege of leading a delegation to meet the Secretary of State at Stormont to discuss the impact of industrial rates on our manufacturing sector. The delegation was made up of people from both sides of the community, both traditions, in Northern Ireland. They are all fine people, and they are making a massive contribution to rebuilding our economy after decades of destruction.

The delegation was accompanied by an all-party group representing the main political parties in Northern Ireland. The group spoke with one voice when it asked the Government to freeze the industrial rates, because otherwise they would damage our manufacturing base and our ability to make a full economic recovery.

[Mr. Donaldson]

I hope that the Secretary of State will listen to our message, because the Government have said consistently that that is what they will do if we can achieve a political consensus. Consensus is what the Assembly ought to be about, and we will seek to achieve it in respect of the other issues that will be referred to us. However, the Secretary of State must listen to what people are saying.

I know that a big stick can be applied on a range of issues, although I accept that some carrots exist as well. However, when people reach agreement, it is incumbent on the Government to respond positively. That is the best and most encouraging way to help us along the road to the end of our journey. I hope that the result will be peace and stability for all the people of Northern Ireland.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): I, too, will seek to abide by the time-sharing arrangements that have all-party support here today.

I suppose that there has not been a great deal of rancour, or difference, in the debate, although I suspect that in some speeches there was an underlying tendency to point the finger at Unionists as if they were still the obstacle to devolution. We have had the Secretary of State talking about people needing to act maturely. We have had the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) talking, I think specifically to our party, about taking leaps of faith. We have seen other parties take leaps time and again with Sinn Fein. They jumped into the darkness and they paid for it. We have no intention of taking such a leap of faith with people who we believe to be untrustworthy.

However, although some may argue that we of all parties least need devolution, having 40 per cent. of the representation at council level in Northern Ireland and 50 per cent. of representation here at Westminster, we have been to the forefront of promoting devolution. The fact that the Bill is before us is probably a result of the pressure that this party has put on the Government to recognise that in a situation where, as has been described very adequately in today's debate, one party does not have respect for law and order—indeed, breaks the rules of society on a frequent basis—and yet wishes to be included in Government, it is impossible to move directly into a situation where people like that are included in Executive positions.

Facing that reality—our document was called "Facing Reality"—we put to the Government ideas by which we could move towards devolution, in circumstances where there would be a useful job of work for people who are elected in Northern Ireland to take decisions and make representations on the things that affect their constituents daily, and ease our way towards the position where, eventually, full-blown devolution would be possible.

"Facing Reality" also made it clear that there had to be changes to the Belfast agreement. We have a mandate for those changes. I know that the SDLP does not like the fact that the political landscape has changed in Northern Ireland, that the mandate that may have been given to pro-agreement parties in 1998 no longer exists, certainly on the Unionist side, and that there has to be a recognition that changes are needed; not just to satisfy the Unionist population but to ensure that there is a system of devolution that does not stumble from crisis to crisis and that does Unionists, nationalists or anyone some good. Some of our suggestions were included in the comprehensive agreement. I know that the members of the SDLP did not like that because they were not involved in the comprehensive agreement, but I believe that many of those changes will be essential to the good working of any Assembly if and when it is up and running.

Mark Durkan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sammy Wilson: I would have been more than happy to, but because of the time constraint I will not. If we could have extended the debate beyond 7 o'clock, I would have been able to give way.

Several arguments have been made today as to why we should move towards devolution. The first is that the IRA have moved. The IMC report today indicates that they have moved. We have had substantial decommissioning last summer, and we accept that that has happened. But as has been pointed out, the IRA are moving because the tactics used against them have changed. Instead of giving them rewards, sanctions are being imposed. In the past, we were told that if we put them into government, they would behave. The DUP tactic is to deny them a place in government and make them behave. In the past, we were told that if we turned a blind eye to their activities perhaps they would move away from them; now, through the combined efforts of our party and others, the security forces are going after their criminal empires and putting on the pressure. While that is going on, why should we lift the pressure? Why should we go back to the old, failed methods and give them rewards?

We want the task completed. In six months' time, I want to be able to say that the behaviour of Sinn Fein and the IRA has changed dramatically. That would be good for my constituents and good for Northern Ireland and its economy. If and when those changes arrive, the leader of my party, my right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), our deputy leader, my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), and other speakers have made it clear that the political landscape will have changed.

Like the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier), we believe that there are benefits from devolution. The second argument in favour of devolution is that we could take our own decisions. Some people have painted a realistic picture; there would be hard decisions to make but at least we would be making them on behalf of our constituents, with at least a degree of accountability. However, there are some political quacks around. They can be found in some of the pro-agreement parties and lobby groups pushing for devolution. They present devolution as a panacea, through which all the hard decisions will disappear; all the pain will suddenly be relieved and there will be no tough political decisions to make. That is not the case. Anybody who sells devolution on those grounds is a charlatan. They are political quacks and they will come unstuck. There are hard political decisions to make. Some of the things we are discussing did not start only after the Assembly fell; for example, the big increase in rates was known as the Durkan tax after the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Durkan).

Mark Durkan: I remind the hon. Gentleman that before devolution, the comprehensive spending review under direct rule had projected increases over a three-year period of 7 per cent. a year on domestic rates and 6 per cent. a year on business rates. Under devolution, when I was Minister of Finance and Personnel, succeeded by Sean Farren, domestic rates were 7 per cent., 7 per cent., and 6 per cent. while business rates were 3.3 per cent., 3.3 per cent. and 3.3 per cent.

Sammy Wilson: So it was a Farren tax. Of course, it covered the infrastructure for water and sewerage, which are now paid for on top.

Mark Durkan rose—

Sammy Wilson: No, I shall not give way. The hon. Gentleman's earlier intervention was quite short. I remember having to listen to him explaining such things in the Northern Ireland Assembly and it used to take him about an hour and a half.

Another argument is that devolution will be a magic wand to help us get through all the pain. Some of the hard things we are experiencing originated under the old devolution settlement. The structure of the previous Assembly meant that decisions were made by Ministers who were wholly unaccountable. They imposed changes, such as those in education, with which we are still struggling.

If the interim step that we hope will lead to full devolution is to be effective, I believe that it is essential that Members realise that there is a job to be done. That means that the Secretary of State—I am pleased to see him back in his place—must listen to the representations that Members make. Otherwise, they will feel that the Assembly that has been established is a useless body.

It has been suggested that any legislation or Orders in Council currently in preparation should not apply until at least 24 November. I recognise that that is also a rod to beat the back of people such as myself. As we come up to 24 November, I well recognise the threat that Orders in Council can be introduced if devolution does not come about. Nevertheless, I am prepared to live with that because I believe that it is important, if any value is to be attached to devolved institutions in Northern Ireland in the longer term, that the people of Northern Ireland know that all the decisions that they hate and loathe have not been taken before devolution is set up. There should be a disincentive to push such measures forward and ram them through the House.

I implore the Secretary of State to understand that we wish to move towards devolution. We want the necessary decisions to be taken, however difficult the context, but they can be taken only when parties behave democratically, associate themselves with the police and law and order and pursue criminality. When those conditions are met, we are happy to have devolution. Until then, I hope that the Secretary of State will allow the Assembly to do a real job of work.

David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): I have listened with great interest to the debate and know that all my colleagues have made valid points. I have never had the privilege or the opportunity—whatever word one wishes to use—of sitting in the Northern Ireland Assembly.

I listened to the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier), who used the word "tantalising". Well, when it comes to a three-course meal or a large steak—[Interruption.] Yes, I have many of them and I would probably refer to them as tantalising, but I have to say that the prospect of going into the Assembly on 15 May is not tantalising for me. It is not tantalising because I will probably be sitting across the room from an individual who gave the authority for four of my family to be assassinated. It may well be hard for hon. Members who have not experienced such circumstances to understand, but it will be very difficult for me. My party has taken the decision to go in on 15 May and I will join it because I believe that it has a lot to offer the people of Northern Ireland.

We all know about the other Unionist party and its leadership, which led the Unionist population in the wrong direction. I am living proof that the Unionist population does not suffer fools gladly, which is why I took the seat in Upper Bann. We often hear the old cliché from Sinn Fein-IRA that they have a mandate, and we also hear them saying that the Democratic Unionist party is not serious about anything. They say that we are not serious about trying to get an Assembly up and running and, to use the words of Gerry Adams or Martin McGuinness, that the DUP does not want a Fenian about the place. Those are their words, not mine.

I have sat in meetings—in fact, at Leeds Castle—when my right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) told the former Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, "I am not asking for anything for myself that I am not asking for my Roman Catholic neighbour." That is a fact; my party is about representing all the people in our constituencies. So the nonsense that Sinn Fein come out with is just a myth.

I refer to family tragedy and many of my colleagues could relate to family tragedies and those involving others connected to their families, but let us remember that we must consult the victims and convince them that it is time to move on. That will be very difficult. My hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) and I are the chair and vice-chair of our party's victims organisation. We talk to victims on a weekly and monthly basis and we hear the stories that come from those people—the tragedies and the heartbreak—and it will be very hard for them to move on. But as a constructive party that will show leadership, it is our job to talk to those people and to convince them that it is time to move on. That will be difficult, but I believe that those people must be helped through that painful time.

Another of my concerns is that we talk about Sinn Fein-IRA coming on to different bodies and structures in government. For example, if Sinn Fein-IRA decided that they would go on to the Policing Board today, in reality, what information could the Chief Constable release in a Policing Board meeting that would not be passed on, possibly to some of their colleagues?

Mrs. Iris Robinson: The dissidents.

David Simpson: We have talked about the dissidents, which is a lose word. Such information must not be passed on to benefit terrorism—Slab Murphy and the rest of them up in south Armagh—so we have a difficulty. I used the word "tantalising" earlier; the word that we need to emphasise is trust. That is a big factor in setting up the Northern Ireland Assembly.

I sat in my own council meeting on Monday night, and when I referred to the bomb in Lurgan, a Sinn Fein-IRA representative stood up and said, "The bomb should not have happened, and I would ask those in the Lurgan area to stop it." However, when I put the question through the mayor to ask the Sinn Fein-IRA representative to tell his people to go to the PSNI station in Lurgan and give all the information that the police need to collect a lot more of those people, there was silence; and we are talking about moving to a full-blown Executive or whatever come 24 November. There is a long, long way to go. If it was wrong—my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) used words to this effect—to put murderers, drug dealers, paramilitaries or child killers or whatever into government last year, it is wrong this year. There is no difference, because they have not yet changed.

I want to move on in the time that is left to my portfolio as my party's trade and industry spokesman. I have been involved in the business community for some 25 years. My hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley referred to leading a delegation yesterday to meet the Secretary of State. I had the privilege yesterday, along with other hon. Members, to attend that conference and I had been asked to speak there. I am sure that the Secretary of State has been briefed on what I have said about him in the newsletter. I am sure that he is not very happy about it. Basically, I said that, if the Secretary of State were the boss or the chief executive of a firm, he would be sacked. That is because of the de-rating issue and the difficulties that the business community is going through.

I count it a privilege to be elected to this House. Having been involved in the business community for 20 or 25 years, I knew a lot of the business people who gathered together yesterday. I would like to think that, in my capacity in this House, I could use my influence to try to help those business people who have come through 35 years of the most hellish conditions, through the troubles and through financial difficulties.

The Secretary of State may throw the responsibility back, as he is prone to do, and say, "Get the Executive up and running and deal with the whole de-rating issue and all the other issues." However, with the greatest respect, it is within his power to do something about the situation now. The manufacturing and textile communities are decimated. Along with my hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley, I ask the Secretary of State to look seriously at doing something about that.

Mr. Hain: I received a delegation, as the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) mentioned, and it was impressive. The arguments that were mounted were cogent and well presented and I have said that I will seriously consider them. The argument was for a freeze at the present level. I have also said that I would be happy to refer the matter to the Assembly—in the form that that is about to happen—for its own consideration, as well, and would take note of what was said there.

David Simpson: I thank the Secretary of State. May I finish by saying—[Interruption.] We will negotiate after this debate.

Sir Patrick Cormack: The Secretary of State is on probation.

David Simpson: We will arrange an interview.

In conclusion, I personally want to see things move on in Northern Ireland. As I have mentioned in the House before on many occasions, I adopted three children to bring them into this country and to try to give them a better life. I want to see that happen; I want it to happen for all the young people in Northern Ireland, irrespective of the community they come from. They are the next generation and how the next generation operates is going to dictate the future of Northern Ireland. I wish that for all the people of Northern Ireland. I know that the leadership of my party wishes it and I will certainly do everything in my power to assist that.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): We have had an extremely interesting debate on yet another Northern Ireland Bill, which was, yet again, introduced in reasonable tones by the Secretary of State, who, if I may be permitted to say so, made a number of telling and important points. My hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) set out clearly and movingly our views and difficulties, but also our hopes for this Bill's capacity to achieve devolution and a peaceful future for Northern Ireland. Those are my views as well. I have never made any secret of the fact that eight years ago I voted against a number of aspects of the Belfast agreement, but one of the things that I was enthusiastic about was devolution. I remain hopeful that we can set up the Assembly again.

We have heard a number of contributions from right hon. and hon. Members, which I shall run through fairly quickly. The right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) feels that it would be disastrous if the process did not succeed. He said that he felt very uncomfortable as a direct rule Minister. When I work on the many statutory instruments—as I do seemingly almost every day at the moment—I too feel uncomfortable, so I well understand what he feels, and means. I share his hopes for the Assembly.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), who serves on most, if not all, of those Committees with me, wondered whether this year's Assembly would be able to change some of the decisions made by order of the Secretary of State, so perhaps the Minister will respond to that point. He also made the good point that the shifting of deadlines in the past is perhaps not helpful now, and I am sure that the Government will take that on board. He also made an important point about what will happen if the Assembly does not get up and running and full devolution is not restored—I hope very much that it will be restored. Although I know that the Government have taken steps to address the situation, we cannot go on governing Northern Ireland as we are doing. I hope that we can move forward through devolution and the Assembly, but if that is not possible, we need to redouble our efforts to find a better way of governing the Province.

The hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) regrets that the Bill does not go further, and opposes giving the Secretary of State the power to delay the elections from 2007 to 2008. As I indicated in an intervention on the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon), I am concerned about that measure and have tabled an amendment that will give us the opportunity to discuss it tomorrow. I understand that the Government are saying that if the Assembly is not up and running until November, we may not want to disrupt things so quickly. That is a rather pessimistic view, because the Assembly may be up and running again by May—we all hope that it will be—in which case elections in 2007 would not come too quickly. However, we can explore that matter in a bit more detail tomorrow.

I welcome the enthusiasm for the Bill of the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) in his typically robust speech. It is important to note that he paid tribute to the Members of the Legislative Assembly and the work that they have done. He correctly pointed out that it was not the democratic constitutional parties that needed to change, but the IRA.

The hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) said that he was probably the only person in the House, other than those from Northern Ireland, who had had a mandate from Northern Ireland. He has recently served on many Northern Ireland Committees.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), the Chairman of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee, sensibly called for there to be no more unnecessary statutory instruments before the Assembly is up and running. He also expressed worry about setting deadlines, and said that this particular deadline should perhaps be the end of the year. The hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) talked about trust and having a vision for the future.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) made the important point that there should be no joint sovereignty if things fail by 24 November. I know that the Secretary of State has tried to play down several reports on the comments that he is supposed to have made, but I was in America at the time and heard reports about those comments. The Secretary of State suggested in his statement to the House last week that even if the Assembly is not up and running by 24 November, there should be a strengthening of cross-border bodies. I would be worried if we had the one without the other.

The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) said how important it was for Northern Ireland to have an Assembly, and made a comparison with London and the London Mayor. I am not sure that I approve of the analogy, but think that I know what was she was getting at. The hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) made the good and important point that Sinn Fein needs to change its mode of behaviour to enable any support for the police to be credible.

I apologise that unfortunately, I missed the speech by the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) because I had to slip out of the Chamber for a few moments. I understand that he gave strong support to the Good Friday agreement and said that there was a need to preserve it.

I have already touched on the speech made by the hon. Member for North Down. She objected to the postponement of the scheduled elections and to the fact that the Bill gives the Secretary of State more power. A consistent theme of several recent Bills has been the inclusion of a clause that allows the Secretary of State to change many things. I share the hon. Lady's concern, but perhaps we can discuss that in more detail in Committee tomorrow.

The hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) made a good point, which I endorse, that it is not the DUP that needs to change, but the people who are in the way of democratic government in Northern Ireland. The hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) wants the Government to respond to the views expressed by the elected representatives of Northern Ireland. That is extremely important, given the significance of legislation that has recently been passed by order. Last week, for example, the number of councils was reduced from 26 to seven, with the support of Sinn Fein alone among the political parties. If the Assembly, once it is up and running, does not find that acceptable, I hope that the Secretary of State will take note of its opinion.

The hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea) rightly said that the institutions must be based on democracy and that the Assembly must be built on rock, not sand. That is a very important statement to make. The hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) said that in future he does not want any family to suffer what families have previously suffered. Everyone in the House should share that objective. He expressed a determination to make the process work. I have known him for many years, not only as a political colleague but as a close friend, and I know that that is the case. The hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) called for a sustainable Assembly, not one that is likely to falter. The hon. Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson) spoke about the difficulty of having to work with someone who authorised the assassination of four members of his family. It is hard for me to appreciate how difficult that is, but I admire his courage and determination to do so, to make the process work.

As I said at the outset, I have served on many Delegated Legislation and Northern Ireland Bill Committees. Almost every day this week, and last week, I attended such Committees. Goodness knows what will happen when we return next week, but there is a Delegated Legislation Committee the Tuesday after bank holiday Monday. That is a most unsatisfactory way of deciding policies and legislation for Northern Ireland. When the Assembly is up and running, it must be allowed to discuss those important issues. It must be worth while, or it will falter, which is not what I want, and I do not think it is what anyone in the House wants.

When we ask Unionist parties to serve in the Assembly and, more particularly, on the Executive it is important to ensure that they are dealing with people who have given up violence entirely. The Independent Monitoring Commission report has been discussed today, and without seeking to be negative, I want to deal with a couple of points that it makes. Paragraph 2.12 states:

"We noted however that PIRA continued to engage in intelligence gathering, predominantly to support the political strategy".

That intelligence gathering was "predominantly"—not entirely—to support the political strategy, and the IMC believed that it "was authorised by the leadership and involved senior members."

That is a worrying phrase. The report goes on to say:

"Some senior members were also involved in money laundering and other crime."

That, too, is worrying. Paragraph 2.15 discusses a crime that was committed and says:

"We think nevertheless that PIRA did seek to secure the departure from the area of one of the families involved in the dispute".

In other words, the Provisional IRA sought to move families out of the area. The report continues:

"We also believe that in a separate incident PIRA itself may have been associated with the forced departure of somebody from the area where he lived."

Such activity should have ended—we were told that it had—but according to the IMC, that is not the case.

Gordon Banks: The IMC report published today makes the point that the majority of forced exiles are made by loyalists, not republicans.

Mr. Robertson: I do not disagree, but those people are not represented by a political party that will assume Government office in Northern Ireland. I am not trying to be negative, as I have a point to make. The report goes on to say that "there are indications that some members, including some senior ones . . . are still involved in crime".

The report lists those crimes. It is unfair to expect law-abiding constitutional politicians from the Unionist community and from the SDLP to sit alongside people who are supposedly politicians by day, but are terrorists by night.

A further point concerns me. About two years ago I had a discussion with Seamus Mallon, a respected former Member of this House and also a former Deputy First Minister. He said that in his area Sinn Fein had 200 paid activists. Where did that money come from? The Minister who is to respond to the debate has a respectable majority of just over 6,000, but how would he like it if there were 200 paid activists in his constituency trying to get rid of him? That is not fair politics, and it must be addressed, alongside the fact that Unionist and SDLP politicians are being asked to work with people who might be engaging in violence and terrorist activities at night. It is not fair. If that is not tackled, the Assembly will fail, and I do not want to see that happen.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Not only is the situation that my hon. Friend outlines manifestly unfair; it would be illegal.

Mr. Robertson: Totally illegal, as my hon. Friend observes.

I shall close now, to give the Minister a chance to respond to the many points that have been made by right hon. and hon. Members. I finish where I started. I wish the Assembly well. I hope it gets up and running. In order to succeed, it needs to discuss meaningful matters. It must be built on rock, rather than on sand. It has to be sustainable and, over and above anything else, it must be filled with Members who are wholly and exclusively committed to democratic means.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. David Hanson): The debate has been largely good-tempered, which I cannot often say about Northern Ireland debates in the House. From all parts of the House we have had a positive and constructive debate. We even had a voluntary agreement on time sharing, which is a positive step. I hope it will lead to power sharing in due course. We even had something that we do not often have on Northern Ireland business: the hon. Member for East Antrim (Sammy Wilson) and the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) engaged in normal politics, talking about matters such as taxation and expenditure. I hope that ultimately the Assembly will also get back to discussing such topics.

The message from today's excellent debate has been clear. Now is the time for parties in Northern Ireland to demonstrate leadership by going back into the Assembly to form an Executive and a Government in due course. I am heartened by the way that the parties approached the debate, by the positive response to the Bill that we heard from all parts of the House, and by the constructive attitude of hon. Members towards the potential establishment of the Assembly.

I thank the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) for the support of the official Opposition for the Government's proposals. I thank the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) for the support of the Liberal Democrats. I thank the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), who approached the debate with a positive, constructive attitude. I pay tribute to him. It is the first time, I think, that he has spoken in a debate since his 80th birthday. He seems to be reinvigorated on every occasion that he speaks in the House. I wish him well in his continued deliberations on these matters.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), the Chair of the Select Committee, who also approached the debate in a positive way, as have Members from all parts of the House who spoke today. It is heartening that everyone who took part in the debate spoke in favour of devolution for the people of Northern Ireland. The only argument has been about the conditions and about how and when that will occur. All sides accept the principle of devolution. The Bill is about how we achieve it.

That is important for the reason given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy). As a previous Secretary of State, he knows better than anybody else, apart from my right hon. Friend the current Secretary of State, the difficulties of managing devolution as a direct-rule Minister. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen, my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier), the right hon. Member for North Antrim and the hon. Members for Foyle, for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) and for South Down (Mr. McGrady) have said, when I deal with Northern Ireland business, I do so as a Member of Parliament who is elected in Wales with a 6,500 majority—my majority has reduced over the past few years due to factors outside my control. I speak on behalf of the Government, but there are no crosses against my party's name, and, unlike Assembly Members, I do not have the mandate of being removable by the people of Northern Ireland.

Today's debate and the discussions that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has conducted outside this Chamber about the potential for devolution show that there are real grounds for optimism and that real efforts have been made to make the Assembly operate positively and constructively. Although I recognise the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) about the different nature of the Assembly, I hope that we will move quickly to the permanent restoration mentioned by the hon. Member for Foyle. There is an overwhelming wish in Northern Ireland for devolution to occur and for the parties to co-operate, but I do not underestimate the challenges that the parties face.

I have listened to the hon. Member for Upper Bann (David Simpson), and I know about the contributions that the hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea) has made in the past, so I know that those Members' constituents have faced challenges, tragedies and terrorist acts every day for the past 30 years and more. As hon. Members have said, I know that it is difficult for them to enter a coalition with people who have undertaken the type of acts to which the hon. Member for Upper Bann has referred. In my view, however, it is the best possible option for the future of Northern Ireland for those people to work together with the civil service to manage the billions of pounds of expenditure in Northern Ireland. That money is being provided by the British Government and distributed by British Ministers, but there are local priorities, and I think it is important that we consider that point.

In setting out the challenge of devolution in simple, straightforward terms, I am not seeking to minimise in any way, shape or form the concerns and hesitations. As hon. Members have said, trust is a key element. As the right hon. Member for North Antrim and the hon. Members for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) and for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) have said, the conditions are not right at the moment, and I understand that concern, to which the hon. Members for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) and for South Staffordshire have also referred. I know that there are real issues of trust and confidence, and I listened carefully when the hon. Member for East Londonderry elucidated them.

We are moving in the right direction. The hon. Member for Aylesbury has already quoted this section of today's IMC report:

> "It remains our absolutely clear view that the PIRA leadership has committed itself to following a peaceful path. It is working to bring the whole organisation fully along with it and has expended considerable effort to refocus the movement in support of its objective. In the last three months this process has involved the further dismantling of PIRA as a military structure."

My hon. Friends the Members for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) and for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) recognised those points in their contributions.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) has said that progress has been made, but that more progress needs to be made. I agree with him and hope to see that happen, but there is evidence that progress is already being made.

Mr. Winnick: Will my hon. Friend reinforce a point that I made in an earlier intervention? Those of us who want to see progress in Northern Ireland, who are in favour of the Belfast agreement and who want to see devolution applied as quickly as possible were no less opposed to terrorism from day one than the DUP and the other parties in Northern Ireland which are represented in the House of Commons.

Mr. Hanson: My hon. Friend has highlighted that very clearly, and I support him in his objective. In the meantime, despite the fact that the IRA is moving in the right direction, we as a Government will not tolerate criminality or paramilitary activity in any way, shape or form, whether from the loyalist or the republican side.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I entirely accept what the Minister says. As a logical consequence of that, should not he convey clearly and unambiguously to Sinn Fein-IRA that the Government have a limit to their patience, and that if conditions have not been met by November, the obvious alternative is to work for a coalition between the three democratic parties whose credentials are not in doubt?

Mr. Hanson: Let us see what happens. I believe that progress is being made and will continue to be made, and that the IMC will back that up.

The Government will not tolerate criminality and paramilitary activity. On the republican side, in March we undertook operations resulting in 100,000 litres of fuel being seized, with the Criminal Assets Bureau freezing £1 million in cash and cheques found during that search. This week alone, the Assets Recovery Agency secured £140,000 from alleged fuel smuggling, as was mentioned by the hon. Members for East Londonderry, for South Antrim and for Lagan Valley. On the loyalist side, in December the Assets Recovery Agency froze £400,000 from alleged loyalist paramilitaries, and assets of £200,000 were frozen after the murder of the alleged loyalist brigadier, Jim Gray. The Northern Ireland Affairs Committee is currently examining how we deal with such issues. Criminality and paramilitary activity will not be tolerated, and the Government will work towards that end, but I believe that the conditions that Members are seeking will be achieved in due course through movements by the Provisional IRA.

We have to face reality and look to the significant challenges that will ensue. The Bill provides the framework whereby we can facilitate the dialogue for the future. As the hon. Member for Foyle said, individuals have worked together to do things that would have been unthinkable a few years ago. They did not abandon their beliefs in a united Ireland or in an Ireland that has relationships, through Northern Ireland, with the British Government as part of the United Kingdom, but they worked together on issues to do with the economics and day-to-day life of their communities. More than anything else, I want that to happen now.

Through the Bill, we have set up the Assembly. I know that the hon. Member for North Down has concerns about that, but I say to her and to others that we want it to be able to discuss real issues as well as to elect a First Minister and Deputy First Minister and an Executive, and as soon as possible, I hope, optimistic as I am, to form a Government and return to the full Assembly that the hon. Lady so desires. In the meantime, we have given it the opportunity to discuss and express views on education, the review of public administration, and water charges.

There has been a serious debate about how the Government will take account of those views in this Chamber. We will listen to what is said and consider the issues that are put to us, but we still have a duty as a Government to govern Northern Ireland in the best interests of its population. Whatever the Assembly that is set up in a fortnight's time may be, it will not be an Executive Assembly until it elects an Executive. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my fellow Ministers have a duty to this House to govern Northern Ireland responsibly, and it would be constitutionally wrong for us to say that we will automatically defer to another body while doing so. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch observed, we have a job to do in Northern Ireland until such time as the Assembly forms an Executive to do that job.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State clearly set out the cost of maintaining the Assembly that has been unable to function. I pay tribute to the Members of the Assembly for the work that they do at the moment.

I receive delegations on housing, culture, sport and the range of issues for which I am responsible from Members of the Legislative Assembly who are now doing a constituency job. They write letters to me, visit, press us on a range of subjects and publicly comment on issues. They are doing a job but not the job that we are doing today—holding the Executive to account in a Chamber and legislating. I hope and pray that they will do that in due course in the Assembly. However, in the event of that not happening, we have to consider the costs of the Assembly and the way in which we hold elections to a future Assembly. That is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has set the deadline of 24 November for progress.

The deadline is not a threat—it is simply an embodiment of a political reality. We cannot go on as we have done. We cannot finance a non-functioning Assembly indefinitely or go through the motions of an election next May to an Assembly that does not meet, legislate or hold the Executive to account.

The process creates the potential for an Assembly to meet on 15 May and elect an Executive, but, if it cannot do that, to discuss some of the issues and reflect the opinions of the 108 elected Members of the Legislative Assembly to my right hon. Friend and me. That is important.

Some hon. Members rightly asked about Orders in Council. I have said to the hon. Members for Aylesbury, for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson), for Montgomeryshire and others that we do not find that procedure especially satisfactory. There are difficulties with it and my right hon. Friend has written to hon. Members to ask for their views on how we can improve the process. However, we have to govern. We have to make decisions and determine how we make progress in future. We have to run Departments. When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, the Taoiseach and I met business people in Armagh about some of issues on which we govern, they welcomed aspects of what we did. They welcomed some of the changes that we are making in, for example, the review of public administration.

We will have to listen and we will take representations. There will be an opportunity for the Assembly to present its opinions. However, we are accountable to the House for billions of pounds of public money that my right hon. Friend and I are spending on behalf of the people of Northern Ireland in the absence of the Assembly.

I hope that the Bill is about success, not failure. We believe that it is the best vehicle for success that can be constructed at the moment. We need the Assembly to be back in place and we must examine how we can make it work for the future. The challenge to all hon. Members is how we do that.

The hon. Member for North Down mentioned the delay in holding the election. We will discuss that when we consider the amendments tomorrow. We believe that the delay is necessary for the simple reason that, if we get the Assembly operational by October or November, it will work for only a few months before the rigours of an election.

Lady Hermon: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hanson: I cannot because of lack of time. We have delayed the election for one year, not to meddle with democracy, as has been alleged, but to give the Assembly the opportunity to bed in, if it is formed, and to be stable and satisfactory for going into an election in future.

The Government are trying to get the Assembly back up and running. We are setting the framework for it to work. However, the prime movers must be the political parties that represent the people of Northern Ireland. We must move forward on the basis of an accommodation between people in Northern Ireland represented by their political leaders in the Assembly. If the House approves the Bill, the message to the people of Northern Ireland is that we have confidence in them and believe that they can run the affairs of their Province. We will support them in doing that, hand them billions of pounds of Government money to expend on their priorities and give an opportunity locally for them to determine their priorities, so that people who represent constituencies in Neath and north Wales do not choose them on their behalf.

There is an opportunity for the Assembly to be reformed and to make progress. I hope that, on 15 May, the Assembly will elect an Executive and commence that process. We look forward to considering amendments tomorrow. In the meantime, for the reason that democracy is exercised best when exercised locally by locally accountable people, I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Committee of the whole House, pursuant to Order [this day].

Committee tomorrow.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

NORTHERN IRELAND

That the draft Fire and Rescue Services (Northern Ireland) Order 2006, which was laid before this House on 13th March, be approved.—[Mr. Coaker.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 119(9)(European Standing Committees),

PROMOTION OF CLEAN ROAD VEHICLES

That this House takes note of European Union Document No. 5130/06 and Addendum 1, Draft Directive on the promotion of clean road vehicles; and endorses the Government's approach in investigating what the costs and impacts of the proposal on the UK would be and in seeking to so amend the proposal that, if implemented, it would result in the best possible balance between environmental and other benefits, and financial and other burdens on both the public and private sectors.—[Mr. Coaker.]

Question agreed to.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Are you aware that today we have received information that there have been arrests in Birmingham in relation to allegations of serious misconduct in relation to postal votes? Given that one of the people arrested is said to be a close relative of a leading Lib Dem candidate in the city of Birmingham, will you use your good offices to ensure that everything is done to ensure that the local election result in Birmingham is a fair and proper one?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I understand the concern expressed by the hon. Lady, but it is not a point of order for the Chair.

PETITIONS

Asbestos Storage

7.1 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I rise to present a petition compiled by Linda and Lenny Green and others to raise awareness of an asbestos plant on the Manor trading estate in Benfleet. I entirely agree with the terms of the petition. The asbestos plant is completely inappropriate and there are far better sites for it.

The Petition of the residents of Thundersley and Benfleet,

Declares that the proposal for change of use of Unit 10 to allow the storage of hazardous waste such as asbestos on the Manor Trading Estate in Thundersley would introduce unacceptable risk and increased pressure of use of local roads and is particularly inappropriate in view of the immediate proximity of residential homes and a primary school. The petitioners further believe there are much more appropriate sites for this activity in the local area.

The Petitioners therefore implore the House of Commons to call upon the Government to do all within its power to ensure that Essex County Council reject the application as requested by the Member of Parliament for Castle Point.

To lie upon the Table.

Traffic Calming

7.2 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I have now in my hands a major petition organised by Councillor Gail Boland of Boyce ward, signed by almost 2,000 people. Councillor Boland has worked tirelessly for her residents on this and many other issues. She has made it clear that she does not want speed bumps, and that she just wants vehicle-activated LED speed signs.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons

The Petition of the people living in and around Boyce and St. Mary's Wards, Castle Point, declares that we the residents of Benfleet and surrounding areas are concerned about the increasing dangers in the High Road Benfleet, in the Queens Road and Vicarage Hill area, for pedestrians and particularly children and elderly people, and we therefore call for an investigation into the best scheme for traffic calming and particularly the consideration of a changed road surface with 'flash-up-your-speed' signs, for the benefit of both residents and road users.

The Petitioners therefore call on the House of Commons to urge the Government to impress upon Castle Point Borough Council and the Highway Authority the importance of serving local people by providing improved pedestrian safety particularly for our children and elderly people.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Milton Keynes

7.3 pm

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): It is my privilege to present the petition of my constituent Mr. Andrew Geary of Hanslope and many others, who are understandably incensed by the Government's attempts to impose expansion plans on Milton Keynes via unelected and unaccountable quangos.

The Petition of the citizens of Milton Keynes

Declares that for any community to be 'sustainable' the plans for its expansion must be supported by existing residents and that Milton Keynes Partnerships' 'Public Consultation' process was not long enough to fully involve the Citizens of Milton Keynes in the decision making process regarding the 2031 Milton Keynes expansion plans.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to set up a local referendum to decide:

If the expansion planning and delivery should be returned to those who are democratically elected to represent and service the people of Milton Keynes and the surrounding area.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Miners' Welfare Institutes

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Roy.]

7.4 pm

Mr. Denis Murphy (Wansbeck) (Lab): I am grateful to the House for allowing me this debate. With your permission, Madam Deputy Speaker, I shall explain the history and background of miners' welfare institutes and the important role that they continue to play in the life of the communities that they now serve.

Many miners' welfare institutes were established at the turn of the last century. They were funded from a weekly contribution paid by every working miner. They provided excellent support and recreational facilities that were used not just by miners but the whole community. The specific case that I raise tonight is that of Hirst welfare in Ashington, but VAT affects scores of similar organisations throughout the country.

The original Hirst welfare was established through the Ashington coal company and a variety of facilities were provided for the local community, including both buildings and recreation grounds. Hirst welfare was where Jackie Milburn honed his remarkable skills and Bobby and Jackie Charlton first played football. More recently, it was where the world's finest fast bowler, Steve Harmison, developed his love for cricket. It was where generations of young men played sports, particularly football, in a spirit sadly long gone, that gave the welfare leagues a reputation for skill and toughness that was certainly not for the faint-hearted.

In 1966, through the creation of the Miners' Welfare Commission, and its successor the Coal Industry Social Welfare Organisation, CISWO, the Ashington Joint Welfare Group of Schemes was formed. It was registered with the Charity Commission, and was established to manage six community facilities across south-east Northumberland. Those facilities were Hirst welfare, Ashington recreation ground and the welfares at Linton, Newbiggin, Lynemouth and Pegswood. The charity continued to manage those facilities through a group of trustees and individual management committees consisting of local residents and representatives from the then local collieries.

It is important to point out that while CISWO was funded by a levy on each tonne of coal mined nationally, the organisation and all the activities at each welfare site were still funded by levies agreed and deducted from individual miners' wages. It was therefore inevitable that, when the collieries started to close and the funding began to dry up, the organisation began to struggle to maintain its operations. As a result, four of the sites were transferred to local authorities in the 1980s. Linton, Lynemouth and Pegswood welfares were transferred to Castle Morpeth borough council and Newbiggin welfare was transferred to Wansbeck district council. That was also a difficult time for the local authorities, as the then Conservative Government forced year-on-year severe cuts in local government funding. It is to the credit of the local authorities that I mentioned that they managed to hold on to those community assets for so long.

The charity continued to manage Hirst welfare and Ashington recreation ground. In 1995, however, its financial difficulties could not be overcome, with the closure under British Coal of Ellington colliery being the final nail in the coffin resulting in the loss of all its income. The centre was closed in 1996 and demolished in 1997 on safety grounds. It was a sad sight. Rose bay willow herb and broken glass, synonymous in many ways with the dereliction of abandoned coal mine sites, was now invading the heart of the community and covered the turf that was once graced by Ashington's and Britain's greatest world-class athletes.

The situation was made much more difficult by the site then being in the middle of four wards suffering the highest deprivation levels in Northumberland. The Hirst is situated in the south-east of Ashington with a population of about 8,000 people living in 3,500 densely built houses and flats. On the index of multiple deprivation, all those wards featured in the bottom 10 per cent. nationally. In response to both deprivation and the lack of services, Wansbeck district council commissioned a number of reports. The first, produced in 1997, dealt with the Hirst regeneration. The second, produced in 2000, was the Ashington investment study. The final one, which I understand was completed in 2001, was the Wansbeck community appraisal. Although the reports dealt with different issues, they all recommended the creation of a community facility that could provide a range of services and give the community an identity.

At about the same time, in 1997, the newly elected Labour Government recognised the unique problems faced by coalfield communities as a result of the decline of the mining industry. In October that year, the Government established the coalfield taskforce to provide initiatives to help former mining communities. The taskforce's report "Making the Difference" was published in June 1998, and set out a programme of action to combat the deprivation faced by those communities. Here at last, many of us thought, was a real opportunity to provide much-needed facilities. The Government should be congratulated on an initiative that has made a significant contribution to the improvement of former coalfield areas.

One of the most important and relevant recommendations from the taskforce concerned one-stop shops. The report stated

> "We believe that there is an exciting opportunity to adopt the one stop shop model much more widely to integrate both government and voluntary sector provision in a way that will promote collaboration rather than competition between local organisations. In choosing a suitable building, the Miners Welfare will often be the obvious first choice. One stop shops should aim to incorporate the widest possible range of co-located partners, and the services offered should be designed to appeal to all sections of the community. These might include new recreational and health facilities for ex-miners; a resource centre for those seeking work, perhaps including a part-time Employment Service outreach facility and childcare services; and sports facilities and youth clubs for the younger generation."

As a result of that recommendation, CISWO secured funding from the National Lottery Charities Board for its one-stop shop project, enabling seven full-time staff to be employed across the English, Scottish and Welsh coalfields to help 25 miners' welfare schemes redevelop and become one-stop shops. In 2000, Wansbeck district council approached CISWO and requested that a new Hirst welfare centre be included in the one-stop shop programme. It was approved, and a new partnership was formed to implement the project. Funding was secured for a joint feasibility study to run alongside the upgrading of Hirst park, which is close to the welfare centre. There were substantial consultations with the community, and a number of options were prepared.

In 2002, work began to secure the necessary funding, which was in place by November 2003 when the contracts were let. The new Hirst welfare centre was completed and opened to the public in December 2004. It is a tremendous achievement and, genuinely, a huge success.

The euphoria was short-lived. A demand for £85,000 in VAT on the project arrived recently from Her Majesty's Customs and Excise. That came as a complete surprise to the trustees. When the feasibility study was carried out, the design team contacted Customs and Excise, which said that the project would be zero-rated because it was new build. As a result of the VAT reclaimed on the project, it has gone into the capital goods scheme, which means that the project will be assessed by Customs and Excise every year for the next 10 years.

I spoke to the trustees today. They informed me that they had borrowed the money to pay the VAT from the miners' trust fund, and would pay it back over 10 years. That cannot be right. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to review the VAT position at the Hirst welfare centre, to ensure that the money remains in the community where those who provided it intended all of it to be used.

The trustees argued that the project should be treated as a village hall or something similar, in order to obtain zero rating. It is important for the next few minutes to examine the reasons why Customs and Excise would not accept that description. Its interpretation of a village hall or similar was based on location—it had to be easily accessible by most members of the local community—and on the building: village halls vary according to needs and resources, but they tend to be small. Management and administration should be vested in local village hall trustees. Income should come mainly from charges and there should be limited kitchen, sports and play equipment. A crèche could be provided, and the staff would usually consist of volunteers. A wide range of activities should take place in such places, including private parties, committee meetings, jumble sales, wedding receptions, parish council meetings, women's institute meetings, polling stations, dances, discos, senior citizens' clubs, playgroups and blood transfusions—in other words, anything that is relevant to a particular community.

Customs and Excise did not agree that the Hirst welfare centre fitted the village hall description for the following four reasons. First, its size exceeded the typical village hall definition; secondly, turnover exceeded that typically expected in a village hall; thirdly, staff are employed to work in the centre; fourthly, the gym equipment is assembled on a permanent basis.

The size of the centre was determined in many ways by Government policy and the requirements of the funding partners—it is indeed a one-stop shop. The organisations based in the centre are: Wansbeck district council information point, a healthy living centre, a toy library, East Ashington fun club, a power-lifting club, "action team for jobs", a citizens advice bureau, the National Union of Mineworkers' and the Regeneration Trust's skills building project, and Hirst high school. The organisations delivering services from that site are the primary care trust, Barnado's, Sure Start, the youth offending service, the probation service, the Football Association, several community partnerships, Jobcentre Plus, Connexions, the teenage pregnancy unit, the education action zone and out-of-school clubs.

The uses to which the centre is put are many and varied. They include, among many others, salsa dancing, aerobics, boxing training, tea dances, karate, wrestling, FA coaching, football training for boys and girls of all ages and information technology courses. The size of the centre and its staffing and income therefore fit the needs of the community perfectly. All the outreach facilities and courses are tailored to serve the needs of the individuals who live in that community.

The role of miners' welfare schemes and community buildings such as village halls has changed dramatically since the VAT rules were last reviewed some 10 years ago. No longer are such facilities used on an ad hoc basis; they are now vital community resources that are used to deliver front-line services to help local communities regenerate. Through charging VAT on the capital costs of multi-use community facilities, Customs and Excise is diverting much needed finance from such front-line services. It is forcing local community organisations to raise substantial funding from one Government source to give to another. Often, it is the VAT element of a capital project that determines whether a programme succeeds.

The case that I have raised concerns new build, but I should like the Minister to note that the same arguments apply to the refurbishment of miners' welfare institutes, for which VAT should also be zero-rated. I hope that he can examine in some detail the case that I have raised tonight and review the rules on VAT, so that all the funds raised for this project are used to benefit the community served by Hirst welfare centre.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy) on securing this Adjournment debate. He has raised an issue that is important not only to his constituents, but to others.

There is no doubt, as my hon. Friend has said, that miners' welfare institutes and similar facilities play a very important role in their communities. I applaud the contribution, often voluntary, that the committees and trustees of these organisations make to their communities. The Government have recognised, as my hon. Friend acknowledged, that current and former mining areas present many challenges. As the coalfields' taskforce report summed it up, the coalfields have "a unique combination of concentrated joblessness, physical isolation, poor infrastructure and severe health problems".

The Government are committed to thriving, sustainable communities and to making that commitment real for coalfield areas. As my hon. Friend said, we have established the national coalfield programme; a 10-year, £500 million commitment. We have also created the Coalfields Regeneration Trust, which has become a central player in the social regeneration of pit communities, including providing support to thousands of community groups. We have also made support available through the sustainable communities plan, the coalfield enterprise fund, regional development agencies, local authorities and English Partnership.

I therefore hope that my hon. Friend will agree that there is no lack of determination on the part of the Government and their local partners—backed by significant resources—to help tackle problems faced in coalfield areas, and to support the social regeneration of pit communities. My hon. Friend was gracious enough to acknowledge that that is an accurate description of what the Government have tried to do since 1997.

I now turn specifically to the VAT rules. I should explain that the VAT treatment of construction work is mainly the product of the historical development of the tax decisions taken by previous Governments. When VAT was introduced in 1973, zero rating applied to the construction, extension and alteration of all buildings. However, the then Government decided not to apply that relief to any service of repair, maintenance, or refurbishment of any building, except for a small number of alterations made to listed buildings or to facilitate access and use by disabled people. Following a European Court ruling, the VAT relief for commercial construction was withdrawn in 1989.

The current position is therefore that VAT relief applies only to the construction of certain new residential and new charitable buildings. In the case of charitable buildings, that VAT relief for new constructions applies only if the building will be used by a charity solely as a village hall or similarly in providing social or recreational facilities for a local community, or less than 10 per cent. for a non-business use; for example, an activity for which no charge is made.

VAT has always been chargeable on repairs, maintenance and refurbishment for all types of buildings, although there is some limited relief in relation to alterations to listed buildings, or alterations to certain buildings to facilitate access and use by disabled people, as I have said.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing my attention to the circumstances of Hirst welfare centre in his constituency. It clearly has an august history, as some of the great sportsmen and women of this country began to develop their interest in sport there. As a Manchester City fan, I will not hold it against my hon. Friend that Bobby Charlton learned his trade at the Hirst welfare centre.

As my hon. Friend is aware, the administration of VAT reliefs set down by Parliament is a matter for Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs and it would not be appropriate for me to comment on this, or any other specific case. As I have said, there is VAT relief in certain circumstances for new constructions of, for example, village halls and it may be that a newly built miners' welfare institute could qualify for that relief. The building would have to be for use by a charity. As my hon. Friend said, there should be a high degree of local community involvement in its operation and activities, which should be predominantly social and/or recreational and no part of the building should be dedicated exclusively to a non-social or non-recreational activity. However, as has always been the case, even if the building were to qualify as a village hall, VAT relief would not extend to repairs, refurbishment or alterations, except in the circumstances that I have already described.

If the Hirst welfare centre believes that it qualifies for VAT relief, there are well established procedures in place for HMRC to consider or reconsider the VAT treatment that should apply, and I would strongly encourage the trustees and my hon. Friend to pursue those. If there is still no agreement, an appeal may be made to the independent VAT and duties tribunal to decide the matter.

If it were to transpire that the Hirst welfare centre, having disclosed all relevant facts to HMRC, relied upon an incorrect ruling from HMRC—as my hon. Friend suggested might have been the case—and undertook a construction project on the understanding that no VAT would be incurred, HMRC would consider whether an ex gratia payment, equal to the VAT incurred, would be appropriate.

That is a matter for HMRC, and one in which it would be inappropriate for me to intervene directly. However, in such circumstances, provision exists for HMRC to use discretion. If my hon. Friend is right about the assurances given at the beginning of the process, that might be a useful avenue for him and the trustees to pursue.

My hon. Friend may ask whether anything can be done to remove VAT costs in this and similar situations. I should make it clear that, under the normal VAT rules, VAT chargeable on any construction work can be reclaimed by a VAT-registered miners' institute through the VAT system, when it relates to taxable business activities such as bar sales. Therefore, provided that the institute is VAT-registered, we would expect at least some of the VAT cost to be reclaimable.

However, the fundamental principles of the tax system mean that VAT is not chargeable on exempt or non-business activities, and that the supplier is unable to reclaim VAT costs incurred in providing those activities. The same applies to all the activities of organisations that are not registered for VAT.

The VAT rules apply equally to all businesses, charities or community groups. I am sure that my hon. Friend will appreciate that the situation that he describes is not unique to miners' institutes. Many other groups are in a comparable position, in that they provide a range of facilities or services to the community and are subject to the same VAT rules. For that reason, when community bodies or charities bid for funding for capital projects, it is usual for the bids to take into account any irrecoverable VAT costs.

As my hon. Friend is probably aware, VAT reliefs are governed by European agreements, entered into by successive Governments, that mean that we cannot extend existing VAT reliefs or introduce new ones. Therefore, it is simply not possible to introduce a zero rate for the repair or refurbishment of miners' institutes and community facilities, for example, or to extend the existing VAT relief for new constructions. Similarly, the availability of reduced VAT rates is governed by European agreements that provide no scope for the introduction of a reduced rate for the repair or refurbishment of any buildings other than housing.

As European agreements mean that it is not possible to extend the existing VAT reliefs, my hon. Friend might ask why we do not simply undertake to refund or compensate an institute for any VAT that is not reclaimable through the VAT system. Such a solution would not be without major difficulties, although of course we recognise the broader problem that irrecoverable VAT can create for charities and community groups. The issue has been considered in two major reviews since 1997.

The reviews led us to two basic conclusions. First, we concluded that it would not be an affordable or efficient use of public resources to reimburse all charitable, voluntary and community bodies in the UK for the VAT that they incur, regardless of the activities that they are involved in or their financial health. Secondly, we determined that there was no fair and principled basis on which we could decide that some organisations would be reimbursed their VAT and others would not. That remains the Government's position.

We have therefore chosen to provide support to achieve our social priorities outside the VAT system. I have mentioned one example already; the benefit accruing to coalfield areas from the Government's 10-year, £500-million commitment to social regeneration.

My hon. Friend has raised an important issue and shone a light on a matter that otherwise would not get attention at this level. I listened carefully to what he said. As I noted earlier, I cannot comment on the specific case that he mentioned, other than to say that HMRC administers the VAT rules set down by Parliament and interpreted by the courts over the years. Well established arrangements are in place to settle disputes about the application of the rules and about what should happen if a fully informed officer of HMRC gives a wrong decision that in the end is to the detriment of taxpayers.

My hon. Friend has made an important case this evening. I urge him and the trustees of Hirst welfare centre to approach HMRC at a senior level and argue that there should be a different outcome in these circumstances. In addition, although I cannot intervene directly in the matter, I am certainly willing to facilitate contact between him and his trustees and senior officers in HMRC.

Given the constraints placed on me, I hope that my hon. Friend will find my response helpful. Moreover, I hope that the Hirst welfare centre trustees will see from the debate that their constituency representative has raised the matter in a responsible and effective manner and that, where possible, the Government will listen to the representations made to them.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Seven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

REPORT OF THE SPOLIATION PANEL

Resolved,

That an Humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, That she will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House a Return of the Report from the Right Honourable Sir David Hirst, Chairman of the Spoliation Advisory Panel, in respect of four drawings now in the possession of the British Museum.—[Mr. Cawsey.]

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Personalised Learning

2. Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): At which children her policy of personalised learning in schools will be targeted; and if she will make a statement. [66204]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): All children can, and should, benefit from increasingly personalised learning. We have announced a total of £990 million of additional funding by 2007–08 for that purpose. All schools will receive extra funding, but we will target those facing the greatest challenges—schools with pupils from deprived backgrounds or with low prior attainment.

Jim Dobbin: In Heywood and Middleton, the local education authority intends to spend some of that money developing new technologies to help and support children at home, because some children have struggled in the transition from primary to secondary school. Is that the kind of project that the Secretary of State is willing to support?

Ruth Kelly: Yes, indeed. The project in Heywood and Middleton is innovative, and my hon. Friend is right to point to the difficulties that some children face in making the transition from primary school to secondary school. Alongside the funding for personalised learning, we have recently set out plans to invest £40 million in parent support advisers, specifically to enable secondary schools quickly to identify those children who face the greatest challenges and to work with them and their families in order to support them in secondary school. The scheme outlined by my hon. Friend is another interesting way to try to address those issues.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Will the Secretary of State help my constituents? A number of pupils have been left without any education for months on end, and I recently found out about a case in which a pupil was left for a year without any education. What measures will the Secretary of State take to improve the situation?

Ruth Kelly: As the hon. Gentleman knows, local authorities will have a duty, which is set out in the Education and Inspections Bill, to identify all those children who are missing education and to provide them with an appropriate education and their families with a choice of education. He has made a very serious point; we must tackle truancy, which may lead to children becoming completely disaffected. We must also provide opportunities for those children who have been excluded from school to have a decent and appropriate education, which is why our investment in pupil referral units is so important. We must continue to raise the quality of education provided in those units, so that pupils who are being educated in them achieve good results.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend take particular note of the research by the Institute for Public Policy Research on personalised learning and its effect on social mobility? Yesterday, we celebrated in the House of Commons the second anniversary of the launch of volunteer reading schemes. Both the research and the volunteer reading schemes indicate the importance of training intermediaries and we must ensure that we have the best qualified people in this country, whether they are volunteers or teachers, to make personalised learning work.

Ruth Kelly: My hon. Friend is right. He must have read the speech that I made yesterday to the IPPR on social mobility, in which I drew attention to the fact that if we have catch-up lessons for those children who start to fall behind and push to their maximum potential those children who demonstrate real ability in the classroom through genuine personalised learning, we can make a significant difference to not only the number of children who obtain five good GCSEs, but the progress that children make later in life, which relates to social mobility. He is also right to draw attention to the potential of reading schemes in primary school and later. The research conducted on reading recovery is powerful, but so is the evidence on synthetic phonics, which is why we have emphasised that children should be taught synthetic phonics first and fast, which will not only improve the quality of reading, but help to close the class gap.

World Skills Championship

3. Ms Angela C. Smith (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): What support her Department will be giving to the world skills championship to be held in 2011; and if she will make a statement. [66205]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): Hosting the world skills championship in London will offer world skills a global stage, and it will also bring economic and social rewards to the UK. The brochure links world skills 2011 with the 2012 Olympics. That link between excellence in sport and excellence in skills forms a unique offer to world skills, and it will help us to change public attitudes in this country about skills. I should add that the Government are match funding and underwriting the whole event.

Ms Smith: I am sure that the whole House will join the Minister in hoping that the UK bid triumphs in Melbourne in May. Will my hon. Friend tell the House what role he thinks that world skills 2011 could play in meeting the distinctive skills needs of each region of the UK?

Phil Hope: I attended the world skills championship in Finland last year. It was genuinely inspiring as we saw young people competing to demonstrate their skills at the highest level, benchmarking themselves against the rest of the world. I hope that we have full support across this House for our bid to host the championship. Whatever the result in Melbourne on 10 May, we intend to re-energise skills competitions over the next five years so that we really celebrate success. We are going to create a new framework at local, regional, national and international levels to ensure that we raise the profile of skills, raise aspirations and improve supply. In Northern Ireland, Wales, Scotland and all the English regions, we can target skills competitions around skills needs in the different regions and nations of this country.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): We welcome the bid to stage the world skills championship. However, the Minister knows that, as the leaked report has shown, Britain faces a skills crisis, particularly a language skills crisis. A Secondary Heads Association survey reveals that the number of post-14 pupils studying languages is plummeting and only a fifth of 15-year-olds now study a foreign language. A Government-sponsored report shows that Britain is bottom of the class in Europe for language skills—28th out of 28 countries. In Olympic terms, the Minister is the Eddie the Eagle of language skills. Given that failure, in what specific ways did the Government take account of language skills when designing the new vocational diplomas?

Phil Hope: The Education and Inspections Bill, which the hon. Gentleman and I are currently discussing as we take it through Parliament, will give us the opportunity to discuss the future of the national curriculum, including the importance that the Government place on encouraging young people to take up language opportunities, not least in primary schools as well as secondary schools, and to make modern foreign languages attractive and interesting for young people across the piece.

I want to emphasise that if we succeed in our bid to host the world skills championship, which will attract representatives from 45 countries from across the world to London, young people from Newham will act as volunteers, teaming up with each country's team of young people to provide them with a tailor-made service, including being able to speak to them and support them in the languages of their nations. That is because we have such a rich cultural diversity of young people and nations in our capital city of London.

Extended Schools

4. Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): What progress she is making with her proposals for extended schools; and if she will make a statement. [66206]

The Minister for Children and Families (Beverley Hughes): More than 6,000 schools are engaged with the extended schools development programme. The strong engagement of schools and local authorities means that we are making good progress towards our target of all schools offering access to extended services by 2010. The early evaluation that we have carried out demonstrates that extended services can have a positive impact on the attendance and motivation of pupils, enhance children's and families' access to services and, if well managed, relieve pressure on teachers' workloads.

Helen Goodman: I am most grateful to the Minister for that report on the excellent progress that is being made on the extended schools programme. Every day, children need the opportunity to play and to relax. Is she aware of the work being done by the National Association of Toy and Leisure Libraries to encourage games clubs in schools, with lots of ideas for outdoor games, card games and board games—every kind of possibility—and what is she doing to support such activities?

Beverley Hughes: I agree with my hon. Friend that particularly, but not exclusively, for young children, play is a very important part of the concept of extended activities in schools. Indeed, the prospectus that we published made it clear that we want play to be an important aspect. Children should not just have study support and curriculum-focused activities at the end of the day; we want them to relax and unwind in a secure and stimulating environment. Schools will be talking to parents and children as they plan what is required for their extended activities, and I am sure that parents will want that to happen. Because extended schools activities are about working in partnership with other organisations, and not schools doing it themselves, I am sure that the National Association of Toy and Leisure Libraries will have a big part to play in ensuring that extended activities can include play.

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): The Minister will be aware of the Headspace survey that suggested that 37 per cent. of head teachers had no intention of offering the extended schools scheme. Does she think that that might be because the money provided by the Government is enough only to pay for one extra teacher per school?

Beverley Hughes: No, I do not. We are on a journey with extended schools. As I said, more than 6,000 schools are working with us directly to provide extended services. The baseline survey that we conducted at the outset showed that approximately 95 per cent. of secondary schools and 87 per cent. of primary schools already offered extended activities after school to some extent. There is therefore a great deal of interest and commitment. Extended activities help schools to maximise the attainment of their children and support parents in doing that. Schools that have provided extended activities for some time are convinced of the benefits. I am sure that, as we develop the programme, that will be the case for all schools. The money provided—£840 million so far—is for start-up costs. Schools need to ensure that they sustain activities and we will support them with a charging regime to ensure that they do.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What assurance can the Minister give that the £840 million will go to schools and not be tied up in local education authorities? What assessment has been made of the extra burdens on head teachers, teachers and school governors of implementing the project?

Beverley Hughes: A significant proportion of the £840 million goes directly to schools, with the remainder going through local authorities. Schools will receive a substantial amount of money directly from the Department to support the development. The money is not for supporting activities in the long-term, but for the development of such activities.

We commissioned research from Manchester university on the impact on schools, and there has been an interim report. One finding is that if the project is managed in the right way, it reduces the burden on teachers. By that I mean that provided that head teachers do not take the view that they have to do everything themselves—we do not want them to take that view—but garner the support and opportunities offered by other organisations in the locality, including voluntary organisations and child care providers who want to work with them, the impact on schools can be beneficial in releasing teachers for their core job, which is teaching.

Academy Schools

5. Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): How many academy schools are planned to open in the next 12 months. [66208]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Ruth Kelly): Nineteen.

Mr. Wilson: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply. She knows that I am an enthusiastic supporter of academies and trust schools. Indeed, children from my constituency will shortly benefit from the Madejski academy. However, several constituents have alleged that Reading education authority has been involved in financial maladministration and gross mismanagement in relation to the academy and council tax payers. Will the right hon. Lady undertake to examine that as a matter of urgency to ensure that the success of the academy programme is untarnished?

Ruth Kelly: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support for the academy programme. Indeed, I welcome support for the programme from wherever it comes in the House and outside because the programme is making such a difference to the life chances of some of our children in the most deprived communities in the country.

The allegations that the hon. Gentleman just made in the House have never been brought to my attention. I am happy to consider them. If he writes to me, I shall do that and give him a full response.

Sir Peter Soulsby (Leicester, South) (Lab): Is the Secretary of State aware of the likely disastrous effects on existing schools and the education of their pupils of establishing an academy on the site of the former Mary Linwood school in Leicester? Will she ensure a full and open review of such effects on other schools before any further academies are set up?

Ruth Kelly: We have looked at the evidence closely. Only yesterday, I published evidence that showed that the value added—the progress made by pupils in academy schools between the ages of 14 and 15—was greater than that in comparable schools. That has happened in the first two years of their operation, and our initial evidence suggests that, while academies have been improving pupils' results, the results in neighbouring schools have been improving at the same time. I therefore assure my hon. Friend that academies will start to tackle ingrained educational disadvantage while other local schools start to improve their results, too.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (DUP): Is the Secretary of State disappointed by the negative attitude of teachers' unions to the proposal to build more academies, given that it has brought more private and public money into the school system, especially for some schools that are experiencing problems? Will she give an assurance that the negative attitude of the teachers' unions will not lead to a Government retreat on the initiative?

Ruth Kelly: I can certainly give the hon. Gentleman that assurance. We are completely committed to our goal of establishing 200 academies, and we are moving faster than we would have anticipated at this stage, with more than 100 already up and running or in the pipeline. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the evidence, he will see that the staff who work in the academies are completely convinced of the difference that they are making to the achievements of young people, and that the sponsors of the academies are contributing to educational attainment. About 84 per cent. of the teaching staff in those schools say that the sponsor has made a positive difference to the values, the ethos and the achievement of the young people in them. I can give the hon. Gentleman a definite assurance on that.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): If the full programme of 200 academies is implemented, will they all be built on the basis of £20 million coming from the state and £2 million coming from the sponsor, or are other funding models being considered?

Ruth Kelly: Of course, all these questions are kept under review. At the moment, we have a system in which 10 per cent. or thereabouts of the capital cost of an academy is contributed by a sponsor. However, the important aspect of the academies project is not the financial contribution of the sponsor. It is the time, the energy and the commitment that the sponsor gives to the project that can make such a big difference. Indeed, in taking the trust school programme forward, we are trying to bring the commitment of other external partners to the education of state school pupils in the most disadvantaged schools in our inner cities and most deprived areas, so that they can benefit from that commitment too.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that creation as an alternative to evolution should be taught in academy schools if the sponsors so wish?

Ruth Kelly: I do not, and there is no evidence whatever that that is happening. That allegation is most frequently made against the Emmanuel schools run by Sir Peter Vardy. Ofsted has inspected those schools on numerous occasions and one of them was yesterday given its third outstanding report. Ofsted has looked specifically at their science curriculum and at whether creationism was being taught in those schools, and it has concluded that it is not.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that an early stage in the development of an academy is the feasibility study? What exactly does such a study involve? Does it, for example, involve an investigation of the individuals who put up the £2 million?

Ruth Kelly: Of course due diligence requirements are carried out on potential sponsors, and there is a rigorous method of ensuring that they fulfil those requirements. There are also due diligence requirements and extra safeguards in relation to trust backers.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): May I assure the Secretary of State that whatever hostility to academies there might be on her side of the House, we strongly support them? One of the many freedoms that academies enjoy is the freedom to employ their own staff. To do that, however, they depend on the Government to give them full information about the staff that they wish to employ. Among the 1,000 foreign convicted criminals released by the Home Office, there were drug dealers, violent offenders and 21 sex offenders, some of whom had been accused of offences against children. Can the Secretary of State assure the academies and all parents that any offenders who should have been placed on list 99 and on the register of sex offenders—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is totally and utterly out of order—[Interruption.] Order. It is not a rule of the House that Front Benchers are called to speak. It is a privilege that the Speaker gives to them, and they should not abuse that privilege. I call Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods.

Free Tuition

6. Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the introduction of free tuition for a first level 3 qualification. [66209]

The Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning (Bill Rammell): There will be a new entitlement to free learning for level 3 qualifications for those aged 19 to 25, supported by an expanded adult learning grant. The 19–25 entitlement and national rollout of the adult learning grant will both be implemented from 2007–08.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: Does my hon. Friend agree that the entitlement to a level 3 qualification and the extension of the adult learning grant are very important to young adults in constituencies such as mine, where post-16 staying-on rates historically have been very low? Will he tell the House what his Department will do to let young adults in my constituency and elsewhere know about these new entitlements?

Bill Rammell: One of the biggest challenges that we face is the low level of participation at age 16 in this country. Historically, young people, particularly those from more disadvantaged backgrounds, have hit a brick wall in terms of their entitlement to free education to level 3 at age 19. This provision will really help. We are reviewing the information, advice and guidance service to ensure that we effectively get across the new entitlement to as many young people as possible.

Sixth-form Colleges

7. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): If she will encourage the establishment of more sixth-form colleges; and if she will make a statement. [66210]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): Yes, the recent further education White Paper, "Raising Skills, Improving Life Chances" reaffirmed our commitment to a strong and growing sixth-form college sector. The White Paper announced that new sixth-form colleges should be considered an option where new 16 to 19 provision is needed locally, including where there is a 16 to 19 competition, and a presumption in favour of proposals from successful colleges wishing to expand to deliver new specialised diplomas. We expect to issue guidance on that in the coming months.

Kelvin Hopkins: I thank my hon. Friend for her answer. She will recall from a parliamentary answer given to me earlier this year that a direct and strong correlation exists between sixth-form size and exam success. Sixth-form colleges, such as that in my constituency, perform superbly well. It is argued that had sixth-form colleges been left with local education authorities, another 100 or more would have been created. Will she intervene directly to ensure that many more sixth-form colleges are created to the benefit of thousands of students every year?

Maria Eagle: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the great interest that he takes in this matter. He is a governor of one of his successful local sixth-form colleges, and has always pursued assiduously the interests of sixth-form colleges, which can bring diversity to the local provision of education for this age group. He can be assured that we want to support sixth-form colleges and their expansion where they are successful as part of a local mix of provision that allows children to go where they will do best, whether that is to local schools, sixth forms or colleges.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Is not the Minister aware that where there are sixth-form colleges alongside selective and other schools with sixth forms, the difference in funding given by the state to sixth-form colleges, such as that in Colchester, is disproportionate? No group of schools with sixth forms will voluntarily give up their sixth forms to create a sixth-form college unless the local education authority oversees it.

Maria Eagle: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that we are closing the funding gap to which he refers, so proper choice and appropriate diversity should be much more available to suit the local area. I hope that he can support that.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): As the road has been taken once before of trying to impose sixth forms on Staffordshire schools, may I warn my hon. Friend about the flak that she will take? If we are to encourage schools to come together and youngsters to make the choice that suits their needs better, that is fine, but we should not send out the signal that we will take such a valuable asset—the sixth form—from secondary schools.

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend can be assured that we are not saying to any school that they should or should not have a sixth form. The appropriate mix for local children and young people to do best, and to improve the strength and capacity of the local education system to provide vocational courses for young people, is what we aim to strengthen. That is a matter for local people. We are seeking not to impose or to tell schools or colleges how they should do that locally but to support their choices.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): In all the briefings that I have had from Dr. Paul Rispoli, the excellent principal of the successful Reigate college, the issue of differential funding has recurred constantly. I note that the Education and Skills Committee says that "it makes no sense that a student undertaking a course at a Further Education college should, other things being equal, be less well funded than a student taking the same course at a local school."

Is the Minister saying that from now on courses will be equally funded and that her promotion of sixth-form options at schools will not be at the expense of colleges, because such schools will be better funded than colleges?

Maria Eagle: As I said to the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell), we are closing the funding gap referred to by the college principal by some eight percentage points over the next two years. We are trying to ensure that proper choice is available locally to young people and other learners to learn in the environment that they consider suits them best, vocationally and academically. I hope that both the hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) and his college principal feel able to support that.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): As an alternative to the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins), in suitable cases may I commend Stafford's collegiate approach? All secondary schools, one sixth-form centre and one further education college have pooled their resources to offer the widest possible choice of courses to sixth-form students. Is that not a good way of improving the educational offer to all sixth-form students?

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend has given a good local example of best practice. My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) could have done the same had he chosen to ask a question about Campus Luton. It is right for areas to be able to organise local provision in the best possible way for them and their young people, and that is what these changes, and the extra support for FE and sixth-form colleges, are designed to achieve.

GCSE (Science)

8. Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): If she will make a statement on changes to the science GCSE. [66211]

The Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning (Bill Rammell): We are improving the science GCSE by making the school science curriculum more engaging, catering for a wide range of students' interests and aptitudes, and still maintaining the breadth, depth and challenge of the current curriculum. We are also introducing a new statutory entitlement to study science programmes leading to at least two GCSEs.

Mrs. Dorries: Countries such as China are making massive economic advances in subjects such as science and technology. Why does the Minister think it appropriate, in the face of such global economic competition, to dilute the standard of science that is taught in our schools and to close Nobel prize-winning science departments in our universities?

Bill Rammell: I assume that the hon. Lady is referring to the proposals for Sussex university that are currently being considered. Universities are autonomous—that is one of the strengths of our university system—but even if the Sussex proposals go ahead, the places will be picked up by neighbouring universities. Whatever is happening in one institution should not dilute the fact that in the current academic year we have seen a 12 per cent. increase in the number of students applying to study chemistry, and will see a further 5 per cent. increase next year. I believe that developments are moving firmly in the right direction.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): In 1997, the state of the science laboratories in many of our schools was absolutely terrible. The Government invested a considerable amount in improving those facilities, but may I suggest that we need to go further?

Bill Rammell: We are committed to going further, as my hon. Friend will see if he looks at our projections for the future. In the coming financial year we are investing some £6 billion in the capital investment infrastructure in our schools, which is 10 times the sum that was invested in 1997.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): At our last Education Question Time, the Minister for Schools said that in future all pupils would be entitled to study two sciences at GCSE level. We welcomed the Chancellor's Budget announcement that in future all pupils who achieved level 6 in science at key stage 3 would be entitled to study the three separate sciences at GCSE. Currently, 480,000 students take the double-award GCSE, compared with just 43,000 who take GCSEs in the three separate sciences. Does the Minister agree that all pupils should be given the opportunity to study the three separate sciences? What action will he take to encourage all schools to make them available to all pupils?

Bill Rammell: First, our proposal for reform of the science GCSE programme will help to ensure that there is progression to higher levels in science learning. Secondly, we propose to establish co-operation between schools, colleges and universities by 2008, so that every child who wishes to choose triple science will be able to do so. I consider that to be a significant advance.

Non-Vocational Education

9. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): What assessment she has made of the value of non-vocational adult education. [66212]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): We believe that non-vocational adult learning increases motivation to learn and self-confidence and improves family and community relationships. It also brings wider benefits such as improved health, greater tolerance and reduced crime. That is why the Government have committed some £210 million to personal and community development learning in 2006–07 and 2007–08.

Dr. Cable: Do Ministers have memories? Do they not remember that 15 years ago they campaigned alongside women's institutes against what they described as the mindless philistinism of the then Conservative Government, who sought to introduce the policy that this Government have now adopted: channelling resources much more into narrow vocational skills—which employers are often happy to pay for themselves—and away from the popular, broad-based non-vocational courses greatly favoured by many people, particularly older adult learners?

Phil Hope: Yes, I do remember the philistinism of the Conservatives when they were in power; I was a county councillor at the time and I had to deal with some of the implications of the appalling cuts that they inflicted on our education system. Broadly speaking, we are focusing our adult learning priorities on level 2 qualifications—for which, as we heard earlier, there is a great need in this country—skills for life, and 16 to 18-year-olds. That is not to say, however, that we are not investing in adult learning. In 1996 some 78,000 older learners were taking adult learning classes; by 2005 that figure had doubled to approximately 147,000, so there has been an increase. If people, including the Liberal Democrats, value short courses in stand-up comedy—they are available—and tarot card reading, they should be able to do them. However, we might expect them to make a little more of a contribution to the cost of such courses.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): I was pleased to be invited a few weeks ago to the 10th anniversary of the university of the Third Age in Buxton—a magnificent organisation that is doing very well indeed, and which, of course, is not dependent on Learning and Skills Council funding. Although I do not oppose the principle of refocusing such funding—my hon. Friend has talked about that—the speed of change during the transition period is causing real problems for some organisations other than the U3A that are providing adult non-vocational education. Will my hon. Friend look again at the speed of the transition period?

Phil Hope: Yes. I should reaffirm that the £210 million personal and community development learning budget has been ring-fenced for the next two years to ensure that we protect family and neighbourhood learning, for example. On the wider roll-out of our priorities, we see evidence of colleges—City college Brighton and Hove is an example—that are able to increase both fees and participation rates. We are asking colleges about this issue and we signalled the direction of travel in successive White Papers, including the recently published further education White Paper on raising skills and improving life chances. I expect local colleges to take the opportunity provided by the roll-out of the train to gain programme, in particular, to increase fees and participation rates, and start providing much better delivery of the skills training that our employers require.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): The Government's policy of focusing further education funding on skills for life and level 2 qualifications has meant that courses in FE colleges suitable for adults with severe learning disabilities, which are often non-vocational, are being cut, because they do not neatly tick the boxes for the Government's national priorities. I recently met a group of young men with learning difficulties who attend many different colleges, including those in Reading, Newbury and Alton. This year, all their courses have been cut. Does the Minister feel that it is right to take away these men's opportunities for more independent living—and perhaps even employment—or will he join me in looking for ways to change what he will doubtless agree is an unintended consequence of the current policy?

Phil Hope: It is not an unintended consequence of Government policy—nor, indeed, an intended one—to cut such training and courses for the client group to which the hon. Lady referred. Adults with learning difficulties and disabilities are a priority for the Government, as we have made clear to the Learning and Skills Council. Indeed, we spent £1.5 billion in 2004–05 on meeting the needs of some 641,000 learners with learning difficulties and disabilities. This issue is a priority for the Government and will remain so.

Classroom Assistants

10. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): How many classroom assistants have been recruited by primary schools in (a) England and (b) Leicestershire since 2001; and if she will make a statement. [66213]

The Minister for Children and Families (Beverley Hughes): In January 2001 there were 65,500 teaching assistants—that includes classroom assistants—employed in maintained nursery and primary schools in England. The number had increased to 97,900 as at January 2005. The equivalent figures for Leicestershire were 600 in 2001 and 1,200 in 2005. Figures released today show a further increase in the number of teaching assistants in the maintained school sector in England, with numbers rising to 152,800 in 2006.

David Taylor: I am grateful for that answer, which illustrates the success of the initiative in helping to drive up standards in primary schools across the land. There is, however, a continuing problem in the deployment of classroom assistants, which other hon. Members may have encountered. Can the Minister tell the House what changes are planned to harmonise the employment conditions of those often low-paid staff, who are of course predominantly female?

Beverley Hughes: Yes, I can. The pay and conditions of support staff are determined at local level so that they can fit local circumstances. First, many local authorities are reviewing the pay of, and undertaking job evaluations for, support staff in the light of the single status agreement. Secondly, the Government are working directly with social partners to determine how best to ensure fair play and rewards for staff. Thirdly, we have also extended the remit of the Training and Development Agency for Schools to encompass some of the issues around career pathways and career escalators. Finally, we have developed new vocational qualifications and opportunities for support staff to improve their qualifications and their career development while they are employed.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): The increase in the number of classroom assistants in England is reflected in Worcestershire. What evidence does the Department have of the impact of those greater numbers of classroom assistants?

Beverley Hughes: As I just said, decisions about employing classroom assistants and the way in which they are deployed are matters for local determination, but we are receiving increasing evidence from schools and local authorities that this is an important source of support for teachers, not least as we move towards personalised learning, which schools will have to adopt if they are to maximise the attainment of all children and, in particular, reduce inequalities for low achievers. However, as I have just said, the Training and Development Agency for Schools now has an extended remit and is beginning to undertake a much more systematic survey of evidence on the impact that classroom assistants have on the important agenda of children's levels of attainment.

Students (Career Choices)

11. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What steps she is taking to enable students in higher education better to match their aspirations and future employment prospects in chosen careers; and if she will make a statement. [66214]

The Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning (Bill Rammell): Graduates' contribution to our economic growth is greatly valued and there is significant alignment of needs, with evidence of low unemployment rates and high utilisation of university-acquired skills. A key driver of Government policy at all levels is a better fit for the education provided with the skills needs and career opportunities in the economy.

Michael Fabricant: In a debate last week on the Science and Technology Committee report, we learned that there are some 50 courses on forensic science and some 350 different course combinations. Those include courses such as forensics and music, forensics and drama, and forensics and a foreign language, but apparently those courses do not provide the sort of qualification needed to have a career in forensics. Similarly, a degree in media studies is less likely than a degree in chemistry or history to get someone a job in the BBC. How can we better meet the aspirations of people studying for degrees in achieving the careers that they want?

Bill Rammell: That is the old chestnut about media studies again. In terms of employability, media studies has one of the best track records for degree qualifications. The hon. Gentleman's point about forensic science is an important one, and we need to ensure that students are aware of which qualification will lead to which particular career opportunity. However, I am heartened and encouraged by the fact that applications for the STEM subjects—science, technology, engineering and maths—have increased in the past year. I refer to the significant increase in chemistry applications mentioned in answer to a previous question.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): Yorkshire Forward is investing a large amount of money in universities and technical textiles, but one of the problems in trying to advance an important industry for our area is that some schools have not really geared up for the new industries of the future. What can be done to co-ordinate work in schools so that they are properly skilled to take advantage of the work being done in universities?

Bill Rammell: The most significant thing is the development of the 14-to-19 agenda and the diplomas that will directly attempt to ensure that we are capturing at the age of 14 young people who may be switched off and lost from the academic route, so that they have a decent, high-quality, high-standard vocational route to lead them not only to a particular career choice but also, ultimately, to university too, if that is their choice.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Walford and North Shropshire college delivers 500 courses to 8,500 adults at 150 venues. Those courses are of extraordinary value. People do not only learn skills; if they cannot read, that is picked up and they are brought into the world of reading. I wrote to the Minister after I posed a question at Education and Skills questions last November. He replied, but he did not answer the question. The White Paper wants museums and other institutions to deliver such courses, which is wholly inappropriate in a rural area such as Shropshire. I wrote to the Secretary of State on 5 January and again on 23 February. May I bring Mr. Pugh to visit the Minister and educate him on the realities of education in a rural area?

Bill Rammell: I will happily respond to the hon. Gentleman, and I shall be happy to meet his constituent, but I think that the hon. Gentleman is genuinely misinformed, as the types of qualification that he has just outlined fit absolutely into the skills for life requirement, which is a fundamental priority in the funding system.

National College for School Leadership

14. Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): What assessment she has made of the contribution of the National College for School Leadership to improving professional development of head teachers. [66217]

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): The National College for School Leadership has a pivotal role to play in equipping our school leaders with the skills and support that they need to achieve our ambition of having a world-class education system. We have agreed a balanced scorecard with the college, which sets out clear criteria against which its success will be measured. I have termly meetings with the chair and chief executive of the college to review progress.

Mr. McFadden: Does the Minister agree that strong leadership in schools is vital in raising standards and, most importantly, in raising aspirations, so does she welcome the fact that 14,000 candidates have completed the headship qualification since 2001? Will she ensure that the structural changes implemented through the Education and Inspections Bill are equally matched by a departmental focus on the importance of school leadership?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend rightly draws attention to the 14,000 heads and prospective heads who have been able to achieve that qualification through the National College for School Leadership. He is absolutely right that school leadership is fundamental, which is why I am so pleased about Ofsted's recent finding that 75 per cent. of leadership and management is good or better, and that the current generation of school leaders is the best ever. He is right to say that the provisions in the Education and Inspections Bill, especially the opportunity for schools to bring in external partners to help to develop governance and leadership, are an important step forward. I can give him an assurance that the Government will continue to support school leaders, not least through the National College for School Leadership—which, of course, Opposition Members would have abolished had they won the general election.

Classroom Discipline

15. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): If she will make a statement on current standards of classroom discipline. [66219]

The Minister for Schools (Jacqui Smith): Most pupils behave well most of the time, and Ofsted reports that behaviour is at least satisfactory at more than 99 per cent. of primary and 93 per cent. of secondary schools. But any level of misbehaviour is too high, which is why we are implementing a wide-ranging programme to help schools raise standards of behaviour further, including high-quality training materials for staff, extra resources for schools facing the greatest challenges and, in the Education and Inspections Bill, legislation to confirm the power of staff to discipline pupils.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am grateful to the Minister for that full and encouraging reply, but does she watch the programme, "That'll Teach 'Em", which is currently showing on Channel 4? I believe, and certainly many of those who have spoken to me believe, that it provides all the evidence that anyone, even the so-called education experts, can ever want to prove that strict classroom discipline creates the very best, excellent learning environment to which pupils are fully responding. Will she continue to emphasise the importance of discipline, which is good for education and will lead to improved qualifications to enable people to do well in later life?

Jacqui Smith: Unfortunately, I have not had the opportunity to watch the programme to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but I completely agree with him. I think that firm classroom discipline is at the heart of children being able to achieve their potential and learn in our schools. That is why the Steer report—produced by a group that we brought together under the leadership of a very experienced and excellent head teacher—demonstrated that good teaching and learning and good discipline are fundamentally linked. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right, and that is the direction in which all our moves on both behaviour and improving the quality of teaching are going.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

The Solicitor-General was asked—

Rape

19. John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): What discussions he has had with the Director of Public Prosecutions on a review of sentences for those found guilty of rape. [66195]

The Solicitor-General (Mr. Mike O'Brien): May I first welcome you back to your place, Mr. Speaker? This is the first opportunity that I have had to do so since you returned after Easter.

I have discussed with the Director of Public Prosecutions a range of issues, including the prosecution of rape, but not specifically as yet the sentences for rape or a review of them.

John Robertson: Rape is one of the most heinous crimes; many young women cannot suffer the results of rape and, sadly, take their own lives. Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that cautioning is not an appropriate sentence in rape cases? Can he give an example of such cases where a caution has been given? Will he reassess the sentences applied at present—such as cautioning, which in many instances does not fit the crime—with a view to reviewing the minimum sentences given, so that those involved in such rape cases can feel that justice has been done?

The Solicitor-General: A caution is certainly not an appropriate disposal for most rape cases. The proper sentence is a substantial term of imprisonment. Indeed, the average term of imprisonment in rape cases is seven and a half years. The use of a caution is rare and very exceptional. I have asked for some examples of where it has been used and have been given the following examples. A man had been secretly tape-recorded claiming to have raped his sister some years earlier and his sister denied it; a 14-year-old with learning difficulties was alleged to have had sex with a boy and the victim did not want to go to court; a 12-year-old boy encouraged a younger boy to give him oral sex while playing a game of truth or dare with a wider group of boys present; and one offender was a 17-year-old with a mental age of nine. Those are indeed rare and very exceptional cases. A caution can appear on a criminal record in certain cases, and a person may be put on the sex offenders register. However, in most rape cases a prison sentence is the appropriate disposal.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): On the issue of those found guilty of rape, how many foreign nationals released from our prisons who have not been deported were serving sentences for rape?

The Solicitor-General: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has already made a statement on those issues, as the hon. Gentleman is well aware, and the Home Office is looking at all those cases to ensure that the public are better protected.

20. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): What discussions he has had with the Crown Prosecution Service on increasing the number of successful prosecutions for rape. [66196]

The Solicitor-General: Following work with the Crown Prosecution Service, I issued on 29 March a consultation paper entitled "Convicting Rapists and Protecting Victims", which sets out four proposals that aim to deliver more successful prosecutions by further strengthening the legal framework and improving our care for the victims of rape.

Julie Morgan: I thank my hon. and learned Friend for that response. Is he aware of the Amnesty International survey carried out last year? It showed that a third of people think that if a woman flirts, she has only herself to blame is she is raped, and that a quarter of people believe that the woman is partly to blame if she is wearing revealing clothes or if she is drunk. What is he going to do to change those attitudes—which will be reflected in juries, for example—and raise the dismally low conviction rate of 6 per cent. for reported rapes?

The Solicitor-General: I have indeed seen the Amnesty survey, and it makes disturbing reading. There is a Home Office campaign that seeks to challenge those attitudes. In particular, it highlights the potential penalties and people's absolute right to say no to sex. The proposals that I am currently consulting on will reduce the barriers to prosecution and improve the care of victims. They seek to strengthen the law on consent, enable expert evidence to be called, bring first reports of rape before a jury and allow the greater use of videoed evidence by victims. Securing convictions in rape cases is always difficult, but these proposals will assist the prosecution and, indeed, victims.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I welcome steps to increase the number of successful prosecutions, but do we not need to ensure that sentencing properly reflects the gravity of the crime? The recent abduction and murder of Attracta Harron was a terrible case that has shocked the entire community in Northern Ireland. The Belfast Telegraph has launched a major campaign to ensure that serious sex offenders serve their full sentences in such cases. The perpetrator of that crime struck against Attracta Harron after being released early after a horrific rape. Will the Solicitor-General ensure that this matter is taken very seriously?

The Solicitor-General: I am aware of the case to which the hon. Gentleman refers, and it is indeed a very serious, difficult and regrettable one. It is a fact that the average sentence for rape convictions is seven and a half years' imprisonment. Many offenders receive substantially more than that for the most serious offences. It is important that we get the balance right in dealing with these cases and ensure that people who are a danger to the public are properly dealt with. I know that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is now ensuring that a proper risk assessment is carried out of persons who have committed offences so that we can assess the risk to the public over the long term and deal with it appropriately.

Bona Vacantia

21. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): How many payments were made to individuals out of money received by the Government by way of bona vacantia in the financial year 2004–05. [66197]

The Solicitor-General: There were 488 payments to individuals out of money received by way of bona vacantia in 2004–05.

Mr. Kidney: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that when the provision affects the property of individuals or limited companies, it applies like a tax at a rate of 100 per cent.? If individuals are affected adversely by its application—no doubt like those involved with the 488 payments he mentions—they have to beg a faceless official to give them relief. They rely on the official's discretion to get that relief. Is not the obscurity and opacity of the whole system summed up by the fact that the Latin name is still being used today? Would he like to be the Minister who modernises the system and makes it fair and predictable?

The Solicitor-General: Although the Treasury Solicitors administer bona vacantia, the policy in relation to it is a matter for the Department for Constitutional Affairs. The current arrangements for making discretionary payments are flexible and, by and large, seem to work relatively well. They were recently revised and updated, and are kept under constant review to make sure that they reflect changes in society and enable people to get what they are entitled to more easily. Of the 488 cases, 238 involved people claiming estates to which they were legally entitled, after the Treasury Solicitor had administered them. The decisions were not entirely discretionary. The rules are rather old, but by and large they work because they have been updated over time.

Extradition (United States)

22. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): How many extradition requests by the UK have been outstanding with the US authorities for in excess of (a) 10, (b) five and (c) two years; and if he will make a statement. [66198]

The Solicitor-General: I am told that there are currently no extradition requests from the UK before the American courts that have been outstanding for more than two years, but there are some requests for individuals who are on the run when it has not been possible to make an arrest, or for individuals who are serving in US prisons.

Andrew Mackinlay: That is good news, but will the Solicitor-General tell us whether there is parity of treatment between the United Kingdom and the United States? We still have a one-sided extradition treaty. Will he use this occasion to assure the House that Her Majesty's Government are saying to the United States authorities and Senate that there must be reciprocal arrangements? If our authorities and his office are to pursue the extraditions that they want, there must be appropriate and comparable reciprocity.

The Solicitor-General: On comparable arrangements, requests to the United States take an average of approximately five months to conclude and those to the UK take about seven months, so we take slightly longer. The standard for extradition in the United States under the Bill of Rights is one probable cause; that is part of the constitution, so we have to respect it. We think that our standard of requesting information is appropriate. The systems are slightly different, but very similar. There was an unfairness before 2003 in that the UK required a prima facie case, which was a much higher standard, but we have rebalanced the situation and it is much fairer than it ever was. We want the ratification of the 2003 extradition treaty. The Home Secretary has recently raised that with the US Attorney-General, and we hope that the US Senate will advise on and consent to it as soon as possible.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): The Solicitor-General knows of the discontent about the arrangements between the States and the United Kingdom on extradition. Will he and the Attorney-General examine the whole range of treaties between us and other countries to ensure that equality, parity and reciprocity in extradition is the norm? As we review the functioning of the House of Lords, will he give serious consideration to whether decisions about treaties that the UK should enter into should be ones for Parliament, rather than the Executive or the Prime Minister?

The Solicitor-General: As for reciprocity, it is always difficult to balance the different ways in which decisions are made under different legal systems. The systems all have differing histories and statutory backgrounds. We need to ensure, as far as possible, that there is a level of reciprocity that is fair to those for whom we make applications and for whom applications are made to us. We have a well-established practice for dealing with treaties, which, in our view, broadly works fairly and well.

Business of the House

11.32 am

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): May I ask the Leader of the House to give us the business for the coming weeks?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The business for next week will be as follows:

TUESDAY 2 MAY—Consideration in Committee of the Finance (No. 2) Bill.

WEDNESDAY 3 MAY—Conclusion of consideration in Committee of the Finance (No. 2) Bill.

THURSDAY 4 MAY—A debate on the Government's strategy to improve the life chances of disabled people on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 5 MAY—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 8 MAY—Consideration of Lords amendments to the Civil Aviation Bill, followed by a motion to approve European documents relating to future European Union finances, followed by, if necessary, consideration of Lords amendments.

The House may also be asked to consider any Lords messages that may be received.

TUESDAY 9 MAY—Opposition day [15th allotted day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

WEDNESDAY 10 MAY—Remaining stages of the Police and Justice Bill, followed by a motion to establish a Joint Committee on Conventions of the House of Lords.

THURSDAY 11 MAY—Remaining stages of the Housing Corporation (Delegation) etc. Bill.

FRIDAY 12 MAY—Private Members' Bills.

Mrs. May: I am grateful to the Leader of the House for giving us the business for the next two weeks.

The past few days have indeed proved that a week is a long time in politics. Yesterday, the usually calm and cautious members of the Royal College of Nursing barracked and heckled the Health Secretary, raising their opposition to job cuts among nurses. When we have raised job cuts among nurses and doctors in the Chamber, the Leader of the House has consistently refused our calls for a statement by the Health Secretary or a debate on the NHS. Nurses are deeply concerned about patient care, so will the Leader of the House now ensure that there will be a debate in Government time on the state of the health service?

One of the reasons for problems in the health service is the sheer incompetence of the Government. They miscalculated the cost of the new GP, nurses and consultants contracts by more than £600 million. They miscalculated the savings from legal aid, which will lead to 1,000 job losses in the courts service. Failure in the operation of working families tax credit and the new Child Support Agency system have meant that thousands of families have been left in financial difficulty. As we now know, failure by the Home Office to deport more than 1,000 foreign criminals meant that they were let out on to our streets, free to thieve, murder and rape again. May we have a full debate, in Government time, on ministerial incompetence?

May we also have a statement from the Home Secretary on rising violent crime? Not all hon. Members will know that figures published by the Home Office today, which it claims show that crime was stable in the last three months of last year, show that over that period, sex offences were up, robberies were up, drug offences were up, and violent crime was up. Are those yet more problems that the Home Secretary thinks he should have more time to put right?

May we also have a debate on the use made by the Government of reports produced by Select Committees? In recent months, we have seen warnings about the Rural Payments Agency ignored, warnings about problems in the tax credit system ignored, and warnings about the release of foreign criminals ignored. But that was not the only warning that the Home Office received about foreign criminals. It ignored Her Majesty's inspectorate of prisons, the National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee.

On Tuesday, the Home Secretary said on "Newsnight" that "very, very few" foreign criminals had been released after he knew about the problem. The truth was that it was 288, and the rate of release went up after he was supposed to be getting a grip on the problem. Clearly, he is not in charge of his Department and attempts by some to place the blame on civil servants merely demean the Government.

Time after time Ministers have been found wanting, and time after time they have failed to pay the price. May we have a debate on ministerial accountability, which will give this House the opportunity to say to this Government, "Enough is enough"?

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. Lady has some interesting definitions of what she means by job cuts. [Interruption.] I know that it has become fashionable for Conservative Members to identify particular areas of the country where restructuring and modernisation have taken place, and then to extrapolate a general picture from those isolated examples. It is for them to check carefully exactly what they mean by job cuts, not least in relation to nurses. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Let us try to have an element of moderation. A chorus of sedentary comments is not helpful.

Mr. Hoon: The simple facts are that 85,000 more nurses are now working in the United Kingdom than there were in 1997; we now have 404,161 nurses at work; and we have 307,000 more staff in the national health service than we had in 1997, including 215,000 more front-line staff. On whatever definition anyone uses, those are not job cuts. They may be things that Conservative Members want to use in debate, but the plain fact of the matter is that more and more people are working in our national health service, and they are delivering more and more treatment, more and more operations, ever-better standards of health care and ever-lower waiting lists. Those are the facts.

[Mr. Hoon]

Perhaps the right hon. Lady has not had time to read the pages of The Times this morning, but she will see in it a letter in which it is said:

"The NHS will need to respond to the tide of rising expectations and need by improving efficiency and responsiveness. With the dedication and commitment of staff we believe that the NHS can continue its transformation and be a model for other countries."

That letter is signed by, among others, Beverly Malone, the general secretary of the Royal College of Nursing, and the chairman of the British Medical Association, together with representatives of unions and charities that work in the NHS. We are doing exactly what is set out by those people with real experience of a national health service.

On tax credits, nine out of 10 low-income families with children are claiming tax credits. Tax credits are transforming the life chances of the poorest people in our society, which the Conservative Government did not care about and did not concern themselves with. We saw an appalling level of family poverty and child poverty during that period. We have lifted 700,000 children out of poverty—a policy that the Conservative party has consistently opposed.

On foreign prisoners and deportation, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary set out the position in a written statement to the House, he made an oral statement in the House, and he made it clear yesterday that he would return to the House as necessary to ensure that that regrettable state of affairs is addressed—a state of affairs that the Government have addressed, and which had not previously been addressed by any other Government. That is a matter to which the right hon. Lady might give some consideration. No previous Home Secretary was in a position to provide the information because no previous Home Secretary had the records and information available to him. Again, the Conservatives ought to reflect on that before making such criticisms.

On crime, overall we have seen a significant reduction in key crime statistics over the longer term. The statistics from the British crime survey showed that in the 12 months to September 2005 overall crime was falling, the level of violent crime was relatively stable, all personal crime rates were relatively stable, but domestic burglary was down by 13 per cent. and vehicle thefts were down by 14 per cent. That is an improvement. It is not sufficient; we want still greater progress.

Again, that improvement is hardly helped by the Conservative party's consistent policy of opposing the very policies that we have proposed to make that happen, opposing greater numbers of police officers on the streets—[HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish."]—opposing greater support for those police officers. Opposition Members cry rubbish but the truth is that they have consistently opposed providing the resources to allow those changes to occur. They cannot consistently complain in the House when they have opposed the very resources that allowed those policies to be implemented.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The Conservative Government had their black Wednesday. Yesterday we had the triple whammy Wednesday for the present Government, and the Leader of the House has just displayed the complacency for which he is well known.

We need a debate on the health service. Last week the right hon. Gentleman said that there was a national debate that would go on for weeks and weeks. We saw that national debate exhibited at the conference of the Royal College of Nursing. It is insulting to those nurses to say that they do not understand what job cuts in the nursing service are, when it is they who are losing their jobs and they who work in the wards that are being closed. We need a debate on the health service.

On the Home Office, can the Leader of the House explain some simple procedure to me? In his oral statement yesterday, the Home Secretary said:

"I can confirm that consideration of the most serious cases has, of course, commenced and I will report further on progress by the end of this week."—[Official Report, 26 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 573.]

We are not sitting tomorrow. There has been no written statement today. I have had no indication of an oral statement later today. How will the Home Secretary report on the murderers, arsonists, rapists and drug dealers whom he has let out, while lecturing the rest of the country about law and order? When will we have that information?

Lastly, may we have a debate on ministerial responsibility, perhaps with reference to Sir Thomas Dugdale and the Crichel Down affair? Some of us do not believe that ministerial responsibility consists of lamely promising to put things right after the event, but rather taking responsibility for things that go wrong and accepting the consequences of failure.

Mr. Hoon: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman chose to describe my observations as "complacent". I realise that the Liberal Democrats do not like facts, and I have consistently set out the facts to the House on the health service and tackling crime. The Government have consistently not only set out clear policies, but made the resources available, but the Liberal Democrats cannot say with any conviction or confidence that they would have taken the same course. I am happy that there should be debates on the health service and am delighted that there should be debates on tackling crime, and hon. Members will have the opportunity to discuss those matters in due course. This Government are not afraid of debating and discussing the significant improvements that we have made in British society since 1997.

As far as ministerial responsibility and the Crichel Down case are concerned, the hon. Gentleman should listen to the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth), who is sitting behind him and who used to lecture on constitutional law at Cambridge university, because he will find that the situation on the Crichel Down case and ministerial responsibility is not quite how he represented it. I do not believe that there is any necessity for those matters to be debated on the Floor of this House. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary made it clear that he will keep the House informed of the facts as and when they are clearly established. Again, it is important that we all get our facts right, which is something that has escaped the Liberal Democrats in the past 24 hours.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): Will this House have an opportunity to look at the review of sentencing for domestic violence offenders? Many victims of domestic violence will have heard expressions of remorse 34 times before the offender is finally brought to some form of justice. Although it is important to make sure that offenders learn how to manage conflict without resorting to violence, is it not also important that the victims of domestic violence are sure that they will be taken seriously when they report such crimes and that their families will be safe from any further violence in the future?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has raised an important issue. The Government are committed to tackling domestic violence in all its forms, and we have passed legislation to that end. One reason why legislation has been introduced is to ensure an improvement in reporting rates. The Sentencing Guidelines Council is an independent body and it is important for hon. Members—including, I hope, my hon. Friend—who take an interest in that matter to assist in its work by contributing to the consultation on guidelines for sentencing in relation to domestic violence offences. The deadline for contributions is 12 June, and I urge my hon. Friend and other hon. Members to contribute to the debate.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): During the Home Secretary's all-too-brief statement yesterday, he promised to keep the House informed, by the end of this week, about developments on where those foreign murderers, rapists and paedophiles have gone. Since then, it has come to light that there are far more foreign prisoners in our jails than was previously realised. Will the Leader of the House guarantee that the Home Secretary, or probably his successor, will come to the Dispatch Box on Tuesday, when the House returns, and make a further statement?

Mr. Hoon: As I have said, as and when the facts are clearly established, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will report to the House.

Mr. Mackay: The Home Secretary said that he would do so by the end of this week.

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. Gentleman is asking whether that means by the end of this week.

Mr. Mackay: That is when the Home Secretary said that he would report to the House.

Mr. Hoon: That is what my right hon. Friend said, and it is important that he should see it through. I am sure that Opposition Members who have a genuine interest in the facts of the case recognise that it is important that a Minister who comes to the Dispatch Box should have all the facts in order to inform the House. That is my right hon. Friend's position, which is right and which he has made clear to this House.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): As the Leader of the House will know, the Home Secretary has announced that there will be a cap on compensation for miscarriages of justice. He will also know that I have introduced a Bill to amend section 133(4) of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 to give persons who have suffered a miscarriage of justice the opportunity to appeal against the decision of the assessor. Does he agree that as we are to have a cap, it is important that there should be that right of appeal once an assessment is made? May we have a debate on that important matter?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend raises an important issue. Let me emphasise that a process of judicial review is already available to those who are dissatisfied with the level of compensation. I anticipate that that is an appropriate way of dealing with any challenge to the level of compensation, and I would urge him to consider it as an appropriate way forward.

Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): Will the Leader of the House find time to debate attempts by Liberal Democrat councillors in Wokingham to exclude children from Reading from schools in their district, despite the fact that Bulmershe, Maiden Erlegh and Ryeish Green schools have catchment areas that are well across the borough boundaries? Does he agree that Lib Dem councillors who are saying, "Wokingham schools for Wokingham children", are in clear breach of the Greenwich judgment, which has served us well for many years?

Mr. Hoon: I am certainly familiar with the Greenwich judgment, and it is important that it is followed by councillors all over the country. I cannot guarantee my hon. Friend a debate sooner than a week today, which I anticipate was in his mind. Nevertheless, it is important that all councils should respect the important decisions of the law in this regard.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): May we please have a debate on the Floor of the House, in Government time, on the egregious abuse of human rights in Burma? In a week when Charm Tong, a courageous 24-year-old who is the founder of the Shan women's action network, is in the United Kingdom to highlight the use of rape as a weapon of war in her country, is it not time that we had the first ever statement or debate on the Floor of the House about the action that the Government will take in international forums to force the Government of Burma to stop killing, maiming and torturing its citizens and to start respecting and honouring them?

Mr. Hoon: We had Foreign Office questions only this week, and I am sure that had the hon. Gentleman been able to raise that issue he would have done so with equal clarity. I cannot promise him an early debate, but I can say that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary keeps the very disturbing situation in Burma under constant review. It is an important subject for the Foreign Office, and the British Government use their influence to try to improve what is, as I say, a very disturbing situation.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): May I put it to the Leader of the House that we really should have a debate on ministerial responsibility? He will know that in the past six weeks there have been dramatic examples of culpable ministerial negligence. There is the failure of the Rural Payments Agency, for which Lord Bach and the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs are personally responsible; and then there are the mistakes and errors of the Home Secretary. All three say that they take responsibility, but there is no accountability unless there is resignation. This House demands the resignation of those three Ministers.

Mr. Hoon: I am puzzled by the right hon. and learned Gentleman's view of proper process. He appears to assume that Ministers are guilty before charge, never mind after charge having followed a process. In the light of his comments, I cannot quite see the purpose of a debate.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): Will the Leader of the House arrange for an urgent debate on the Floor of the House on the future of the Post Office card? He will be aware of early-day motion 1531, which has 314 signatures from Members across Parliament.

[That this House is gravely concerned by the Department of Work and Pensions' (DWP) decision to withdraw support for the Post Office Card Account when the existing contract expires in 2010 and in particular by the Department's attempt to kill off the Account in advance of 2010, through pilot schemes being introduced immediately when it will deny to new benefit claimants the option of opening a Post Office Card Account, inform 35,000 existing customers that they will have to use a bank or building society instead of the Post Office Card Account and require them to provide their account details, and pay benefits of 2,500 existing customers into a bank account rather than the Post Office Card Account, ignoring the preferences they made when their benefit books were stopped; condemns the fact in that, breach of all plans, these pilot schemes are being introduced without consultation; and calls on the Government to halt these pilot schemes immediately and to institute an immediate review of the DWP's proposal to abolish the Post Office Card Account by 2010.]

This is an important issue at the grass roots of this country, and people are very concerned. Will he speak to the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department for Work and Pensions, which are dealing with it? There is no joined-up thinking, and it is important that we should have a debate here as soon as possible.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is not the first Member to raise that issue at business questions. Let me repeat what I have said before—it has always been the Government's ambition to ensure that the Post Office card continues for as long as necessary to allow those who use it, and do so successfully, to be able to transfer from that scheme to an arrangement whereby they can continue to receive benefits through the Post Office service. That means that the post office network is in no way threatened by the change, but ensures that people get a better standard of service, as well as returns on their savings such as interest that can be paid through other accounts. The Government entirely share my hon. Friend's concern about the future of the post office network, which is important to us and to its many users around the country. However, I urge her to look carefully at the way in which we propose to deal with the card and the alternatives available for people thereafter.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): Perhaps I should first put on the record that I never lectured in constitutional law, but I did lecture in employment law, which might be more relevant to the fate of the Ministers concerned. [Laughter.]

May we have a debate on nuclear waste? The Committee on Radioactive Waste Management is reporting today, but its remit covered only waste from existing nuclear power stations, not waste from future-build nuclear power stations, which according to the Environmental Audit Committee will produce 400 per cent. more high-level waste than previous nuclear power stations. The Committee is anxious that its report is not misrepresented as solving the nuclear waste problem for the future. I am sure that a debate would help to clarify that.

Mr. Hoon: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman for—

John Bercow: Misrepresenting him.

Mr. Hoon: I was going to say extending the range of his competencies. As an employment lawyer, he will clearly be familiar with such matters, so I will avoid misdescribing his abilities in future.

On waste disposal and nuclear power, the hon. Gentleman will be well aware that the Government have undertaken an extensive review of this country's energy requirements and the ways in which we might fulfil them. That consultation period concluded on 14 April. The Government are considering those representations carefully, and will of course inform the House of their conclusions in due course.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that there is a good deal of concern, certainly on Labour Benches, about the Government reverting to the pre-1997 practice whereby Parliament is virtually shut down for nearly three months? While it is true that constituency and casework is undertaken, at least by most of us, we are not allowed to do our main job. Does any Parliament in a democracy shut down for such a long period; and what justification can there be for reverting to the old practices?

Mr. Hoon: This Parliament probably sits for more weeks in the year than almost any other that I am familiar with. That is the short answer to my hon. Friend's question. For those who want to spend still more time here, I recognise, as I have told the House before, that it is important to consider ways of improving the arrangements during the summer recess, not least to try to bring Members back to the House as early as possible. One of the practical problems has been the timing and organisation of party conferences. I have discussed with each of the main political parties the possibility of bringing those forward to allow the House to sit promptly thereafter, and I hope that they will consider that carefully.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): Is the Leader of the House aware that, sadly, Hertfordshire fire and rescue services are about to hold a strike? There is a dispute between the excellent firefighters in Hertfordshire and their employers. The chief fire officer naturally asked the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister that military cover be supplied should the strike go ahead. A Minister told me yesterday that it had been refused. No request went to the Ministry of Defence for military cover—81 military people were required. It would be the first time in this country that no military cover was provided in the event of a firefighters' strike. That would put my constituents' lives at risk. Will a Minister come to the House to explain why the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister did not request the firefighters that we need?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman speaks from considerable knowledge and experience. Without going into detail about the specific dispute, I hope that he will use his good offices to find ways to avoid the strike. No benefit can follow to any part of our society from it, and I hope that he will join me in urging those who call for such a strike to call it off.

Anne Moffat (East Lothian) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend mark and celebrate with a debate nurses day, which is on 12 May this year? I do not believe that all nurses would want to associate themselves with the behaviour of the Royal College of Nursing at its conference yesterday. When a woman stands in front of a bulk of women and is harangued in such a way, it does a disservice to nurses and women. I wish that the RCN had been as passionate in supporting low paid manual workers when the Conservative party decimated their jobs.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend speaks with a great deal of knowledge and experience of the nursing profession and I shall not try to match her expertise. As I have already said, the Government take seriously the tremendous contribution that nurses make. We have supported them by massively increasing the number of nurses in the national health service and substantially increasing their real income. A newly qualified nurse will now earn £19,166—a 25.6 per cent. real terms increase since 1997. We have backed our commitment to the NHS and nursing both in the rewards to individual nurses and in the number of nurses who currently practise.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Home Secretary to come to the House at an early opportunity to explain the policy behind the Identity Cards Act 2006? Last weekend, the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Leigh (Andy Burnham), said that identity cards would carry health information about individuals. Last October, the Home Secretary expressly said that they would not. Indeed, throughout our discussions on the measure, from after the general election to Royal Assent, the Government's case was that health information would not be carried on identity cards or on the national identity register. It appears that the Home Office is having a little local difficulty, and the Home Secretary needs to come here and sort himself out.

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has spent a great deal of time at the Dispatch Box in the most recent Session. When we consider the Bills that the Government plan to introduce, the Home Office is prominent in its contribution to legislation. We debated the important identity cards measure at great length on the Floor of the House and in Committee. I anticipate that the hon. and learned Gentleman will have an opportunity to raise further issues with my right hon. Friend at the next Home Office Question Time.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate on the assistance available to people who are made redundant? I previously raised with him the 700 workers at Outokumpu steel works in my constituency who were made redundant. As a result of his good offices and those of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, a rapid response programme was set up. However, contrary to the advice that officials are giving Ministers in the Department for Work and Pensions, the information that I receive from constituents and Gary Gordon, the Transport and General Workers union representative at Outokumpu, is that many people in genuine need are being refused assistance for retraining and, when assistance has been offered, the response is often far from rapid. Those matters are important and I hope that my right hon. Friend will arrange for early consideration of them.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has assiduously raised the interests of that specific group of workers and I recognise the concern that he properly expresses. I am disappointed to learn that the rapid response programme, which has generally been a successful Government initiative to assist those who face unemployment or redundancy, has not appeared to work as well as it should have done in the case that he raises. I shall ensure that the Department of Trade and Industry is made aware of that.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): May we have a debate soon, in Government time, on the state of the economy in Northern Ireland? Yesterday, the Prudential insurance company announced the closure of its Belfast call centre office as well as offices in Bristol and London, with a loss of 500 jobs, many of them to India. In 2002, Prudential signed an agreement with the union that stipulated that no compulsory redundancies would be made at the firm as a result of offshoring. That deal ran out in February and there are concerns that the company deliberately waited until now so that it would not be held to it. It is a serious matter for the many workers involved and I hope that the Leader of the House can draw it to the attention of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman is right to raise those important issues. No one underestimates the anxiety and the effect of such difficult decisions on those who are at risk of losing their jobs. I emphasise the point that I made to my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) that the Government have put in place a series of measures to assist those who are at risk of losing employment, not least because of the global effects of the modern economy. People have the prospect of better training, education and financial support than in the recent past. However, the most important alternative is other employment. Again, by and large, with the 2 million extra jobs created since 1997, most people who unfortunately lost work have found alternative employment quickly through the training and support packages that the Government make available.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend knows that when people lose their jobs in the private sector, and especially in manufacturing, it is hardly mentioned in the press and the Opposition do not raise an eyebrow. However, when a fraction of the jobs lost in manufacturing is lost in the public sector, it becomes a national crisis and Opposition Members get out of their prams. What opportunities exist for a collective whinge for those in the private sector who lose their jobs daily?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has made his point. I am still reeling from the idea of Opposition Members in their prams. It is important to give the necessary support to provide opportunities for retraining and education to secure the jobs that will be increasingly available in the 21st century. That is not to downplay the impact of redundancies and job losses on individuals and their families. However, it is important that we continue to modernise industry and our public services to ensure that they are fit for the 21st century.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): May we have an opportunity to amend the law on hosepipe bans so that those who are forbidden to use a hosepipe to water a small garden are not disadvantaged compared with those who want to use one to fill a large swimming pool, which is perfectly legal, and so that those who want to use a hosepipe to clean a small car are not disadvantaged when compared with those who wish to use one to clean a large commercial vehicle, which is also perfectly legal?

Mr. Hoon: My constituents have not so far experienced the difficulty of filling their swimming pools, so that has not been raised with me. I acknowledge that it may be a problem for a small minority. However, there should be fairness and consistency in the operation of rules—that was the substance of the hon. Gentleman's point—and I assure him that I will get the relevant Minister to write to him along those lines.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend will doubtless know that the Competition Commission has today confirmed that the home credit industry—the doorstep lenders—has been overcharging its customers by tens of millions of pounds, as many of us have said for some time. Will he join me in calling on doorstep lenders not to contest those findings and waste time on months of argument but to cut their charges now? If they do not, will he ask his colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry to use their powers under the Consumer Credit Act 1974 to introduce the necessary legislation to make them cut their charges now rather than years in the future?

Mr. Hoon: I have not seen the report that my hon. Friend mentions, but we all recognise the risks of making decisions on the doorstep about loans and borrowing. My hon. Friend makes a valuable point, and I assure him that it will be passed to the relevant Minister.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): The Leader of the House will know that it has been reported this morning that the Committee on Radioactive Waste Management is to recommend the deep storage of nuclear waste in as yet unspecified sites. CoRWM also said that it could take many decades to prepare the sites. This news will cause great anxiety in the communities in Scotland that featured on the last Nirex list. They opposed plans for waste dumps in the past and will continue to do so. Does this not underline the need for an urgent debate on the disposal of nuclear waste, and on the implications of the Government's inexplicable obsession with new nuclear power stations?

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman was not trying to alarm any of those communities by referring to them in the way that he just did. I urge him not to take such a course of action. It is important that we have a thorough review of energy requirements, as I said in answer to an earlier question. That necessarily involves consideration of the disposal and storage of nuclear waste, and that will be part of the Government's consideration of the country's future energy requirements.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Our Government have a really good record on animal welfare, as illustrated by the legislation that we passed during our nine years in government. However, the one area that remains unaddressed is that of animals in the laboratory. Animal tests are the weakest link in the safety testing of new drugs; they are so poorly predictive for humans that 92 per cent. of candidate drugs fail in clinical trials, their having had success with animals. Does the Leader of the House have any idea whether the Government will respond to early-day motion 92, which has been signed by hundreds of people across the Chamber? It states:

[That this House, in common with Europeans for Medical Progress, expresses its concerns regarding the safeguarding of public health through data obtained from laboratory animals, particularly in light of large numbers of serious and fatal adverse drug reactions that were not predicted by animal studies; is concerned that the Government has not commissioned or evaluated any formal research on the efficacy of animal experiments, and has no plans to do so; and, in common with 83 per cent. of general practitioners in a recent survey, calls upon the Government to facilitate an independent and transparent scientific evaluation of the use of animals as surrogate humans in drug safety testing and medical research.]

If no such evaluation is to be forthcoming, may we have a debate on this most important subject?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to say that this is an important issue, and I am grateful for his observations about the Government's record on animal welfare. We are proud of the steps that we have taken to continue to protect animals. Equally, it is important that this country is able to go on engaging in scientific research, while ensuring that that research is effective and efficient. My hon. Friend is right to say that we must balance the need for effective scientific research against the protection and welfare of animals, and I assure him that we keep that balance under constant review.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): The Leader of the House will recall the cutting of the frigate and destroyer fleet from 35 in 1997 to only 25 now, and the cutting of the replacement Type 45 programme from 12 vessels to only eight. Bearing in mind the report in The Herald today that there will be only six ships, rather than eight, despite the statement by the First Sea Lord that it was absolutely essential to have eight, may we have an urgent statement by a defence Minister on whether this cut is going to take place? If that statement is to be made, should it not be made before, rather than just after, the local government elections?

Mr. Hoon: Unfortunately, in my many years as Secretary of State for Defence—during which the hon. Gentleman was assiduous in asking me questions—I never managed to persuade him that the number of ships is not the critical factor. I know that he is fascinated by naval history, and he will know that the Royal Navy had thousands of ships in the late 19th century. That number was subsequently reduced to hundreds, and it is now much smaller. To that extent, there have been cuts. All I can say to him is that the ships that we have now are enormously more capable, and that the judgment on numbers is made in relation to the capabilities that the United Kingdom Royal Navy requires. That is a consistent process. It has not simply taken place since 1997; it has been going on for 400 or 500 years.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend bring a report to the House on my constituent, Michael Shields, who is serving a 15-year jail sentence in Bulgaria for a crime to which another man has confessed? Michael Shields' final appeal was heard in the Cassation Court in Bulgaria on 21 March. Michael Shields, his lawyers and the Foreign Office were informed that the court's verdict would be received within 30 days. The 30 days elapsed on 20 April, yet a week later there is still no news about when the verdict will be made available. This intolerable situation is creating even greater strain for all those involved. Will my right hon. Friend make representations on this matter?

Mr. Hoon: Like many other right hon. and hon. Members, I have followed this case with some concern over a long time. My hon. Friend is absolutely right to raise the case of her constituent. The Government are concerned about the matter, and I know that it has been followed closely by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary. I will ensure that he responds to my hon. Friend in the light of her detailed question.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): May I give the Leader of the House some very simple NHS statistics? Two early-stage breast cancer sufferers are receiving Herceptin at the Royal Shrewsbury hospital cost-free from their primary care trust. Those who have Shropshire addresses could receive such care at that hospital if the Shropshire PCT would fund it, but, because it will not, they are having to raise £47,000 each for the treatment, and there are 12 of them. It cannot be right that people with a Staffordshire address, a Cheshire address or a Welsh address get the drug free from their PCT, while people with a Shropshire address have to find £47,000 for it. My final statistic is that I have written three times to the Secretary of State: on 25 March, 5 April and 19 April. She has not answered once. Will she please come to the House and answer my questions?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman has raised this issue before—

Mr. Paterson: And I will again.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman heckles me to say that he will again, but I hope that he will not have to, because the Government's position is clear on this issue. We do not believe that there should be a difference in treatment according to where people live. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has made that absolutely clear in relation to Herceptin and a number of other drugs. These decisions should be taken on an individual basis in the light of the clinician's judgment. I will certainly ensure that my right hon. Friend responds to the hon. Gentleman again.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. We must move on, as I have to protect time-limited Northern Ireland business, and there is now a statement.

Fatal Shootings (Iraq)

The Solicitor-General (Mr. Mike O'Brien): With the leave of the House, I wish repeat a statement made in another place by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General. I wish to inform the House of decisions taken by the Crown Prosecution Service and the Army Prosecuting Authority in a case that has attracted a great deal of media attention. The case concerns an incident in Iraq on 24 March 2003 that resulted in the fatal shootings of Sergeant Steven Roberts, formerly of the 2nd Royal Tank Regiment, and Mr Zaher Zabti Zaher, an Iraqi.

The Crown Prosecution Service has now informed me that, after a full investigation of the case and a careful review of the evidence, there is insufficient evidence to institute criminal proceedings in this case. The Army Prosecuting Authority has also had the opportunity to examine the evidence in this case, including that obtained by the Metropolitan police, and has decided that there is insufficient evidence to charge any of the servicemen with military offences.

The CPS has produced a review note explaining its decision, which has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. As appears from that note, on the evidence available when the Attorney-General asked the CPS to consider the case, it might have been perceived that British soldiers had shot an unarmed Iraqi civilian, Mr. Zaher, a number of times, even after he had been severely injured and was in no position to pose a threat to anyone. In the course of firing at Mr. Zaher, two bullets had struck Sergeant Roberts, who was killed.

At the request of the CPS, the Metropolitan police carried out further inquiries, which resulted in the interview of five US soldiers who had witnessed part of the incident, a detailed statement from an Iraqi witness, and an autopsy on the body of the deceased Iraqi citizen. As its review note states, the CPS believes that it now has the fullest account of what occurred, although the passage of time has undoubtedly adversely affected the quality of some of that evidence. As it also explained, there are some differences in the accounts given.

I will now set out the essence of the account on which the CPS, having considered the totality of the evidence, has proceeded. I quote:

"On Sunday 24 March 2003 a troop of three Challenger battle tanks, part of the 2nd Royal Tank Regiment, were involved in a road block on the outskirts of Az Zubayr, Iraq, to stop and search vehicles for weapons.

Shortly after 6.00 am, Mr Zaher approached the tanks throwing rocks, firstly at the tanks and then at Sergeant Roberts who was standing alone outside his tank. Sergeant Roberts put out his hand, apparently as a signal for Mr Zaher to stop, but he did not do so. Sergeant Roberts drew his pistol and aimed it at Mr Zaher but although it appears that he fired one shot, the pistol malfunctioned and Mr Zaher continued to approach him, throwing more rocks. Sergeant Roberts apparently tried to clear the jam as Mr Zaher advanced.

A soldier in one of the tanks opened fire, apparently as warning shots, but Mr Zaher did not stop. Soldiers from two of the tanks then fired a number of shots at Mr Zaher. One of those weapons was set to fire at targets a considerable distance away and was not accurate at close range. Although Mr Zaher was hit and severely injured in the arm, two of the bullets struck Sergeant Roberts in the torso and he fell to the floor, fatally wounded. As soldiers dismounted from the tanks to give assistance to Sergeant Roberts, Mr Zaher got up holding a rock and started towards him again. One soldier, who had gone to assist Sergeant Roberts, said he feared that Mr Zaher was about to attack again so he fired his pistol several times and Mr Zaher again fell to the floor. According to some of the soldiers, despite his injuries, Mr Zaher again got up to advance on Sergeant Roberts, and holding a rock. The soldier who was attending to Sergeant Roberts, perceived that Mr Zaher still posed a threat and directed another soldier to shoot Mr Zaher. On this occasion he did not get up. British medical staff attended and Sergeant Roberts and Mr Zaher were declared dead at the scene."

I now want to turn to the circumstances of the investigation of this case. Shortly after the incident, the special investigations branch of the Royal Military Police—the SIB—undertook an early sudden death criminal investigation and produced a short report. It said that the SIB was unable to examine the scene or gather forensic evidence, although photos of the location were taken five days later. The incident was also investigated by the Army accident prevention and investigation team to determine whether any immediate steps could be taken to improve systems and procedures. On 4 July 2003, the commanding officer of the soldiers involved in the incident decided that no further investigation of the incident was necessary. That decision followed advice from an Army Legal Services officer who had read the first SIB report.

However, subsequently, on 18 July 2003, the head of the SIB concluded that the case had not been fully investigated. He was concerned about gaps in the evidence and, after discussion with the Army Prosecuting Authority, decided to reopen the investigation and seek a second legal opinion on the case. Attempts by the head of the SIB to reopen the investigation were resisted by the 1 (UK) Armoured Division chain of command on the basis of the original legal advice. One issue that loomed large was whether the prosecution would have to establish conclusively at the onset of the trial that Mr. Zaher was not a combatant. It was also said that, were a case to proceed, soldiers could rely on the defence that they were acting in self-defence under the rules of engagement.

In fact, as article 50 of protocol 1 to the Geneva convention 1977 makes clear, if there is doubt about whether a person is a civilian, that person should be considered to be a civilian. On 7 August 2003, a more senior officer of the Army Legal Services unequivocally advised the chain of command that the investigation should be reopened. A further investigation was required because: the British soldiers who had fired shots during the incident had not been interviewed under caution; witness statements had not been taken from the American soldiers or the Iraqi witness; a further ballistics investigation was required to ascertain which soldiers had fired shots; and there had been no post-mortem of Mr. Zaher's body.

The chain of command continued to receive conflicting advice from the Army Legal Services, but on 11 September 2003 the chain of command agreed with the head of the SIB that there should be a further criminal investigation, on the understanding that the British soldiers involved in the incident would not be interviewed under caution at that stage. In February 2004, the chain of command received additional advice from the senior Army Legal Services lawyer on whether Mr. Zaher was to be regarded as a civilian or a combatant. Also, in February 2004, the chain of command agreed that the SIB should continue its investigation in the most appropriate way according to its professional judgement. Soldiers who had been at the incident were then interviewed under caution by the SIB.

On 3 August 2004, the head of the Army Prosecuting Authority wrote to the Attorney-General, as the superintending Minister of both the APA and the CPS, advising that this case should be dealt with in the civil jurisdiction. The military and UK civilian courts have concurrent jurisdiction over a whole range of serious offences allegedly committed by UK nationals overseas. He was concerned about the considerable time that had elapsed between the incident and the chain of command permitting a full investigation by the SIB.

The Attorney-General agreed with the head of the APA, after consulting the Director of Public Prosecutions, that the case should be transferred to the civilian jurisdiction. The Attorney-General was concerned that the intervention by the chain of command, and the delays in the case, could have led to the defence lawyers raising abuse of process arguments had the soldiers been charged with criminal offences. An acquittal by a military court, following a successful abuse of process argument by the defence, might have been perceived by some as a final act of the military to cover up any possible wrongdoing by the British soldiers involved in the incident. Such perceptions would not have been in the interest of the soldiers and might have damaged the reputation of the military justice system.

Once the case had been transferred to the civilian jurisdiction in October 2004, the CPS concluded that further investigations were essential and the Metropolitan police took over the investigation. The Metropolitan police had to carry out its investigation in the difficult circumstances that prevailed in Iraq. During that time, the body of Mr. Zaher was exhumed and an autopsy was undertaken. The American soldiers were interviewed, a further ballistics report was obtained, and efforts began in earnest to discover whether the local population could help the police with their inquiries. After the Metropolitan police had completed its investigation in February 2006, all the available evidence was reviewed by the CPS, following advice from Treasury counsel in March 2006.

The CPS, having been satisfied that the Metropolitan police had completed all inquiries that could be undertaken, concluded that there was insufficient evidence to convict any of the British soldiers of the deaths of Mr. Zaher and Sergeant Roberts. The reason for that was that the evidence of those soldiers involved in the shooting was that Mr. Zaher was attacking Sergeant Roberts and that they acted to defend him. The conclusion of investigations shows that, while there were inconsistencies in accounts provided by them, British soldiers at the scene who witnessed the incident broadly support that version. The statements provided by the American witnesses and the forensic evidence did not in substance undermine the accounts of the British servicemen. Mr. Miz El Subaiyih, the single Iraqi witness, gave a different account of the incident, making no reference to Sergeant Roberts being shot and referred only to the shooting of Mr. Zaher.

The Attorney-General is wholly satisfied that the decision to transfer this exceptional case to the civilian system was the right action to take in the particular circumstances of the case. He also believes that it would have been better if there had been an earlier full investigation, as the head of the SIB and the senior advisory lawyer unequivocally recommended. Only after a full investigation had been completed were the prosecutors in a position to make informed decisions. However, I wish to make it abundantly clear that there is no suggestion that the chain of command acted unlawfully.

The difficulties associated with the initial stages of this case should not detract from the fact that the case has now been fully investigated. The full investigation has established that there is no realistic prospect of conviction. I very much regret the stress that any delay must have caused Mrs. Roberts, Mr. Zaher's relatives and the soldiers and their families. This case has taken a significant period to conclude but further measures have been put in place to ensure that service cases are better handled in future. I am assured by my ministerial colleagues that the Ministry of Defence has provided additional resources for investigations in Iraq, including more trained investigators to deal with the most serious cases, and additional clerical support and equipment.

In addition, Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary will soon begin a thematic inspection of the SIB, and will report later this year. The Attorney-General has encouraged the service prosecuting authorities to work closely with service investigators to improve the quality of investigations and to reduce delay. The Attorney-General has also discussed these issues with the Judge Advocate-General, who has introduced new directions hearings and which are reducing delay.

I am pleased to inform the House that the military police and the APA prosecutors are now, as a matter of standard practice, working closely together from the outset of investigations in serious cases. One advantage of that approach is that the investigators now receive early legal advice from independent APA prosecutors on the weight of evidence and on what further inquiries need to be undertaken before a decision is reached on whether there is sufficient evidence to charge a suspect. That approach, together with a provision in the Armed Forces Bill, will help to avoid the delays that took place in this case. The Bill makes it clear that when the military police consider that there is sufficient evidence to charge a suspect with a serious criminal offence, the case must be referred to the director of service prosecutions for an independent legal decision.

Some 100,000 servicemen and women have served on Operation Telic. Only a very small number have been accused of incidents involving the alleged ill-treatment of Iraqi civilians. Where there is an allegation of wrongdoing and there is supporting evidence following investigation, charges will be brought. Our troops in Iraq continue to perform outstandingly, but they are not above the law.

Today, our sympathies must of course go to all the families involved, but particularly to the family of Sergeant Roberts.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): Let me begin by echoing the Solicitor-General's expressions of sympathy for the family of Sergeant Roberts, and indeed for that of Mr. Zaher, in this tragic series of events. I thank the Solicitor-General for early sight of his statement—all the more because the first indication I had that the statement would be made was in an e-mail timed at 1.14 this morning, which rather suggests that the Attorney-General and his Department were left a little in the dark by the Government's business managers on how today's business would be conducted.

The Solicitor-General's statement, and the CPS report that accompanied it, were extremely thorough, illuminating and helpful in explaining what happened. I am entirely satisfied that the Attorney-General has acted completely properly in this matter. In the light of that, I hope that the Solicitor-General will take in good part the points that I think need to be raised.

Does the Solicitor-General agree that what emerges most clearly from the CPS report, after two lengthy investigations of the matter—one through Army Legal Services and the SIB between 2003 and 2004, and the second by the police and the CPS—is that the original conclusion and assessment by the first SIB report and the commanding officer was, in fact, entirely correct? This was an incident in which soldiers acted to protect a comrade, Sergeant Roberts, who was under attack from Mr. Zaher. The incident took place in difficult circumstances and with tragic consequences, but no one could possibly say that there was any imputation of criminality. In that context, it is perhaps a little unfortunate that as lawyers we must resort to the expression "insufficient evidence to prosecute". As the Solicitor-General may agree, on the facts given it is difficult to see that this was anything other than a tragic series of events initiated by Mr. Zaher's behaviour.

I am glad that the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General have acknowledged concern about the length of time that this matter has taken. Part of it—a longer period—was during the time in which the Attorney-General was seized of the matter, but I accept that it was an investigation in difficult circumstances. I hope that the Solicitor-General can provide some reassurance that he is satisfied that the police investigation was conducted as expeditiously as possible.

Does the Solicitor-General agree that what we should strive for in cases such as this is prompt and thorough investigation by the SIB, through the APA, when the specialist nature of its skills can properly reflect the extremely challenging environment in which soldiers are operating, in what in this instance was a combat zone during the initial stages of hostilities in Iraq? May we be reassured that the Solicitor-General and the Attorney-General are satisfied that the new structures that they have established will work to enable the SIB and the APA to provide an efficient and effective service?

The Solicitor-General may agree with me that it is clear that there were inconsistencies in the approach initially, which left the Army chain of command in considerable difficulty over what line to adopt. What we ought, and hope, to see in future is a fairly seamless process whereby such matters can be dealt with in the military sphere, and intervention by the Attorney-General and the police is very rarely needed.

I realise that this may fall a little outside the Solicitor-General's province, but it is pretty plain from the CPS report that the disquiet that has been expressed about the circumstances in which the troops found themselves at the time must remain in question. The use of tank crews in a semi-infantry role to carry out what amounted to a form of crowd control, at a time when they were engaged in intense hostilities—and had been so very recently—and with some equipment that was described in the CPS report as totally unsuitable for the circumstances in which they found themselves—we also know that body armour was deficient in the case of Sergeant Roberts—must give rise to anxieties. I very much hope that the Solicitor-General will be able to communicate those anxieties to his colleagues in the Ministry of Defence and that we may be able to hear more from them about that aspect of the matter in due course.

The Solicitor-General: I thank the hon. Gentleman for the way in which he has responded, and particularly for his comments about the "thorough, illuminating and helpful" CPS report and his comment that the Attorney-General had acted properly throughout. He has indeed.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that this was a tragic series of events. He asked whether the original conclusion was correct. That is so, in the sense that the conclusion has been the same from the start, but conclusions should be reached on the basis of a full and proper investigation of the evidence. That is the way in which we should do it in this country, and that is the way in which our armed forces seek to operate. That is why, when questions were raised about the way in which this case had proceeded, it was necessary for the matter to be dealt with by the CPS and the Metropolitan police. Now, no one can argue that there was not a full and proper investigation, as indeed there was. It is in the interests of everyone, including the military, that such incidents are fairly and properly investigated and that our armed forces are clearly seen to be subject to the rule of law. Nothing could be more damaging to the reputation of our armed forces, and more likely to provoke hostility towards them, than the suggestion that they can get away with criminal acts of violence against civilians with impunity and without full and proper investigations.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the thoroughness of SIB investigations and whether the Attorney-General and I were satisfied that the procedures now being introduced were adequate to ensure proper investigation. The key change is that in future the prosecutors in serious cases will be involved from an early stage. That will enable them to give advice and guidance to the SIB about what evidence needs to be collected and what procedures are necessary, so that—we hope—investigations will proceed much more effectively in future. We are satisfied that those improvements are very important. In addition, the report on the SIB by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, which is due later this year, will provide important guidance on what improvement the SIB needs to make internally.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the delays. They are indeed regrettable. There were clearly differences of view in Army Legal Services: our lawyers, quite honestly, had formed different opinions. The Army chain of command was therefore subject to a degree of different advice, which is regrettable.

The Metropolitan police investigation was obviously hampered by the circumstances in Iraq. A particular difficulty was that the Metropolitan police had to secure the confidence of Mr. Zaher's family in order to have access to his body and conduct an autopsy. That took some time. We did not get the autopsy results—in final form, at least—until February. In March, Treasury counsel offered an opinion to the CPS, which was then able to inform us of its final conclusion.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that this tragic series of events has been fully investigated and that the soldiers involved can move on, knowing that their position has been clearly set out and that there are no circumstances in which anyone could argue that they should be prosecuted.

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): The whole House will join the Solicitor-General and the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) in expressing sympathy to Sergeant Steven Roberts' wife, Mrs. Samantha Roberts, his mother and the rest of the family, and, indeed, to the family of Mr. Zaher. As we all know, it has taken the three years and a month that has passed since those tragic deaths—it is almost three years to the day since Sergeant Roberts' funeral—to resolve this issue. However, I welcome the fact that a clear conclusion has now been reached. I agree with the Solicitor-General that it is the right one and that it should put an end to this terrible period of uncertainty.

I, too, recognise that in investigating these events and the possibility of bringing criminal proceedings in the complicated and difficult circumstances that surrounded the outset of this conflict, it would have been very unfair to judge that these soldiers, in doing what they thought they were duty bound to do—to support their colleagues—should be prosecuted in the criminal courts. They will be hugely relieved, as will their colleagues serving in Iraq and elsewhere. We pay tribute to the work that they do, usually without fear for themselves, and their willingness to take risks.

In the light of this experience, the Armed Forces Bill and other related matters, are the Solicitor-General and the Attorney-General satisfied that such a delay—a year and a quarter was spent on the internal investigation and the rest on an external civilian investigation—will not happen again in any foreseeable circumstances? That must be the major lesson for all concerned to learn. Secondly, like the hon. Member for Beaconsfield, I was slightly concerned by the Attorney-General's use of the phrase "insufficient evidence to prosecute". Were the same two tests that would normally be applied in any civilian case—whether there was a more than 50 per cent. chance of conviction, and whether it was in the public interest to proceed—applied in this case? I assume that they were, and that that is therefore the end of the matter.

Thirdly, are we sure that the boundary between military investigation by the armed services' legal authorities and civilian investigation is now clear, both at home and abroad? The Defence Minister, the right hon. Member for East Kilbride, Strathaven and Lesmahagow (Mr. Ingram)—he is in his place—knows that the Deepcut investigation raised the same issues: who should investigate and who should decide on prosecution? Will there be a speedy process to decide who investigates, in order to give maximum confidence?

My final point links to one mentioned by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield. On the responsibilities of the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General, are they seized of issues relating to a duty on the British Army and its management to ensure that service personnel go into the front line properly equipped? Is there such a duty of care, and will it always be fulfilled by ensuring that personnel have the kit, equipment, clothing and other materiel to allow them to do their duty safely and properly?

The Solicitor-General: I join the hon. Gentleman in paying tribute to our armed forces. We ask a lot of them in very difficult circumstances, particularly in Iraq; throughout their period there, they have done Britain proud. As I have said, there are very few cases where an investigation has been necessary because our forces' behaviour has been outstanding. However, it is right that these investigations take place expeditiously. On the delays about which the hon. Gentleman asked, we believe that the new procedures will speed up the process. The Judge Advocate-General has instituted new court procedures, which are already paying dividends by ensuring that courts martial are heard more quickly. Moreover, as a result of this and other cases, the SIB has improved its procedures. I hope that the HMIC report, which we should receive in due course, will provide the advice that the SIB needs to enable it further to improve its carrying out of such investigations.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether the same tests are applied in considering whether to prosecute, and the answer is yes. In this case, there was no realistic prospect of a conviction, so in a sense the public interest test did not need to be applied. The evidence did not substantiate initiating proceedings. On the link between Army and civilian courts, this Parliament has created circumstances in which it is appropriate for cases to be transferred from one jurisdiction to another. We firmly believe that the military courts system is very good. It has delivered justice very fairly across a range of issues, and we continue to have substantial faith in it.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the duties of the Ministry of Defence, which is of course obliged to ensure that it provides soldiers serving in Iraq and elsewhere with proper equipment. The question of kevlar plates and the wearing of the appropriate protective jacket played no part in the legal decisions. Although the pathologist's evidence is not conclusive, it does suggest that, because Sergeant Roberts was shot in the torso, a protective jacket might have made a difference and might have saved his life. My colleagues in the MOD are taking account of that issue. I should point out that the MOD is not a body corporate, of course, and has Crown immunity in relation to such matters. That, in a sense, deals with the hon. Gentleman's point about legal duties.

I repeat that I join the hon. Gentleman in paying tribute to our armed forces.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): As the Solicitor-General will know, Mrs. Roberts is a constituent of mine. All our thoughts go out to her and her family at what has obviously been an incredibly distressing time. I welcome the Solicitor-General's statement, particularly his saying that there will be no prosecution of the soldiers involved. As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) said, this was clearly a tragic series of events, involving soldiers working in incredibly difficult circumstances. I also welcome the concern expressed about the length of time taken to resolve this situation, which can only have added to the distress experienced by Mrs. Roberts and the rest of Sergeant Roberts' family.

The fact is that the main cause of Sergeant Roberts' death was the Government's insufficient preparation for the war in Iraq and the inadequacy of the kit. Tragically, Sergeant Roberts raised this issue himself in Iraq before he died. His wife has campaigned bravely on it, and I pay tribute to the courage that she has shown in that regard since her husband's death. She has acted with great dignity and she should be commended for that. I hope that, as a fitting tribute to Sergeant Roberts and the campaign fought by Mrs. Roberts, the Ministry of Defence will take note of the lessons to be learned and ensure that no other soldier dies, as Sergeant Roberts tragically died, because of inadequate kit.

The Solicitor-General: Of course, every death of a member of British service personnel is felt profoundly in the military family. All our thoughts are with Mrs. Roberts during these very difficult circumstances. She has been very concerned about the question of the protective equipment that her husband might have worn, and I am assured that the MOD has learned the lessons, is well aware of the circumstances of this case and is seeking to do all that it can to discharge its responsibilities to our soldiers in Iraq and elsewhere.

Mr. Dan Rogerson (North Cornwall) (LD): I share the expressions of sympathy to Mrs. Roberts and the other members of Sergeant Roberts' family. I welcome the fact that the Solicitor-General said that investigations into incidents such as this will be conducted much more speedily in the future, and I am sure that we are all glad to hear that. The Solicitor-General will no doubt be aware that my predecessor, Lord Tyler, worked with the Roberts family in seeking to bring the matters surrounding the tragic death of Sergeant Roberts to the attention of the wider world.

The issue of the lack of equipment that may have saved Sergeant Roberts' life is a matter of concern across Cornwall and the rest of the country. I welcome the Solicitor-General's assurances that his colleagues in the Ministry of Defence are investigating it and ensuring that such factors will not cause further deaths in future. However, can he tell us a little more about how investigations into that aspect of Sergeant Roberts' death impacted on the decision on whether to bring charges and the results of that consideration?

The Solicitor-General: The presence or otherwise of the protective jacket is a matter for the Ministry of Defence and others, and it did not have any substantial bearing on the legal decisions. In terms of the lawyers' examination of the evidence, the issue was whether the soldiers had acted appropriately and whether Mr. Zaher was posing a threat to them at the time. Those matters were looked at and conclusions were reached based on a full investigation and consideration of the evidence. The straight answer to his question is that the presence or absence of kevlar plates and a protective jacket was not, in legal terms at least, an issue that had a substantial bearing on the outcome of the case.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): I am grateful to the Solicitor-General for his meticulous care in warning us of the statement that he has made today, and for its tone and content. He is right to say that our soldiers are not, and should never be, immune from prosecution. They are subject to the rule of law and that is what they are fighting for. The statement gives us a lot of information that we can look at now with the benefit of hindsight. I suppose the value of hindsight is that we can learn from it for the future.

There are two aspects on which I hope that the Solicitor-General can comment. First, the maxim that justice delayed is justice denied is one to which insufficient attention has perhaps been given. Secondly, the Solicitor-General referred to differences of view in the Army Legal Services. Given the fact that our soldiers are fighting on behalf of all us—and doing a fantastic job in very difficult circumstances—does he agree that more benefit of the doubt could be given to our soldiers in relation to prosecutions such as this?

The Solicitor-General: It is important that whenever we look at a case involving our soldiers engaged in active service areas, such as Iraq, we take into account the precise circumstances in which they are operating. When making a decision, we need to take into account the threat that soldiers may feel under and the background circumstances that they face. In looking at the evidence, those who make decisions on prosecution—be it the APA or the Crown Prosecution Service, as in this case—will consider those circumstances. Therefore, I do not think that we need to change the test.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the maxim that justice delayed is justice denied. Delays such as those in this case are regrettable, but it is also important that we have a full and thorough investigation. What we cannot have is a situation in which people make allegations that there has been some kind of cover up. They cannot do so here, because the case has been fully and properly investigated on several occasions. No criticism can now attach to the thoroughness of the investigation. If we demand that other countries comply with international law and basic standards, we must show that we do to. This case shows that. We have conducted a full investigation and reached a conclusion based on the evidence. That is what we ask other countries to do and that is what we must continue to do ourselves.

Mr. Ben Wallace (Lancaster and Wyre) (Con): I am afraid that I will not be so charitable towards the statement, but that is perhaps because, as a former soldier, I know too well the effects that delay and such investigations have on the morale of soldiers, their families and units—especially those in the front line.

The Solicitor-General said that the case was started because it might have been perceived that British soldiers shot an unarmed civilian. However, at the end of his statement he said that if there is an allegation of wrongdoing and supporting evidence following an investigation, charges will be brought. Is it not the case that there was not actually an allegation of wrongdoing in this case, but that yet again commanding officers and units in the front line—who know the environment, as did the local Army Legal Services staff—were overruled for reasons of perception, not reasons of correct justice?

The Solicitor-General: There was, regrettably, an allegation of improper behaviour. The independent Iraqi civilian who made some allegations put forward a version of events that did not include the shooting of Sergeant Roberts, but did suggest that the behaviour of the troopers involved had not been appropriate. That was discovered at a later stage, but it is clear that perceptions might have arisen after an unarmed civilian had been shot. It is right that when that occurs, the British Army should protect itself by having a proper, full and thorough investigation so that it can say that it acted lawfully and properly, that it is not above the law and that it does things the right way. To suggest that there should not have been a full investigation is just plain wrong and it would undermine the very basis on which our Army claims to act. It is right and appropriate that there should have been a full investigation. It was carried out, and those soldiers can now say that it was done and they were cleared.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): In my hon. and learned Friend's statement he said that there were "inconsistencies" in the accounts provided by the soldiers. Does he recognise that there are always inconsistencies in statements given by witnesses? If there are no inconsistencies, the witnesses are deemed to have colluded before giving their evidence. It also rankles with some of us that after an extensive inquiry the statement concludes that there is "insufficient evidence" to institute criminal proceedings in this case. We have the evidence—surely it shows that there is no case to answer.

The Solicitor-General: It is the case that there is insufficient evidence and therefore there is no case to answer. I am afraid that lawyers tend to use legal terminology, and the public have a right to know that the conclusion is that there is not a case to be answered in the criminal courts. My hon. Friend mentioned inconsistencies. The incident took place in the early stages of the armed conflict in Iraq and soldiers were clearly under a great deal of stress. The circumstances were confusing, including the fact that the machine gun was set to fire at a greater distance than events required. There were a series of factors that led to an element of confusion and, therefore, it is not unlikely that accounts should display inconsistencies. Anyone who has experience of hearing witnesses give evidence in court will know that there are often honest inconsistencies.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): As a former soldier, I share in the tributes paid to our servicemen and women who represent our country abroad. They do a difficult job. I also share the thoughts for the families who face pressures when servicemen or women are abroad.

I draw the attention of the Solicitor-General to a written answer from the former Secretary of State for Defence, in which he stated that Sergeant Roberts' wife

"was provided with a summary of the incident on 18 June 2003 by the Casualty Visiting Officer".—[Official Report, 22 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 1392W.]

As everybody is aware, Sergeant Roberts' death took place five days into the conflict on 24 March 2003, so there is a two-month difference. Does the Solicitor-General agree that two months was far too long to draw out the basic facts of the case and provide them to the widow in those tragic circumstances? Some people have said that the reason for the delay and for allowing the argument about enhanced body armour to run in the media was to cover up the fact that it was a case of friendly fire. There are many lessons to be learned about improving communications to stop rumours spreading, especially in the British press, which do not help the morale of the troops and do not help us in communicating exactly what happened.

The Solicitor-General: It is important that families are given as much information as is reasonable as early as possible and that the information is accurate, which means that there must be some degree of investigation of it. We have already heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth (Mr. Jenkins) that sometimes there are inconsistencies in statements and all sorts of issues arise, especially in a conflict zone. There were difficulties in returning to the site to gather forensic evidence. I am sorry that Mrs. Roberts had to wait so long for a description of what had happened to her husband. That is obviously distressing, but it is important that when a description is given it is as accurate as possible, which requires investigation and that requires time. It would have been even worse, however, if Mrs. Roberts had been given one explanation and then over time, as new evidence emerged, it was changed time and again. I suspect that that would lead to even greater distress.

The media do not have to be accurate when they report things. The Government and the Ministry of Defence at least try to be as accurate as we reasonably can in the information we give. It is important that time is taken. The media want the story tomorrow, but the Government have to get the full story out as accurately as possible, which may take a bit more time and in some cases, such as this one, a substantial degree of extra time.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): I had the privilege of visiting Iraq in June 2003 as part of the armed forces parliamentary scheme. During our time there, I spent nearly 24 hours with the 2nd Royal Tank Regiment. I ate with the soldiers, talked to them and went on patrol with them in a Challenger tank. The point they made about Sergeant Roberts' death was that he did not have kevlar; I understand that he had in fact been given kevlar but asked to give it to another soldier. They clearly believe that the lack of that protection led to his death. Should not the Government look into whether the forces should have a duty of care to ensure that the basic safety equipment required for front-line duties is actually provided? The family of Sergeant Roberts could then have taken a case against the services for their failure to protect his life. He gave his life for his country.

The Solicitor-General: The Ministry of Defence always has to be risk-aware and, where it can, provide the appropriate equipment, but there is no such thing as a risk-free environment, and certainly not in Iraq; our soldiers and other service persons run risks when they are on active service. My earlier comment that the MOD has looked at the case and sought to learn lessons is appropriate. The MOD will seek to provide appropriate equipment and to ensure that soldiers have whatever protection can reasonably be given, but no circumstances, not least in Iraq, are without some degree of risk.

Orders of the Day

Northern Ireland Bill

Considered in Committee.

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Clause 1

PREPARATIONS FOR RESTORATION OF DEVOLVED GOVERNMENT

1.6 pm

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 1, line 9, at end insert

'(including proposals to give effect to the agreement reached at the multi-party talks on Northern Ireland set out in Command Paper 3883)'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 16, page 1, line 9, at end insert—

'(1A) Each candidate for either office under subsection (1)(a) above must stand for election jointly with a candidate for the other office.'.

No. 17, page 1, line 9, at end insert—

'(1A) Two candidates standing jointly for the purposes of an election under subsection (1)(a) above shall not be elected to the two offices without the support of—

(a) a majority of the members voting in the election,

(b) a majority of the designated Nationalists voting, and

(c) a majority of the designated Unionists voting.'.

No. 21, in schedule 1, page 4, line 5, leave out first 'Assembly' and insert 'Forum'.

No. 22, in page 4, line 5, leave out second 'Assembly' and insert 'Forum'.

No. 8, in page 4, line 9, at end insert

'and to give effect to the agreement reached at the multi-party talks on Northern Ireland set out in Command Paper 3883.'.

No. 23, in page 4, line 15, leave out sub-sub-paragraph 1(a).

No. 4, in page 4, line 18, leave out from 'officers' to end of line 19.

No. 25, in page 4, line 19, at end insert—

'(1A) A person shall not be elected under sub-sub-paragraph 3(1)(b) above or sub-sub-paragraph 3(3)(b) below without cross-community support.

(1B) For the purposes of sub-paragraph (1A) above "cross-community support" shall have the same meaning as in subsection 39(7) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998.'.

No. 24, in page 4, line 26, leave out sub-sub-paragraph 3(a).

No. 26, in page 4, line 32, leave out paragraph 4.

No. 27, in page 5, line 18, leave out paragraph 6.

No. 6, in page 5, line 20, at end insert—

'Assembly control of Orders in Council

7 Paragraph 2 of the Schedule to the 2000 Act is replaced by—

"Parliamentary and Assembly control of Orders in Council

2(1) Except where sub-paragraph (2) applies, an Order in Council may not be made under paragraph 1(1) unless each of the following conditions is met—

(a) Condition 1 is that a draft of the Order has been referred under section 1(1) of the Northern Ireland Act 2006 to the Assembly;

(b) Condition 2 is that a meeting of the Assembly has taken place at which it has had the opportunity to consider the draft of the Order;

(c) Condition 3 is that the Assembly at that meeting has not expressed by resolution passed with cross-community support its opposition to the draft of the Order;

(d) Condition 4 is that the draft of the Order has been approved by resolution of each House of Parliament.

(2) This sub-paragraph applies where the Order declares that the Secretary of State has advised Her Majesty that because of the urgency of the matter it is necessary to make the Order without meeting any of the conditions in sub-paragraph (1).

(3) Where an Order contains a declaration under sub-paragraph (2) it—

(a) must be laid before Parliament after being made; and

(b) ceases to have effect if it is not approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament before the end of the relevant period.

(4) Where an Order contains a declaration under sub-paragraph (2) it—

(a) must be referred to the Assembly under section 1(1) of the Northern Ireland Act 2006 after being made; and

(b) ceases to have effect if before the end of the relevant period—

(i) the Assembly has not had an opportunity to consider the Order; or

(ii) the Assembly has passed a resolution with cross community support expressing its opposition to the Order.

(5) But sub-paragraphs (3)(b) and (4)(b) do not prejudice—

(a) anything done under the Order before it ceased to have effect; or

(b) the making of a new Order.

(6) In this paragraph—

"the Assembly" means the Assembly referred to in paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 2006;

"the relevant period" means the period of 40 days beginning with the date on which the Order is made.'.

Mark Durkan: We covered many matters yesterday on Second Reading. We have tabled amendments Nos. 7, 8 and 6 to clause 1. The clause provides that the Secretary of State may refer certain matters to the Assembly that is to be set up under the Bill, namely, the election of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, the operation of d'Hondt and such other matters as the Secretary of State sees fit.

The clause makes it clear that suspension does not end with the creation of the Assembly. It provides that the Assembly is to be composed of people who were elected to the Northern Ireland Assembly, so there is a clear legal distinction between the Northern Ireland Assembly and the Assembly. So far, the Secretary of State has not coloured in exactly which other matters he might see fit to refer to the Assembly. There were various exchanges between Governments and parties in the run-up to the statement made by the two premiers in Armagh, which preceded the Secretary of State's announcement of the Bill last week. The purpose of amendment No. 7 is to try to probe further into which other matters the Assembly might consider.

Elsewhere in the measure, it is made clear what will happen if restoration does not occur by 25 November. The Assembly set up by the legislation will be wound up and the Secretary of State has made it clear that Assembly Members will lose their jobs. We accept that, as we have been told, the Assembly is not a shadow Assembly—so it is not even a shadow of its former self. It should not continue indefinitely. We do not want an endless talking shop of any kind, but the Government are making a mistake if they think that the deadline will worry those who may not be in a hurry to form an inclusive Executive by that date. Talk of closing the book on devolution and talk, such as we heard yesterday, of bringing the curtain down on the process that has been in operation since 1998 could appeal to a party such as the Democratic Unionist party, which still says that its aim is to remove and replace the Belfast agreement.

The proposals that may or may not exist on joint stewardship in the event of the Assembly being wound up if there is failure by 25 November do not extend to anything that might look like joint authority—the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has been at pains to state that here last week and this week—so it would seem that perhaps we are talking about some sort of direct rule with knobs on at best. Again, I am not sure whether that will particularly appeal to anyone to whom the deadline is meant to appeal, and I am not sure whether it will scare or frighten anyone whom the deadline is supposed to worry in that sense.

It would suit those in the DUP in many ways for everything to be wound up at that stage and for attempts to be made in the direction of joint authority, to which they can then galvanise opposition and claim success in those attempts and, indeed, in burying the agreement, as they would see it. There is a danger that parties could have an incentive to play it out to failure on 25 November. Indeed, that incentive could also extend not just to the DUP, but to those in Sinn Fein who, for their own reasons, might be quite happy for us to reach a situation where the onus is on the two Governments to produce an alternative after 25 November. Of course, they can then galvanise and criticise when that is not good enough from their perspective either. Of course, they would be happy to blame the collapse by 25 November on the DUP.

The danger is that, after 25 November, the Northern Ireland Assembly might not be a given, the Assembly created by the Bill might be gone and a worthwhile alternative from the two Governments might not be a given and not be available. It might well be that the only given that we will have then is the outcome of the review of public administration—the seven super-councils, the repartition in waiting and the deep Balkanisation of our society—and in those circumstances, parties might well start to turn their attentions to how they build up their powers and bases in those new local government institutions, rather than concentrating on how we deliver the vision for devolution that the people of Northern Ireland endorsed when they voted overwhelmingly for the agreement.

Mr. Jeffrey M. Donaldson (Lagan Valley) (DUP): Why are those the only options available to the political parties in Northern Ireland? There is still the option of voluntary coalition, and my party has said many times to the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues that, in the absence of Sinn Fein-IRA completing the journey to democracy, peace and the rule of law, we are prepared to go into government tomorrow with them, so there are other options on the table, including the proposals that the hon. Gentleman and his party have made.

Mark Durkan: If the hon. Gentleman looks at amendment No. 7, he will see that it would allow people to consider and argue about other such proposals, to test one another and to press one another on them. However, the fact is that we could face a dangerous situation after 25 November if we have failed by that stage and if the language used is that of closing the book on devolution and therefore closing the book on the agreement for the foreseeable future. We could end up in circumstances that no one has advocated, no one has argued for and certainly no one has voted for in voting for any party. That is why I believe that, in the period that we have, if it looks as though we are not making progress to form the inclusive Executive and getting the First Minister and Deputy First Minister elected in the due way, it might well be appropriate, if the parties agree, to look at some options that still allow us to make progress that is consistent with the Good Friday agreement and that allows suspension to end—not to continue and prolong this kind of half-baked, twilight zone Assembly, but to create one that allows us to end direct rule and to restore the Assembly with its powers, the North/South Ministerial Council and the British-Irish Council.

The hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) refers to our proposals in the past. Our proposals were made more than two years ago. They did not require IRA decommissioning or anything else—it would have been restoration there and then, or restoration here and now—and if the Assembly were to discuss options such as ours, other parties would be free to propose other options. I urge the Secretary of State to make it clear that the Assembly will have the potential to maximise the agreement's implementation. That is made clear in amendment No. 7, and we would like to hear that the Government will consider that, rather than pushing to a position that would simply allow others to declare the agreement dead.

We recognise in that context not only that we will be trying to test others with alternatives and better ways to find a more definite approach to implementing the agreement, but that other parties will be testing us with their proposals, some of which, of course, would involve departing from the agreement. However, if the purpose of the Assembly is, as we have been told over the past few weeks, to provide a forum where all the parties can discuss things and where side deals are not going on and if the Assembly is the locus for political discussions, it seems to me that, given such political discussions as the Government know they will have with the parties, the parties should be able to have discussions with one another in public view in the context of the Assembly created by the Bill.

I will not speak to the amendments tabled by other hon. Members. We have also tabled amendments Nos. 8 and 6 in this group. The purpose of amendment No. 8 is simple: to make it clear that the purpose of the Assembly created by the Bill is to give effect to the Good Friday agreement. The House should have no problem with that because, after all, section 1 of the Northern Ireland (Elections) Act 1998, which set up the original shadow Assembly, contained similar wording, and the Secretary of State has told us that much of the Bill has been drawn from that original 1998 Act. If it was okay then, and the purpose of the Bill is to get us to implement the agreement, we see no reason why that cannot be made clear upfront in the legislation now.

I will now address amendment No. 6—and as I said yesterday, the key to our approach is whether the Bill offers a path to restoration or whether it offers the sort of talking shop that the DUP have advocated. We recognise from what we have seen to date that the Bill may offer both. It could be a path to restoration in that, if we elect a First Minister and Deputy First Minister and run the d'Hondt system and everyone takes the pledge of office, the Secretary of State will restore the institutions. Certainly, we would welcome that—we want to see those things happen—and we will be there, taking our place in the Assembly, to try to make them happen.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): Again, the hon. Gentleman alludes to two distinct things: either a talking shop, which he appears to believe, wrongly, is an option that the DUP wants, or a restitution of the institutions, which is obviously what he wants. Can he open his mind to the fact that this may in fact evolve into something that is neither of those?

Mark Durkan: I look forward to hearing more from the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues about some of what they have in mind, but so long as we are in the Assembly created by the Bill and not a restored one, I certainly want to ensure that the elected representatives in that Assembly can use their time as productively as possible. I do not want the considerations that its Members then have to be meaningless and weightless.

The fact is that the Secretary of State is given the power in clause 1(1) to refer to "such other matters as" he "thinks fit" to the Assembly created by the Bill. Obviously, that refers back to the statement by the two Governments on 6 April. We are told that the Secretary of State and Ministers would take account of motions passed with cross-community support on matters such as water rates and the review of public administration. It is hard for people to put much weight on such verbal indications from the Government in circumstances where the Government have consistently failed to respect the will of parties, as clearly expressed on a cross-community basis outside the Assembly during suspension.

How are we to believe that the Government will respect the views of Assembly Members in that Assembly? Will "take account of" extend to "abide by the will of"? That is what amendment No. 6 tests. It would give the temporary Assembly created by the Bill a temporary power for the life of that Assembly, by cross-community vote, to veto Orders in Council. That would not be a veto in the hands of one party or another party, or one community interest or another community interest, but a veto, for the life of the temporary Assembly, in the hands of a cross-community majority in that Assembly.

If the Secretary of State cannot accept amendment No. 6, I will have to ask what reason he can offer to Members of the Legislative Assembly for attending work in the Assembly to deal with such other matters as he might refer to it. If the clear and overwhelming views of the Assembly on matters such as industrial de-rating, water charges and the review of public administration will have no binding impact on what the Government do, it is hard to see how people will be well motivated in that work. It is also hard to see how the variety of policy communities and sectoral interests will take the Assembly seriously in that context. If the Secretary of State, who is creating and will control the Assembly, does not take it seriously, it is hard to expect or rely on all its Members, and certainly the wider public, to take it seriously.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Having read amendment No. 6, it seems that the hon. Gentleman seeks a negative power for the Assembly to veto Orders in Council. How does he consider that the Assembly will work in terms of positive powers? What positive powers does he think the Assembly should have and how much budgetary control does he think it should have?

Mark Durkan: To give the Assembly positive powers on a cross-community basis would, in effect, give one community or another, or one party or another, a veto on positive proposals and that would not be constructive in this situation. We do not want to give life to any sort of diversionary, half-baked Assembly. In so far as we are faced with this Assembly, which would not have been our choice—we wanted to go for full restoration—we will make the most of what is put in front of us, but we are not going to give life to something that diverges significantly from the agreement.

This is a temporary Assembly. If the idea of the 25 November deadline is to concentrate minds and to say to parties, "You will face serious consequences if you let all this fizzle out and the prospect of devolution turn to dust," giving that temporary Assembly the temporary power of political estoppel on matters that are clearly unpopular in the Northern Ireland community, would at least let people know that, if there is failure by 25 November, the effect of that power of estoppel will go. People will know that the community will pay a price and hopefully then parties will pay a price in front of the community for having allowed their success in stopping and preventing some of these measures to evaporate, because obviously the Government are then free to return to implement those measures under direct rule.

Concentrating and galvanising the power of that incentive makes the deadline count for far more. It will give people in the wider community—the various policy communities and sectoral interests—some mission and purpose in looking to the temporary Assembly to send a signal of a real prospect of better policy outcomes for them. They will be pressing parties to make the most of the situation and to make sure that we have success before 25 November, not failure. That is the purpose of amendment No. 6. I will not address the other amendments in detail.

Sammy Wilson (East Antrim) (UUP): I thank the hon. Gentleman for the explanation of that amendment. Does he accept that there is a disincentive to proceed with any Assembly if such matters are pushed through in the meantime, anyhow, and therefore it would be important for the amendment to be accepted?

Mark Durkan: I take fully the hon. Gentleman's point. It is the corollary of the point that I have just made—it is the other side of the coin. Given the point that the Government are at in pushing through some of these disagreeable measures, people might well have cause to allow the failure of the exercise so that they do not have to take responsibility for managing and steering those affairs from then on. So long as they can blame somebody else for that failure, they are home in a boat, as they would see it. I take his point and I hope that the Secretary of State is persuaded by the fact that there is a clear, strong argument, in terms of realpolitik, for this particular amendment.

I will not speak to the amendments that we do not support. In this group, we are supportive of the amendments from the Ulster Unionist party on ensuring that the election of the First and Deputy First Ministers is carried out absolutely on the basis that was specified in the Good Friday agreement.

Lady Hermon (North Down) (UUP): May I put on the record my deep appreciation of the House authorities and, in particular, the Public Bill Office for accepting amendments at very short notice? The Bill was introduced and published only last Thursday. By virtue of the fact that it was introduced so late, amendments had to be late, but I appreciate, most sincerely, the great leniency that has been shown by the Public Bill Office.

May I also say what a delight it is to see the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson), and also the Secretary of State in their places—for the entire debate, we hope? May I just say to the Secretary of State that I do know that there has been a death in his family? I extend my deepest condolences to him and I am sure that they will be shared by everyone in the House.

We have a lively debate ahead of us and a number of the amendments that stand in my name are in this first group, under clause 1, "Preparations for restoration of devolved government". I will briefly indicate what the amendments relate to and then speak to them in more detail. Amendments Nos. 16 and 17 deal with the election of the First and Deputy First Ministers, which I wish to see carried out by means of a joint election, with both names on the same ticket.

Amendments Nos. 21 and 22 deal with the name of the new creature that we discussing. As I indicated yesterday, I find it disturbing that the Bill, the Secretary of State and the Minister constantly refer to this new creature as the Assembly. In the minds of the people of Northern Ireland, that conjures up the idea that it is the same as the Northern Ireland Assembly. Of course, it is a very pale shadow of the former Northern Ireland Assembly; it is a talking shop. Amendments Nos. 21 and 22 seek to christen it a "Forum" rather than an assembly.

Amendments Nos. 23 and 25, which stand in my name, deal with the election of the Presiding Officer. I take exception to the Secretary of State taking to himself even more power. I know that those concerns are shared by the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson). We have not had discussions in the Tea Room about elections, but I hope that he and the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) will support the taking away of additional Executive powers from the Secretary of State, which is what is embodied in my amendments.

Amendment No. 24 deals with the replacement of any Presiding Officer. Again, the Secretary of State is taking the power to replace any Presiding Officer or deputy, or to fill a vacancy. I hope that I will have the support of the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) for amendment No. 26, which would remove the power of the Secretary of State to control proceedings in the Assembly by directions. Amendment No. 27 deals with the privilege of Members of the Legislative Assembly. I admit that it is a probing amendment, but its purpose is to find out why when MLAs take up their posts in the new body and sit again in Stormont, their statements will have limited privilege.

1.30 pm

Perhaps I can deal with the amendments in reverse order. If anything emphasises to the entire House that the new creature will not be the old Assembly, it is paragraph 6 of schedule 1, which amendment No. 27 would remove. The provision sets out the limited privilege that will be attached to statements made by the 108 MLAs. I think that I am right in saying that all Democratic Unionist party Members who sit in the House are also Assembly Members. Indeed, apart from the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady), all Social Democratic and Labour party Members are Assembly Members. They will be curious to find that the law is being redrafted to reduce what can be said with privilege in the new Assembly.

The Northern Ireland Act 1998 could be described as the constitution of Northern Ireland because, according to its long title, it is the main piece of legislation for the "government of Northern Ireland". The Secretary of State and Assembly Members will know that according to section 50 of that Act:

> "For the purposes of the law of defamation, absolute privilege shall attach to ... the making of a statement in proceedings of the Assembly; and ... the publication of a statement under the Assembly's authority."

The 108 MLAs thus have absolute privilege, but paragraph 6 of schedule 1 will take that away. This does not affect me, as the Member for North Down, because I do not sit in the Assembly, but I am genuinely worried about why the 108 Assembly Members who return will find that their privilege has suddenly been reduced.

According to paragraph 6 of schedule 1:

> "A written or oral statement made by a member in or for the purposes of the Assembly is to be privileged from action for defamation unless it is proved to have been made with malice."

Will the Secretary of State or the Minister kindly comment on the impact that the provision might have on any publication of the new Assembly, or, indeed, any media coverage of its proceedings? Why will the absolute privilege attached to Members of the old Northern Ireland Assembly—the proper Assembly—not carry through to the new creature?

Derek Conway (Old Bexley and Sidcup) (Con): I have sympathy with the hon. Lady and hope to support amendment No. 26, which she tabled, in due course. Does she know how the question of privilege for the Assembly relates to what goes on in the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh Assembly?

Lady Hermon: I, as the Member for North Down, could not possibly comment on the business and proceedings of the Welsh Assembly, but we are greatly honoured and benefited by having in the Chamber a Secretary of State who is not only Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, but Secretary of State for Wales. I am sure that his knowledge also extends to the Scottish Parliament, so we look forward to clarification of the situation for the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh Assembly from the person who is best qualified to comment.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): I cannot speak for the Welsh Assembly, but I assure the hon. Lady that the Scottish Parliament has absolute privilege.

Lady Hermon: That is most helpful.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): I think that the hon. Lady will find that the same applies to the Welsh Assembly.

Lady Hermon: I am grateful for those two interventions.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP) rose—

Lady Hermon: I might as well take a third intervention, especially as I am sure that it will be helpful.

Mr. Robinson: I hope that the hon. Lady does not cancel our engagement for tea.

Does the hon. Lady realise that the Northern Ireland Assembly still holds full privilege? We are discussing not that Assembly, but a new creation with a specific purpose. The Government judge that the purpose for which the new Assembly will be sitting may not require full privilege. What distinction does she draw between that full privilege and the privilege that will be extended to the new Assembly, which will require people to prove that malice was intended? How on earth will that be short of full privilege? I suspect that no one will be able to prove that someone has made a statement with malice in mind.

Lady Hermon: I am most grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention, which I am sure was intended to be helpful. He helped to clarify and reinforce a point that I made at the start of my comments on the amendment: if any measure in the Bill jumps off the page to reinforce the fact that the body will be not the Northern Ireland Assembly in shadow or devolved mode, but a new creature, it is the change to the law on absolute privilege.

I simply wish to know from the Secretary of State or the Minister the impact that the measure will have on those in the media who genuinely report what is said. According to the Bill, the privilege attaches to the Members. Unlike under section 50 of the 1998 Act, it will not extend to publications from the Assembly. The media perhaps have the most to lose financially as a result of the measure, so they may also want clarification.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: While the hon. Lady has been talking, I have had the opportunity to read section 50 of the 1998 Act, which is, indeed, widely drawn. What worries me about paragraph 6 of schedule 1 of the Bill is how intent and malice would be proved. Would it be possible that the measure would put the leader of the Assembly in an invidious position? The leader might become involved in court proceedings to rule on whether something was said with malice.

Lady Hermon: The Secretary of State has already chosen an individual to be the Presiding Officer, although I do not think that he had the authority—certainly not under the 1998 Act—to appoint any individual as a Presiding Officer. I assume that he has discussed the new law on defamation and privilege with the nominated Presiding Officer.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Hain): I understand why the hon. Lady is worried about the measure. Although I could have waited until my reply to make this point, it is important that I do so now. The arrangements are exactly the same—I think that the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) was alluding to this point—as those that applied in 1998 before we had a fully-fledged Assembly and restoration. All that I am doing is reproducing those arrangements, and I think that it is entirely appropriate to do so.

Lady Hermon: I thank the Secretary of State for his helpful intervention. I just hope that those in the media who intend to reflect and comment on the body's proceedings will do better than they have in recent days by describing the new creature as "the Assembly".

Sir Patrick Cormack: Does not the Secretary of State's intervention underline the fact that the hon. Lady is wise to use the word "creature", because the new Assembly is in every sense the creature of the Secretary of the State? It is not legally elected. It is appointed by him. The Presiding Officer is appointed him. Although its Members will be the Members who were elected to the Assembly, the body that we are discussing is not the Assembly.

The Chairman: Order. I should not have to remind the hon. Gentleman that he should address the Chair. In not doing so, he also takes his voice off microphone, which is a complication for the Official Report.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I humbly apologise, Sir Alan.

Lady Hermon: I think that all contributions, in particular the comment by the Secretary of State, have been helpful.

I will move on, because I think we ought to—[Interruption.] If I am encouraged to move on quickly by a DUP Member, I will of course invite that Member to contribute to the debate.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): May I remind the hon. Lady that I was the first person to bring the "creature" to the attention of the House? I called the Minister to attention and told him straight that it was not the old Assembly, but a new creature. The hon. Lady is not the only person to make that great finding. We all know that the body is not the old Assembly—it is not the old Assembly resurrected, even. It is a new body, designed by certain people who feel that this is the way they should go. We are going to take on board what they say and go away, but we will see how far we get.

Lady Hermon: I was not claiming to myself anything new. I was particularly pleased that yesterday, at the beginning of the Secretary of State's contribution on Second Reading, the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) was quick off his feet to correct the Secretary of State, who had referred to the Assembly coming back. Lest there by any doubt whatever, I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for North Antrim for pointing out, quite rightly, that we are discussing a new body. I regret it if I suggested otherwise. That was not my intention.

However, the right hon. Gentleman does reinforce the need for amendments Nos. 21 and 22, which would christen the body a "Forum" rather than the "Assembly". I have referred to media reports giving the impression that the new institution—the new Assembly—is not a different institution. The two are being confused in the minds of the media, at least, but they are certainly not confused in the minds of the right hon. Gentleman, his colleagues, the Social Democratic and Labour party and the one Ulster Unionist.

The Financial Times for Thursday 27 April states:

"Mr Hain is recalling the province's assembly on 15 May."

The Belfast Telegraph for Wednesday 26 April states:

"The report"—

the Independent Monitoring Commission report—

"which says paramilitary activity is at a three-year low—seems likely to guarantee a smooth start to Assembly sittings in 18 days".

Again, that gives the impression that the new body is the old Assembly, which it clearly is not. That is why my amendments would call the new creature—with, I am sure, the endorsement of the right hon. Gentleman—a forum, or a talking shop, because that would be a more appropriate description than the confusing double title of the Assembly.

1.45 pm

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I know that the hon. Lady has gone to considerable lengths to prove the nature of the body. Has she looked at the provisions in paragraph 2 of schedule 2, which deals with making the restoration order and, if we so decide in this Assembly, the things that will be carried over to the Northern Ireland Assembly on restoration? In particular, sub-paragraph (8) provides that by virtue of the restoration order, things that have been done here, will be treated as having been done in the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Lady Hermon: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising a good point. I have done some homework on schedule 2. He is right. As he will see when we reach a later group of amendments, I am particularly concerned about the pledges of office and, for example, the idea that as the Presiding Officer of the new Northern Ireland Assembly. I am most taken aback by things that have been deemed to have been done in one place being carried over to the reconstituted Assembly, which I genuinely hope to see.

"the presiding officer of the Assembly immediately before the effective date shall be deemed to have been elected"

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is it not right to remember that the Presiding Officer of the Assembly was never elected by the Assembly? He was chosen by the powers that be, and that was never rectified or done away with. He just took his place and stayed there—and for far too long as far as I was concerned.

Lady Hermon: I hope I do not misrepresent the views expressed, but I take it that the DUP, and certainly its leader, would prefer to select the Presiding Officer as it is they who sit in the Assembly, rather than have a Presiding Officer nominated, appointed and swept into power. That is no criticism of the individual herself, but it is an appointment that has been made, and it will be deemed to take effect under the Bill by the Secretary of State. [Interruption.] I take it that that is an endorsement of my point.

If I could just move to amendment No. 26—

Mr. Gregory Campbell: Hear, hear.

Lady Hermon: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman is so enthusiastic for me to move to the removal of the directions that can be given by the Secretary of State to conduct the proceedings of the Assembly.

Amendment No. 26 would remove paragraph 4 from schedule 1. It states:

"Proceedings are to be conducted in accordance with directions determined by the Secretary of State from time to time and notified to the presiding officer or any deputy presiding officer."

I hardly think any hon. Member would take exception to removing such wide Executive powers from the Secretary of State. I was reminded of words, wisely spoken, by the right hon. Member for North Antrim, and I am sure that I will find myself on his Christmas card list by the end of my comments. With reference to, I regret to say, the late Mo Mowlam, the right hon. Member for Redcar and then Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, he made a helpful statement as far back as 22 April 1998.

It was the leader of the DUP who said, with reference to standing orders:

"Who makes those standing orders? It is the Secretary of State, and if she does not like what is going on, she can change them at any time. Is that democracy?"

He continued:

"The Secretary of State could sit in her office and say, 'I don't like the way the assembly carried out its business yesterday. Here is a new order. Send that off to the Clerk and call them to order.'

[Lady Hermon]

Is that democracy? If hon. Members think that it is, let them vote for it, but the people of Northern Ireland are aghast."—[Official Report, 22 April 1998; Vol. 310, c. 874.]

I could not have put it better myself, if I may say so to the right hon. Member for North Antrim.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The hon. Lady should read more of Hansard.

Lady Hermon: I shall endeavour to do so. I do, of course, read the right hon. Gentleman's words in Hansard. I may not agree with half of what he says, but I thoroughly enjoy reading what he says. I therefore expect the DUP and certainly the right hon. Gentleman to support the removal of schedule 1, paragraph 4, which allows the Secretary of State to direct the proceedings of the Assembly. That is not acceptable in any democracy.

Moving on to the election of the Presiding Officer, under the Bill the Secretary of State has the opportunity, and he has taken the opportunity, to appoint a Presiding Officer. Schedule 1, paragraph 3 states:

"The Secretary of State may—

(a) appoint a presiding officer and no more than three deputy presiding officers, or

(b) authorise the Assembly" to do so. I wish to remove the power of the Secretary of State to appoint a Presiding Officer and Deputies, and to ensure that that is the task of the 108 Assembly Members. That is what they are there for. According to section 39 of the 1998 Act, which, I repeat, is the constitution of Northern Ireland and sets out the governance of Northern Ireland,

"Each Assembly shall as its first business elect from among its members a Presiding Officer and deputies."

Let us see the 108 Assembly Members doing what they were elected to do when the proper Assembly is restored. Any Presiding Officer should have the cross-community support of the House.

Finally, I shall speak to amendments Nos. 16 and 17 relating to the election of the First and Deputy First Ministers. Amendment No. 16 would ensure that "Each candidate for either office"— that is, the First Minister and Deputy First Minister—

"must stand for election jointly with a candidate for the other office."

Amendment No. 17 reads:

"Two candidates standing jointly for the purposes of an election under subsection (1)(a) above shall not be elected to the two offices without the support of—

(a) a majority of the members voting in the election,

(b) a majority of the designated Nationalists voting, and

(c) a majority of the designated Unionists voting."

I wish to see that written into the Bill.

I was delighted to receive a draft copy of the standing orders, which arrived in my office this morning. Before the Bill has seen much daylight and before it has been seen or discussed in the other place, it is rather unusual procedure that the Secretary of State has already sent out draft standing orders for consultation. I wonder where the authority came from for him to do so.

I was pleased that on page 8 of those draft standing orders, it is proposed by the Secretary of State that

"Each candidate for either office must stand for election jointly with a candidate for the other office", and that

"Two candidates standing jointly shall not be elected to the offices without the support of a majority of the members voting in the election, a majority of designated Nationalists voting and a majority of the designated Unionists voting."

That is from paragraph 17 of the draft standing orders. Either the Secretary of State had the benefit of seeing my amendments, or great minds might, on occasion, think alike.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: On a point of order, Sir Michael. I understood that it was a convention of the House that if the Government sent out papers that were to be discussed in a debate, those papers should be available to the whole Committee. As far as I am aware, the papers are not available in the Vote Office or on the Table of the House. Could you ask the Minister to make them available as soon as possible so that we can benefit from them in the debate?

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Michael Lord): I am not clear which papers the hon. Gentleman means.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Those from which the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) quoted.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The draft standing orders of the Assembly.

The Second Deputy Chairman: No doubt the Minister has heard the request.

Mr. Hain: I am grateful, Mr. Lord. [HON. MEMBERS: "Sir Michael."] I am grateful, Sir Michael, and apologise for that discourtesy. I circulated the draft standing orders in good faith to all Members of the Legislative Assembly and made it clear in my statement last week that I intended to do that on publication, which the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) may not have heard. I am happy to make them available to him or to anybody else. No disrespect was intended to anybody. A copy is available in the Library.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I trust that that adequately deals with the point of order, and that there is no reason for us to interrupt our business because of it.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I begin by speaking to amendment No. 4, which stands in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) and is a probing amendment. It is linked to amendment No. 5, in that it deals with the extent to which the Assembly can decide matters for itself. We are curious about the phrase

"in such manner as the Secretary of State may specify."

Does that mean that the Assembly will be able to choose a Presiding Officer or deputies not of the Secretary of State's choosing if it so wishes, or will the Assembly be able only to confirm the Secretary of State's choices? That is important.

I think I can say without fear of contradiction that the previous Speaker was universally admired and respected—I see a smile leaking from those on the DUP Benches—and he did not stay long enough, but he has gone now. I pay tribute in advance to Eileen Bell, who I think will be a superb Presiding Officer, but if the Assembly wanted to change that appointment—I hope it would not—would it have the capacity to do so? I hope that the Minister will be able to answer that question.

Amendments Nos. 7 and 8 were tabled by the SDLP. "Command Paper 3883", as we know, is the Good Friday agreement. I am slightly concerned that the aim behind the amendments might be to ensure that no changes are made to the operation of the Assembly and the Good Friday agreement.

It is recognised that there have been difficulties in the operation of certain aspects of the agreement. Perhaps the most obvious of those was the use of designations. Who can forget the fiasco of autumn 2001, when members of the Alliance party had to pretend to be Unionists for five minutes in order to facilitate the election of a First and Deputy First Minister? That occurred despite the fact that over 70 per cent. of Assembly Members voted for David Trimble and the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) to take up those positions. That is fundamentally wrong. If the amendments would prevent a change, they would enshrine some rather bad practice.

Mark Durkan rose—

Lembit Öpik: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene to clarify that point, I shall be happy to give way.

Mark Durkan: I wish the amendments, if they are made, would have the effect of preventing any changes. They would not. The Secretary of State told us earlier that much of the Bill reproduces much of what was in the Northern Ireland (Elections) Act 1998, and the amendment does the same: it reproduces a provision that was in the original Act.

Lembit Öpik: It reproduces some of the flaws, too.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Will the hon. Gentleman comment on the fact that when the Deputy First Minister resigned, his resignation was mentioned at the Dispatch Box, and eulogies were offered. The then Secretary of State discovered that he had not resigned at all, and his motor car, free phone and all his servants had to be reinstated. That was approved by the House, and anyone who voted against it was regarded as a leper.

Lembit Öpik: The right hon. Gentleman makes a self-contained point, and we hear him loud and clear. His youthful exuberance is a delight in these debates and his impish cheekiness lifts everyone's spirits. I hope he will retain those characteristics as he matures.

To return to past mistakes, the Bill provided an opportunity to solve the problem of designation, which, I accept, was proposed as a way of ensuring cross-community consent. However, it contributes to the reinforcement of sectarian divisions. A system of designation presumes that everyone fits neatly into a category, but it ignores pluralism and means that the votes of people representing cross-community parties do not have the same value as those of Unionists and nationalists. That basic lack of equality is contrary to the spirit of the original agreement, and to the spirit of European anti-discrimination standards. It is quite wrong that the votes of Assembly Members who refuse to subscribe to the sectarian labels of "Unionist" or "nationalist" count for less than those of Members who accept those titles. I am therefore concerned lest we enshrine previous bad practice in the Bill by accepting amendments Nos. 7 and 8.

Amendment No. 16 appears to have been tabled to avoid the problem of voting separately for a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister—an arrangement that means, for example, that some parties would actively have to vote for a Sinn Fein candidate. I do not know whether that was the explicit intention of the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon), but I do not have any difficulty with her proposal. To be honest, I would prefer Ministers to be endorsed collectively, rather than individually, because that reinforces the belief that they should work together.

Amendment No. 17 deals with the age-old problem of deciding how individuals should be elected to office. We have still not got to grips with that problem, which is not just about redesignation. The Secretary of State may wish to explain why 70 per cent. of all Assembly Members can vote for a candidate, yet for that candidate not to be elected.

The hon. Member for North Down sensibly pointed out the difference between a forum and an assembly, thus highlighting the inevitable confusion caused by using the same word for both. The Government have gone form on this issue. The Secretary of State is also the Secretary of State for Wales, so he will remember a recent debate on the Government of Wales Bill. I tabled an amendment proposing that we call the Welsh Assembly "the Welsh Senedd", but the Government rejected it, because they argued that the building in which the Assembly operates is a Senedd, so it would be confusing to call the Assembly the same thing. They appear to have taken exactly the opposite view in the Northern Ireland Bill, and have decided to use one word, for two things that are clearly not the same.

Mr. Hain: That was not the reason that we refused the hon. Gentleman's amendment. The translation of the Welsh word, "Senedd", is "Parliament", but Westminster is the Parliament. There is no Parliament in Wales—there is the Assembly.

Lembit Öpik: The right hon. Gentleman was not present for the entire debate, but one of the arguments against calling the Assembly "the Senedd" was that people would be confused. That is on the record for everyone to see. There is no question but that the use of the word "Assembly" in the Bill will cause confusion, as that has already happened in the press. The Government should take a long, hard look at the problem. It may be their political intention to make the body look, feel and sound like an assembly to persuade individuals that the transition is not a great one. I am agnostic about that, but I feel very strongly that the Secretary of State should explain why the Government are willing to countenance confusion between the new creature and the original body that was set up and called "the Assembly".

I support amendment No. 26. This morning, the House of Lords Select Committee on Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform published its 18th report, which considered the Bill. It drew attention to paragraph 4 of schedule 1 and the power that it gives the Secretary of State to determine the conduct of the Assembly's proceedings:

"These directions may contain provisions of a substantive and not just a procedural nature. For example, they may include requirements as to the majority required for election. Although the bill does not prescribe what, if any, directions must be given in this respect, paragraph 4(3) and (4) of schedule 1 specifies that a particular use of the power may be to require provision corresponding to sections 16 and 18 of the Northern Ireland act 1998, which set out the majorities required in elections, and the formula for filling ministerial offices, under that Act."

It concludes:

"We draw to the attention of the House the significance of the power to give directions so that Ministers may, if the House thinks fit, be asked for a fuller explanation of the intended use."

We would like the Secretary of State to comment on what the power will be used for. We are concerned that he has taken the power upon himself, and will not allow the Assembly to decide these matters for itself—a point that we made, albeit less emphatically, in amendment No. 4. Why can the Assembly not decide those matters for itself? The matter has invited comment from the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee, so I hope that the Secretary of State can provide a cohesive reply.

I found amendment No. 7 entertaining, as it deals with parliamentary privilege and makes the preposterous assumption that one can prove an exemption for malice. I hope that the Secretary of State will explain why on earth the Bill includes such a fatuous provision.

Mark Durkan: I think that the hon. Gentleman means amendment No. 27, not amendment. No. 7.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Gentleman is right, and I am grateful for the correction.

I do not believe that the provision would have any efficacy in a court of law. It is a moot point, but the Bill does not stand or fall on it. I am not persuaded, however, that there is a coherent reason for the inclusion of a provision that rather offensively suggests that, although it is not the case for any other political body in the United Kingdom, there is a particular opportunity and likelihood of malice in Northern Ireland. In my experience, Northern Irish politicians are some of the most generous-hearted and loving people one could hope to meet, so planning for such a failure is an offence to right hon. and hon. Members from Northern Ireland.

Finally, I rather like amendment No. 6, which gives the Assembly the ability to discuss, and have an input into, Orders in Council that are made in Parliament between 15 May, when the Assembly is recalled, and any such time that a restoration order is made to restore devolved powers to the Assembly.

I think that that is the right thing to do. Assembly Members should be able to have proper input into matters affecting people in Northern Ireland, for which the Assembly will ultimately be responsible and with which—significantly—Assembly Members will be elected to deal.

The amendment would solve an ongoing problem that the Government accept is real. The problem is that the Orders in Council process is simply an unacceptable way to govern the Province. The amendment would also give the Assembly authority to have real decision-making input on matters that are part of its governing role, but we must be careful to stipulate that its provisions should not apply for ever. Despite Government assurances, if that happens there is a risk that deadlines will slip and that we will end up with a new and semi-operational Assembly that runs in the slightly ad hoc way that has been described.

I shall be somewhat concerned if the Minister chooses to reject the amendment, as the cross-party support for it is evident. The SDLP, the DUP and the Liberal Democrats support it, and I imagine that the Conservatives will be sympathetic to it—

Sir Patrick Cormack: Of course.

Lembit Öpik: I am now certain that the Conservatives support the amendment. Unfortunately, Sinn Fein Members have not been able to make it here today, but I am sure that they would do so too. The Government are always looking for consensus, and they have it with this amendment. They should respond by accepting it, or at least by tabling an amendment in their own words on Report that would achieve the same thing.

Will the Secretary of State say what damage could possibly be done by explicitly including the Assembly—or the forum, if that is the preferred name for the body—in the decision-making process in respect of Orders in Council? That would relieve some of the pressure that all of us feel when it comes to the inability to amend legislation, and it would also give the Assembly the sort of real responsibilities that we all agree would be helpful.

Mr. Hain: I shall give a more detailed response when I reply to the debate, but I want to point out that there was no cross-party support for the proposal at all. If there had been, I do not think that all the parties would be ready to turn up on 15 May to take part in what I think will be a positive spirit.

Lembit Öpik: I suspect that the Secretary of State will find that there has been a degree of movement on this matter. From the interventions made during the debate so far, I get the sense that there is cross-party support for the amendment, or for something like it. I look forward to hearing what other hon. Members have to say, but I hope that if the proposal does enjoy cross-party support—

Mr. Hain: There is no cross-party support for it.

Lembit Öpik: From a sedentary position, the right hon. Gentleman says that there is no cross-party support for the proposal, but I was going to make a different point. If it turns out that there is cross-party support for it, I hope that the Secretary of State will consider the amendment seriously.

Mark Durkan: The Secretary of State intervened to say that the proposal did not have cross-party support. However, the DUP and the UUP seem to support it, and my party clearly supports it, as it is our amendment. The absence of cross-party support seems to be down to Sinn Fein, yet the right hon. Gentleman has said that the outcome of the review of public administration must be that we get seven super-councils. That outcome does not have cross-community support, but is supported only by Sinn Fein. That is a paradox that the Secretary of State cannot explain.

Lembit Öpik: What the hon. Gentleman says reminds me that cross-party support was not a big consideration in the introduction of water charges or of student loans and tuition fees: both were opposed unanimously, even by Sinn Fein.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The hon. Gentleman is trying to build consensus, which is what the whole process is about. As someone elected to an English constituency, perhaps I am able to raise this question: does he agree that the Bill should be about giving more trust to the elected Members of the Assembly? Might not it be possible for the Secretary of State to consider allowing some of the Bill's more pernicious provisions—such as those to do with Standing Orders and how the leader of the Assembly is elected—to be amended by them?

Lembit Öpik: That is a fair point. I would go so far as to say that Members of the reconstituted Assembly might be justified in feeling slightly patronised. They are being expected to work towards achieving an operational Assembly, but they are not going to be able to get actively involved in the decision-making loop for legislation that will be going through when the Assembly is operating.

The Government would not lose anything by accepting the amendment. The hon. Member for Foyle has underlined the fact that there has been some movement. A common-sense position has been achieved, with which all the parties from Northern Ireland represented in this Chamber seem to agree.

I hope that the Secretary of State does not say that Sinn Fein has a veto on the proposal, as that would be very unhelpful. I am sure that he would accept that the fact that the SDLP, the UUP and the DUP all agree that the proposal is a good idea—subject to some consultation with the Alliance, Sinn Fein and others—is a good reason to consider accepting it. Anything else would suggest that the Assembly was being set up to do what he wants, and that it will not be allowed to do what it and the people of Northern Ireland want—that is, to make important decisions and have an input into the feedback loop.

2.15 pm

The Minister of State has placed great store in having a constructive dialogue about how we can do things better than we do under the Order-in-Council process. I shall be interested to hear what the Secretary of State has to say, after he has reflected on the fact that we seem to have moved from a position where there was no support for the amendment to one where the key players in the debate and in Northern Ireland politics all agree that it would be sensible.

Rev. Ian Paisley: It is hard for the people of Northern Ireland to understand exactly what the Government are about. The Government's statements should contain greater clarity about their real intentions.

I regret that this debate began with the leader of the SDLP trying to put blame on certain parties. He suggested that the DUP was going into the Assembly with the aim of ensuring that it is broken up and brought to an end on 26 November. That is not my brand of politics. Down the years, I have attended all the talks to which I have been invited. I was not invited to some of them and my party was treated as a leper, but we always attended—and made our case as strongly as we could—when we were invited.

I have no intention of taking my party to the Assembly in order to get the Assembly shut down on 26 November, but the leader of the SDLP missed the point completely. Yesterday, it was accepted on both sides of the House that all parties involved in the talks must agree on the question of democracy. We cannot have people at those talks who want to be members of the Government of Northern Ireland yet stick to their terrorism or to their criminal practices.

That was set out firmly yesterday and it was endorsed by the Secretary of State, who agreed that that must be the keystone to the Assembly. However, if that keystone is not put in place, we cannot enter into discussions with people who have made it known that they are not prepared to be there on the same conditions as everyone else. I resent the suggestion by the leader of the SDLP that the DUP will join the Assembly to get it closed down.

The people who will close down the Assembly will be the ones who do not accept the rules, which are straight and plain—everyone should accept that the Assembly will be a democracy and that Northern Ireland will be ruled like any other part of the UK. Terrorists, those who advocate terrorism and those who are engaged in criminality will not be able to take office. If they are elected by their people, that is all well and good, but they will not be able to hold office until they keep to the rules. If we do not make that clear, we might as well all pack up today. That point must be spelled out over and over again, although one would have thought that it would be taken as read in this United Kingdom.

I resent the suggestion by the SDLP leader that we would be happy to close down the Assembly. This is not about satisfying a particular party; this is about seeking to obtain satisfaction for everyone who is dedicated to democracy. As I have said, I want to see everyone in Northern Ireland enjoying the same privileges, rights, freedoms and enjoyment of democracy as me. That is what we must aim for.

Many aspects of the Assembly are strange. The Standing Orders of the Assembly when it was brought into being were very similar to these orders. In fact, I accuse the Secretary of State of copying those orders, which the UUP and others accepted, so he has reproduced what was foisted on us. A new creature may be being formed, but its orders are almost identical to the previous ones. I have not had time to examine the orders because I am awaiting a report from the fellow who is supposed to work for me, but it will be interesting to see the comparison. I note that the Secretary of State is not holding up his hand in the confessional box and confessing that the orders are new.

Mr. Hain: I am not sure whether the right hon. Gentleman allows confessions in his church, but I happily confess that he is right that the orders are similar to the previous ones.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I believe in confession but I do not believe in absolution, so I cannot absolve the right hon. Gentleman, which would probably take a very long time, but that is a matter for another debate on another day.

We must face up to the fact that the sooner the people of Northern Ireland and their elected representatives meet with the common purpose of building on a democratic foundation, the sooner we will make progress. If that were to happen, we could make rapid progress.

In the Tea Room today, someone said to me, "You seemed to be in good form yesterday." I replied, "I certainly was, because I believe that yesterday we were striking a note that needed to be struck." I am going into the Assembly with my party to seek with all my strength to get it built on a firm democratic foundation. If we do that, there will be success.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I am sure that all hon. Members echo the words of the right hon. Gentleman. We all hope that there will be a secure democratic foundation and that the proper Assembly can come into being again and exercise its proper functions.

I welcome the fact that the Secretary of State is going to reply to this debate, because he must face up to a number of important facts. He knows that I would not question his good intentions or his personal integrity because I have considerable admiration for the Secretary of State and we have enjoyed a cordial relationship in various capacities in this House. However, he must recognise that he is taking to himself the most enormous powers in this Bill. Whether he aspires to the feathered hat of the pro-consul, or whether he aspires to the uniform of the commissar, he is taking powers that any pro-consul or commissar would be extremely pleased to have.

For a start, the Secretary of State is appointing every member of the body. I support the suggestion from the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) that it would be clearer and therefore more honest to call the body something other than "the Assembly"—"the forum" would be fine. Although it will consist of the members who were elected to the Assembly, it is not the Assembly—it is the Secretary of State's creature, and he is giving himself powers to direct how it shall perform, who shall preside over it and what it shall do. He is also reserving powers to say that if he does not like what happens, he can tell the Assembly to do other things.

Three democratic parties from Northern Ireland are represented in this House and their credentials are beyond question. I accept that the DUP, the SDLP and the UUP genuinely want the Assembly to succeed, so it is important to take account of what they say. As the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) has said, the amendments contain a remarkable degree of agreement between the three parties.

There is a perception that the Secretary of State and the Government as a whole pay more attention to the party that is not here than to the parties that are. I hope that the Secretary of State is listening because the point is very important—when the Whip has stopped talking to him, he can listen. There is a perception that the party that is not here is more highly regarded and taken greater account of than the parties that are. I am not saying that that is the case; I am saying that that is the perception.

The Secretary of State must make it abundantly clear in what he says today and in the extremely sensitive talks that will take place in the coming weeks that those who play by the rules—the DUP, the SDLP and the UUP—have a special position which the others can have, if they want it. All the others have to do is what we said yesterday during what was, as the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) has said, an extremely constructive Second Reading debate.

There was very little disagreement yesterday. There was a unity of desire to see a proper Assembly functioning properly with all its elected Members and a recognition that, in order for that to happen, Sinn Fein has to play by the rules and show that it is so doing. We all welcomed the report by the Independent Monitoring Commission. Everyone, including the right hon. Member for North Antrim and his deputy, the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), recognised that there has been real progress, but underlined the continuing, disturbing involvement in criminality among some of those in Sinn Fein that puts in question its aspirations towards democratic credentials.

I hope that the Secretary of State will address those points full on when he deals with the substance of the amendments. As he does so, will he explain why he cannot heed the unity of view between the three Northern Ireland parties represented here on the subject of Orders in Council? The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire made that point effectively, persuasively and, if I may say so, persistently, and he was right to do so.

The months between May and November will be vital if we are to reach agreement and move forward. I hope for a long period when there will be no disruption of the Assembly, Assembly will follow Assembly, and people in Northern Ireland with political aspirations, whether Unionist or nationalist, will stand for it, be elected to it and work within it. Having called this creature into being, I ask the Secretary of State to trust it and not to do things in this House that take away from it some of the difficult and crucial decisions with which it, and it alone, should grapple.

The Assembly must have red meat—real issues to deal with—and be able to show the people of Northern Ireland that they can trust it. We are all disturbed about the percentage of people who vote in elections. If they are to vote for the Assembly in large numbers, it must have real power to deal with big issues such as the structure of local government in Northern Ireland. That was mentioned by many Members yesterday and again today by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan), who made some extremely good points. The current structure of local government in Northern Ireland is not welcomed by anybody. Twenty-six local authorities are far too many at a time when there is a proliferation of other bodies. However, in lighting upon the figure of seven, which is supported only by the party that is not represented here, the Government are creating unpopularity and difficulty for themselves.

I beg the Secretary of State to go gently on this until November, so that the Assembly can determine whether the number should be seven, nine or whatever. We are fully agreed that it should be substantially fewer than 26, but let it be a figure that commands support across the board in Northern Ireland, so that the right hon. Member for North Antrim and the hon. Members for Foyle and for North Down and others can all say, "Yes, we recognise this, we want to work with it, and we want it to be the framework for our local government for coming generations."

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend is making a thoughtful and powerful speech. He has put his finger on the key point—that it is a question of trust. The Secretary of State is asking the parties represented here to trust the peace process. Should not he in turn trust Assembly Members to shape their own future?

Sir Patrick Cormack: Of course. Trust must be reciprocal and indivisible. The Secretary of State is saying to the House, "Trust me"—and, on a personal level, I do. I therefore say to him, "Trust the people of Northern Ireland", as represented by active and vigorous Members of Parliament who have all proclaimed their dedication to a proper Assembly. I ask him not to make irreversible changes to the structure of Northern Ireland and the fabric of its society before the Assembly has come into being. If the Assembly does not come into being, that is a different story, but let us have at least until November before irrevocable decisions are set in stone in Northern Ireland.

A proud people in a beautiful part of the United Kingdom care passionately—even though they do not always agree—about the education system and the shape and framework of local government. Although many things about Northern Ireland are not normal and there are many things that some of us do not like, we cannot question the deep intensity of local patriotism, which is admirable and must be harnessed to a productive future. I know that the Secretary of State has a regard for the people of Northern Ireland. I ask him to show it by treading softly when he insists on what the House passes in the coming months.

I hope that the Secretary of State will touch on the small but important point that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire made about parliamentary privilege, which is again part and parcel of trust. We know how difficult it is to prove malice. How can I prove the innermost thoughts of the right hon. Member for North Antrim or of my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), who may think that I am going on inordinately at the moment?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: No, of course not.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I am delighted. However, how do I know what anybody else thinks? How do I know what motivates people? I have to trust people. Just as I would trust the Secretary of State, I ask him not to shackle the privilege of those who meet in forum or conclave and what they can say to and about each other.

I said yesterday that the task in Northern Ireland—it is a joint task—is to make hatred history. We have spoken much about making poverty history recently, and that is good. To make hatred history, we have to work together. That requires a great deal of sacrifice, especially by those who have suffered. The communities represented by Northern Ireland Members on the other side of the House have suffered; those represented by Northern Ireland Members on my left have suffered enormously. Those who are not here but could be present to argue their cause have inflicted much of that suffering. They have not expressed remorse for doing so. We are going to have to draw a line without that expression of remorse, and that is quite a task.

I, too, have lost close friends and colleagues as a result of the troubles, as we all have on this side of the House. Those men were popular across the House. If we are to begin to create the climate for a new era of trust, it is incumbent on the Secretary of State to be cautious about what he pushes through Westminster in the next six months. He should devote his time almost exclusively to Northern Ireland. I am sure that the people of Wales will not mind. He knows that I do not like the dual mandate that he holds, although that is not his fault.

Let us use the Bill as a launching pad for the true democracy that the people of Northern Ireland richly deserve.

Mr. Peter Robinson: I want to comment on one or two amendments in the group. I agree with the comments of the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) about amendment No. 6. In the Democratic Unionist party document, "Facing Reality", which preceded the Government's initiative, we stated clearly that we wanted an Assembly that would exercise the maximum power and responsibility that was consistent with the circumstances. We never advocated a talking shop. Indeed, we put forward in the document a number of options to be considered by the political parties in Northern Ireland, one of which was legislative devolution. That option would still have allowed the executive functions to be performed by the direct-rule Ministers, while allowing legislative rule by the Assembly. The proposal by the SDLP is a small gesture in that direction, but it is none the less a helpful suggestion, and my party colleagues and I are quite happy to support it. Indeed, the Secretary of State and Her Majesty's Government will start to lose credibility if they turn down a reasonable proposal that is supported by all those who are prepared to speak in this House on behalf of the electorate in Northern Ireland.

What is the Government's purpose? I had assumed that it was to establish cross-community support in Northern Ireland and to encourage the political parties to reach agreements. Here we have an agreement, however small it might be, yet the Secretary of State has not, as yet, indicated his willingness to accept this small step forward. He must relinquish some of his control and power, because the tendency, as illustrated by the Bill, is that he is seeking to draw more and more power to himself. That is not a good example for the politicians of Northern Ireland to be set by a Government who say that they want to devolve and cast off their powers. Here we have an all-party agreement among all the members from Northern Ireland in this House, yet the Secretary of State still appears to want to resist it. I hope that he will reconsider his position on these matters. As the hon. Member for South Staffordshire has suggested, the Secretary of State could review the situation when we reach 24 November. It need not be set in stone for all time.

The purpose of this Assembly is that it will be a transitional Assembly that will move towards full executive devolution. This measure seems to be a very adequate way of performing that task.

Sammy Wilson: Given the filters in amendment No. 6—including the requirement for cross-community support, and the provision that the Secretary of State would still have powers to make urgent orders without reference to the Assembly—does my hon. Friend agree that this is in fact a very modest proposal? Surely the Secretary of State should have no difficulty in accepting it.

Mr. Robinson: My hon. Friend makes a powerful argument. I hope that, as the Secretary of State has been considering these matters, he will have been swayed by the arguments that have been presented from both sides of the House on this matter.

A number of issues were raised during this short debate that bring two words to mind: "mountains" and "molehills". We are at times inclined to get into the minutiae to such an extent that we lose track of the key issues.

Let me deal with the issue of the Assembly and the Northern Ireland Assembly. This is not a new issue; we faced it in 1998. We are talking about a transitional Assembly that will move from its present structures and powers towards a creation that we hope will eventually have full executive authority. The Ulster Unionist party did not oppose such a metamorphosis in 1998, and I am surprised that it is opposing it today. The words used to describe the body—be it "assembly" or "forum"—are pretty meaningless in reality. It is the Assembly. It is not the Northern Ireland Assembly as set up under the 1998 legislation. It has a specific role that would take it seamlessly from its existence under this Bill to an existence that we hope it will have under an amended version of the 1998 Act, given that that legislation will have to be amended.

2.45 pm

Indeed, the seamless transition is detailed in the Bill, in that certain powers automatically given to this Assembly will be given, without any further action, to the new Assembly that follows it—for instance, in relation to the Presiding Officer's position, the enrolment process for Assembly Members and their designation, and decisions taken in relation to the First and Deputy First Minister and other Executive positions. By being taken by this body, those powers will automatically get taken by the new Northern Ireland Assembly under, I hope, an amended 1998 Act. We are talking about a transitional Assembly, and I suppose that putting the word "transitional" in the title might have made its intention and purpose clearer.

I do not think that the terms used in the Bill do great violence to the overall position and future of Northern Ireland. Certainly, I am not greatly exercised about what the body is called. We all know what it is intended to do, and what its purpose is to be. I simply hope that the public will be more concerned with what the Assembly does than with what it is called. If the Members of that Assembly do a job that gets the favour of the community in Northern Ireland, they will worry little whether it might be confused with some other body that has been in suspension for a long period.

Lady Hermon: Will the hon. Gentleman outline for the benefit of us all exactly what he anticipates this new Assembly doing that will charm and impress the people of Northern Ireland?

Mr. Robinson: Members of the Democratic Unionist party are certainly committed to using every platform that that Assembly will provide to speak on behalf of the people of Northern Ireland, and to test the Secretary of State in terms of agreements that we can reach with others on key matters relating to education, the review of public administration, rating and the economy in general. We will speak on behalf of the people of Northern Ireland, and the people of Northern Ireland want us to have that voice. More than that, they want the Government to heed that voice. For that reason, the Secretary of State could go a long way to add to the importance and vitality of that Assembly were he willing to accept the amendment tabled by the SDLP.

Lembit Öpik: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, if he is at all worried about getting permission from the decision makers, he could phone Sinn Fein and get its permission, because it would probably also like to have those powers? Whatever other differences there are, I have little doubt that Sinn Fein could see the benefits of having those powers bestowed on this interim Assembly.

Mr. Robinson: I will leave it to the hon. Gentleman to speak on behalf of Sinn Fein. I will certainly not attempt to do so. I simply know that the people of Northern Ireland want to have real decisions taken within that Assembly. They want it to have as much power as is possible. If it is not possible immediately to have an Executive set up, the Members of that Assembly should press the Secretary of State to divest himself of some of the powers that this legislation gives him, and to devolve some of those powers in whatever way is possible, whether through a corporate Assembly, legislative devolution or administration devolution, to the elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland.

On privilege, again, I have difficulty with the position of the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon). First, the terms are almost identical to those in 1998. Far from opposing the position in 1998, her party supported it. Therefore, what the Government are doing in relation to the privilege of the Assembly has consistency. Having discovered that, I think that she decided to see whether she could find some more secure ground, and became a defender of the media and the press—not always a popular position among politicians, but then she cannot be accused of always taking popular positions. I do not think, however, that the press have anything to fear. The Secretary of State may tell the hon. Lady and me whether this is indeed the case, but according to my reading of the legislation the statement, not the Member, is covered by privilege. If the statement is reported, it is covered by privilege, and the media are therefore entitled to publish it. The media will be covered in exactly the same way as the Member, because it is the statement that enjoys the privilege.

As the hon. Lady said, the privilege is not the full privilege enjoyed by the House of Commons and the Northern Ireland Assembly created under the 1998 Act, but I do not believe that the distinction will have any real implications for Assembly Members or for the press. I agree with those who have said that it will be very difficult for anyone to prove malice in the courts. Indeed, I am not entirely sure whether it is right, if a Member uses—or abuses—privilege and attempts, with malice, to damage and defame individuals, for even this House to confer such a degree of privilege.

I have used the privilege of this House on many occasions. I have named individuals, and made clear what information I have had about the activities of those individuals. However, I have never done that with malice. I have done it because I have believed it to be in the public interest, and have believed my facts to be accurate. If any Member stands up in the Northern Ireland Assembly and, with malice, determines to "out" or defame someone, I am not sure that that Member should enjoy the privilege of the Assembly—but I repeat yet again that it will not be the full-blown Assembly in which, normally, robust exchanges would take place that might require the exercise of that privilege.

As a party that is always very careful about what it says and would not seek to stretch the bounds of privilege, my party has nothing to fear. I hope that the hon. Lady's remarks are not a harbinger of something from which some of her Assembly colleagues may need protection.

Lady Hermon: I cannot possibly speak for my Assembly colleagues. I could not tie their hands or gag them, for that matter. I have never been able to do so in the past, and I shall not be able to do so in the future.

Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is a distinction to be drawn? According to paragraph 6 of schedule 1, only a will be covered by limited privilege in this new creature, the Assembly. The key word that is missing is "publication": no privilege will attach to publication of a statement made by a Member of the Assembly.

"written or oral statement made by a member"

Mr. Robinson: The statement is covered by privilege, whether it is heard directly, heard through transmission or read in newspapers. If that is not the case, the Secretary of State ought to tell us, or at least tell the media, but according to my everyday understanding of the language, the statement is covered irrespective of whether it is repeated by a Member or by the press, and therefore no action can be taken against either.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman ought to give some credence to what has been said by the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon). Section 50(1) of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 is very clear about the position that obtained before that date. It states:

"For the purposes of the law of defamation, absolute privilege shall attach to—

(a) the making of a statement in proceedings of the Assembly; and

(b) the publication of a statement under the Assembly's authority."

I am not sure whether schedule 1 would cover publication, and I think that we need clarification from the Secretary of State. Furthermore, the hon. Gentleman will doubtless agree that lawyers who do not want statements to be covered by privilege will try to argue that they are made maliciously. As drafted, this provision could lead to considerable arguments and put the leader of the Assembly in a difficult position.

Mr. Robinson: I suspect that the person who made the statement would be in a difficult position, rather than the Assembly's Presiding Officer. I assume that the section that the hon. Gentleman quoted from is from the 1998 Act.

Mr. Clifton-Brown indicated assent.

Mr. Robinson: Therefore, under it, both the publication and the person to whom the remarks are attributed are covered by full privilege; however, the Bill establishes that they will not be so covered. Privilege will be qualified, in that such a statement must have been made without malice; alternatively, it must be impossible to prove that it has been made with malice.

There are two further issues on which I want to comment, the first of which is the powers of the Secretary of State. I said to the hon. Member for North Down in the House yesterday that I concurred with many of her misgivings about the storing up of more and more power—indeed, unfettered power—in the Secretary of State. Effectively, in many instances he can do what he thinks fit, which is clearly a cause for concern. However, the difficulty is that although the hon. Lady has taken away such responsibilities from the Secretary of State through her amendment, she has given them to no one else.

That takes us back to the question of why the Secretary of State is setting up "the Assembly", rather than "the Northern Ireland Assembly". Had he detailed all such responsibilities and designated them to various individuals, or groups of individuals, in effect he would have been amending the entire 1998 Act. I would not have worried greatly about amending the 1998 Act, but I suspect that there are some people sitting behind the Minister who would not be too keen on doing so.

Of course, the reality is that the jobs that the Secretary of State has been given the power to perform under the Bill have to be performed. If we are to remove his responsibility for performing them, we must also amend the Bill to give that responsibility to the Assembly or someone else. That is the deficiency in the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for North Down, but I concur with her view that the Secretary of State is taking far too much on to himself. It would show greater faith in the elected representatives of Northern Ireland if he vested some of that responsibility in the Assembly itself.

I turn finally to the election of the Presiding Officer. The wording in paragraph 2(6) of schedule 2 is clumsy and unusual, even if it is not such that I would oppose it outright. I do not like the idea of somebody appointed by a Secretary of State being "deemed to have been elected".

The Secretary of State is not the Northern Ireland electorate—he does not have the power to elect anybody in Northern Ireland. He can appoint, and I would have been quite content for him to make the "appointment", and for it to stand until the Northern Ireland Assembly itself elected someone. Paragraph 2(6) of schedule 2 states:

"The person who is presiding officer of the Assembly immediately before the effective date"— the Secretary of State's appointee—

"shall be deemed to have been elected as Presiding Officer of the Northern Ireland Assembly under section 39(1) of the 1998 Act".

3 pm

I hope that that will not be an issue. I would far rather that the Assembly met and elected its own Presiding Officer or Speaker. That would be an indication of the maturity of the Assembly and its ability to reach agreement. Indeed, if it could not reach agreement on such issues, one must question whether it would reach agreement on some of the greater issues that it will face. I hope that it does not become an issue, but I do not like the idea that the Secretary of State can be deemed to have elected a Presiding Officer for the Assembly. In reality, the person concerned will be the Secretary of State's appointee and, with due respect to the Secretary of State, will have less authority as an appointee than if elected by the Assembly as its Speaker.

I hope that the Assembly will elect a Speaker, but I am concerned by the terminology in the legislation. It suggests that the Secretary of State can allow the Assembly to elect its Speaker, but it does not have the power to do so until such time as it reverts to Northern Ireland Assembly mode. Under the present mode, it will not have the power through this legislation or under the draft standing orders—some of us at least have seen them—to elect a Speaker.

Mr. Dodds: My hon. Friend's point is given added weight when one considers that not only was the Presiding Officer appointed by the Secretary of State alone, but no one in any of the political parties was even consulted on the appointment. That is a cause of great concern.

Mr. Robinson: My hon. Friend is right. He will remember that, when we met with the Secretary of State before the appointment was made, we asked whether he would consult the political parties before he decided. He made it clear that there would not be any consultation and that was borne out by the fact that the person who appears to have been most surprised by the appointment of Eileen Bell as the Presiding Officer was the leader of her party. It was not the first time that he had been surprised to discover that an appointment had been made. None of that should detract from the credibility of the individual involved. I wish Eileen Bell well, and my colleagues and I have no intention of making life difficult for her—I am sure that she will be pleased to hear that. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) has already personally wished her well. I trust that she will have deputies who will give her the necessary support. The position would, however, have greater authority if it were elected by the Assembly.

I would like the Secretary of State to make it clear that although the legislation says that he may authorise the Assembly to elect a Presiding Officer, he will do so and allow the position greater authority. Otherwise we will be in the ludicrous position of the Assembly Members barely being able to breathe without the permission of the Secretary of State, which would make it something less than a talking shop. He must let go of the leash and allow the Assembly to take on more and more responsibility. That is the least that he can do.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): This has been an interesting debate and I have listened intently to those hon. Members who have spoken. Many questions have been posed and we await the answers from the Secretary of State, although some limited light has been shed on the subject by his interventions this afternoon. That is deeply appreciated.

The Government must reveal their true intention. In reality, no one is under any illusion about that true intention. We all know that it is the Government's design and intention to get the Democratic Unionist party, the Ulster Unionist party, the Social Democratic and Labour party and Sinn Fein-IRA into government, but only the last of those parties has a dual title, so we have to ensure that the democratic credentials of all those participating in government are clear.

My right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) has made it abundantly clear that neither the Government nor anyone else will be able to cajole, pressurise or even humour our party into anything that is not in the best interests of the people of Northern Ireland and that is not built on the solid foundation of true democracy. There is a great challenge to those who were inextricably linked to terrorism in the past. They must completely renounce violence; for them, the path of terror must be consigned to the history books. There must be recognition of the primacy and authority of the security forces. They must support the efforts of the police to ensure law and order and the safety of everyone in the community—everyone equal under the law and equally subject to the law.

Her Majesty's security forces must and will be supported in exercising their legitimate authority to move against and defeat terrorism. We must make that abundantly clear. People who want us to believe that they have moved away from their terrorist path must support the security forces, the police and the Army, in their efforts to defeat and bring to book those who are still active in terrorism, who may be in the Real IRA—although we are told it has moved away from terrorism—or the Continuity IRA. There is no hiding place. If people want to be part of the Government, they have to say that they will support the security forces in their efforts to track down and defeat Continuity IRA. They have to come up to the mark. Members should make no mistake: we will not be cajoled, pressurised or humoured into accepting a second-rate Administration.

The people of Northern Ireland have the right to a true democratic solution, based on firm democratic principles, and that is what we want for them. We must be assured that all the criminality and corruption of the past has been rejected, and that there is repentance and genuine remorse for the slaughter of the innocent, so that we can move forward on democratic grounds. That is what is expected in a democracy. Nothing less would be accepted for membership of Government in this place, the Scottish Parliament or the Welsh Assembly, so nothing less than those credentials will be acceptable to us.

As I said yesterday, we are a devolutionist party. We want a return to strong devolution in Northern Ireland with a devolved Government who can deal with the issues that affect the lives of the people of Northern Ireland.

I have listened carefully to SDLP Members and looked carefully at their amendments. My hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) rightly acknowledged our general support for amendment No. 6, but in respect of amendments Nos. 7 and 8, I have to say, with the greatest respect to the leader of the SDLP, the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan), that he must leave the dark ages and move on from the Belfast agreement. We are in a new century from the agreement. He must leave the old century, enter the new one and come into the real world. It is amazing that despite his knowledge of the failures of the Belfast agreement, he does not want a jot or tittle removed from it; we must abide by it, warts and all. That is a totally untenable position. No one with any common sense could accept it.

Let me give an example of what the hon. Member for Foyle is asking us to ensure that we continue with and that the Secretary of State would activate under the Belfast agreement. Ministers can act like little dictators, irrespective of the will of the Assembly. That is totally unacceptable. The hon. Gentleman said earlier that if we did not come up to the mark by 25 November, if we had not settled and if we had had no impact on the issues that affect the people of Northern Ireland, those parties would stand condemned by the electorate.

Let me just remind the hon. Gentleman that, for the majority of people in Northern Ireland—not the majority of the Unionist community, but the majority of Unionist and nationalist people—the majority argument on education started in the Assembly. Ministers are activating that which was decided by an unaccountable Minister in the Assembly who acted like a dictator, rather than like someone in a democracy. That is not acceptable.

The will of the Assembly must be paramount; it must be that which is accepted. Members are telling the Secretary of State that taking account must mean more than taking account and that he must act accordingly. If we are to re-establish everything in the Belfast agreement, will the hon. Member for Foyle set his mind back to what happened? Ministers did not act according to the will of the Assembly. They heard what the Assembly said, for example, on education, but they did what they wanted to do.

Let us talk about health and the closure of hospitals. It is very good for Sinn Fein-IRA Members to come out on the streets and say, "We must keep Omagh hospital" and "We must keep the Mid-Ulster hospital", but who took the decision to close those hospitals? Where did that start? The decision came from the Assembly. With the greatest respect, Ministers—I have many arguments with them—are simply carrying forward decisions that Barbara Brown took and they are putting them into action. How did she decide that? Did she decide it by the will of the Assembly? No. She acted contrary to the will of the Assembly. Why did she do that? She did it according to her political affiliation and therefore she felt at the time that she wanted to do it because she wanted to ensure that the Fermanagh and South Tyrone seat would be secured in the Westminster elections. She and her party played with the lives of the people. They played with the health of the people. They knew that West Tyrone was safe for Sinn Fein and therefore they wanted to secure Fermanagh and South Tyrone. Therefore, they established the hospital in Fermanagh and they closed Omagh hospital.

Rev. Ian Paisley: May I remind the House of what happened with the Jubilee hospital and with the chairman of the maternity hospital, too? The chairman of the committee was an SDLP man and he said, "No!", but the Sinn Fein member of the Executive took the decision and laughed at the SDLP and everyone else.

Dr. McCrea: My right hon. Friend is exactly right. In fact, in the example of the Jubilee hospital, which is in south Belfast, it was politically expedient for the then Minister, Barbara Brown—Sinn Fein-IRA—to make a proposal for west Belfast, for Gerry's seat. Therefore, they did not care about the health of the people or about the will of the people. In fact, on that occasion, a previous Member for Belfast, West—Dr. Joe Hendron—was the chairman of the health committee. He and other Members of the SDLP disagreed with that decision simply on health grounds, and it was referred twice to the court. The Minister was ordered by the court to revisit her decision, but she still went on with it, irrespective of that. We have got to be very careful.

3.15 pm

The Belfast agreement, as it stands, was rejected by the majority of the people of Northern Ireland. We have got to accept that that is the will of the people and that should be taken into account. If the hon. Member for Foyle is asking the Secretary of State to take account of the will of the people in activating decisions, he ought to take account of it, as well.

Mark Durkan: The hon. Gentleman has raised the issue of the decision in relation to maternity services in Belfast. He has misrepresented the facts of that situation. Everybody agreed that a decision had to be taken on one side or the other—the position could not be sustained on two sides. There was going to be no cross-community support available for a decision on one side or the other. The SDLP supported the Minister in taking the decision that she took. Joe Hendron, as the SDLP person who was the chair of the health committee, did not disagree with the Minister on health grounds. His interest was as the chair of the committee, respecting the committee's interest and locus. The other SDLP member of that committee was the representative of South Belfast who disagreed on constituency grounds. So, the hon. Gentleman misrepresents the situation.

Dr. McCrea: The SDLP is saying that its member disagreed on constituency grounds—so, it is willing to play with the issue, as well. We should be dealing with the issue on health grounds, and health grounds alone, instead of trying to play around with people's lives and futures.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): May I just bring some semblance of reality to the debate? The then Minister, Barbara Brown, had announced in An Phoblacht, a republican rag sheet, that she was going to locate the maternity services at the Royal Victoria hospital site, even before the committee took its decision to support the Belfast City hospital site. A majority of people voted for the Belfast City hospital site, but the Minister overruled that.

Dr. McCrea: I thank my hon. Friend—

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I understand that these matters are relevant to the debate, but I do not think that we ought to have lengthy re-runs of things that have happened in the past.

Dr. McCrea: Thank you, Sir Michael.

I have to make clear what the hon. Member for Foyle has suggested to the Secretary of State: amendment No. 7 really says, "Listen, irrespective of the will of the people, let us go back to the Belfast agreement." The hon. Member for Foyle had better realise that the Belfast agreement is dead. We have moved on. The people of Northern Ireland, through their electorate, have moved on. That is why his party has three Members in this House, the Democratic Unionist party has nine and the Ulster Unionists have one. It is because the electorate have moved on. We cannot accept a situation in which no cognisance is given to the realities of what is going on and in which there is an attempt to pretend that we must have what has failed in the past. We have to look at the realities, rather than our wish list for the future.

There was a lot of stir about the word "Assembly". Should what we are discussing be called an assembly? Is it a forum, rather than an assembly? In many ways, that is a storm in a teacup. Those who are going to the Assembly are Assembly Members. With the greatest respect, it is not a forum. In 1996, I was elected to a forum—the Northern Ireland Forum. It was a forum and so I was called a Forum Member, not an Assembly Member. No one can call what we are discussing a forum, because I am not a Forum Member. I will be called there because I am an Assembly Member. That is why the invitation will be issued to me. Why is the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) not invited? Because she is not an Assembly Member. Others will be invited because they are Assembly Members.

The body will not be the Northern Ireland Assembly, or the new Northern Ireland Assembly, but will be the Assembly of the Assembly Members of Northern Ireland. We should not take up time in the House by arguing that the body should be called not the Assembly, but the "Forum", or something else, because no one can call it anything else. Assembly Members will be assembling together because they are Assembly Members.

Lady Hermon: I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman and disagree with most of what he is saying. He cannot have it both ways. He has said repeatedly that the Belfast agreement is dead, but now claims that time is being wasted discussing whether the new creature is an Assembly or not. Will he kindly accept that as the Northern Ireland Assembly is the creation of the Belfast agreement, the agreement cannot be dead? He is looking forward to getting back into the Assembly created by the Belfast agreement, which is definitely not dead.

Dr. McCrea: We will not carry out a funeral procession today because the funeral for the Belfast agreement was held at the time of the last election. No one is suggesting that the body will be the new Northern Ireland Assembly, but it will be an Assembly of Members who were elected to the Northern Ireland Assembly. It is a waste of the House's time to try to put another name on the Assembly because only Assembly Members will be invited to it, so I will not spend any more time on that point.

The hon. Member for North Down mentioned the 1998 Act when she talked about bringing the First Minister and Deputy First Ministers together. I know the motives behind the Ulster Unionists' position on that, but, once again, we have to move on. If there is one thing that the hon. Lady should know, it is that the people of Northern Ireland made a decision about the Belfast agreement at the last election. With the greatest respect, no one can resuscitate or revive the agreement because the people, through the ballot box, have moved on.

Just because a decision was taken years ago, are we going to live with the failures of the past? Do we not want a brighter and saner future for our people by moving away from putting criminals and terrorists into government and towards a situation in which the only credential for a person to hold ministerial office is democracy and democracy alone? That is why I ask the House to allow those who were elected as Assembly Members to meet and discuss. I hope that the Secretary of State and his Ministers will take account of not only Assembly Members' decisions, but the wise counsel given by the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) when he asked the Secretary of State to hold back on the likes of the offensive decisions on the review of public administration, at least until the November deadline has arrived. The House and the Secretary of State would do well to heed such wise counsel.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): I will be brief because we have had a long debate on the amendments, probably because they are wide ranging. I do not especially want to join in the debate on what the name for the new Assembly should be. There is a little confusion about what the Bill does and it has sometimes been difficult to explain that to people, who have responded by saying, "Oh, so you're setting up a shadow Assembly," and I have replied that it is not quite like that. Although the situation is difficult, I do not want to take up the Committee's time on that issue.

As other hon. Members said, it is important that the Assembly deals with real issues. That will be an incentive to make it work, so that the real Assembly—or the Northern Ireland Assembly, as I should call it—can be set up and full devolution can be realised. If it ends up as a talking shop, which I very much hope it will not, we will not have served the cause of devolution well.

I endorse everything that my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) said. In particular, it is important that we put on hold as many statutory instruments as possible until the Assembly is up and running and fully able to consider those matters. We recently considered water rates and local government, and we are about to consider education. Those are big issues. I do not want to get to the point in November, or, I hope, before then, when devolution is fully triggered, to find that the Assembly is landed with a load of legislation of which it does not approve. That would not be a helpful start.

I appeal to the Secretary of State to allow the Assembly to have something left to do. That is important. However, it is wrong for this House to decide such important matters for the 1.7 million people who live in Northern Ireland. I do my best from the Dispatch Box and in Committee, but I do not have, and do not pretend to have, the knowledge that hon. Members from Northern Ireland have. We all do our best, but we cannot have the same expertise as they have.

On privilege in the Assembly, again, I am not a lawyer, but I would find it odd if the word "malice" remains as a qualification in paragraph 6 of schedule 1. I realise that malice is an important factor in the law on murder, for example, but we are talking about a very different matter when it comes to defamation. To prove that someone said something with malice would be very difficult. I do not think that it should remain in the paragraph.

We would have preferred the Assembly to elect the Presiding Officer, for the reason given by the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson). He or she would command greater authority, and it would also be fairer for the Assembly and the people who serve in that office.

On the Secretary of State's powers to set the proceedings of the Assembly, it would have been useful for the Bill to include "after consultation with the Presiding Officer." That might have been better, but probably only if the Presiding Officer had been elected by the Assembly, rather than appointed by the Secretary of State, to avoid an incestuous relationship.

We have some concern about the fact that the Secretary of State is taking on extra powers. We seem to be considering so much legislation. Some of it is definitive, but then we come to a clause that says, "The Secretary of State can do this, that and the other", and think, "Why bother sitting through all the deliberations if he can do that?" I am fearful of that, because it is wrong to vest so much power in any one person. I have no objection to this particular Secretary of State, but it would lead to more statutory instruments, which we all want to avoid. He should think about the powers that he is taking and whether they are going to lead to more statutory instruments. I think we would agree that that would not be a good thing. However, it is a temporary measure, and we do not intend to divide the Committee on it.

We wish the Bill well and look forward to hearing what the Secretary of State has to say in reply to a number of good points raised.

3.30 pm

Mr. Hain: I thank the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) for a helpful contribution, in which he legitimately probed a number of points.

For the record, I inform the House that the draft standing orders were in the Vote Office from this morning, they were placed in the Library yesterday and they were circulated to all the parties, so I think I have discharged my obligations in that respect.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) for her reference to the death of my father-in-law, Lieutenant Commander Douglas Haywood. The House will want to know that he served the Navy as a naval commander with great distinction in the second world war and afterwards.

Clause 1 makes it clear that under the Bill the primary task before the Assembly will be to elect a First and Deputy First Minister, and to ensure that the remaining ministerial portfolios are filled upon restoration. It also permits the Secretary of State to refer other matters to the Assembly. Schedule 1 sets out the arrangements under which the Assembly will function in this phase.

Let me make general points about the matters raised by the amendments, before I turn in detail to points raised with me by right hon. and hon. Members. There was a lengthy discussion yesterday about the Assembly's role in relation to current issues that may be referred to it, apart from its central task of selecting an Executive. There was a suggestion that we intended the Assembly merely to be a talking shop. A number of hon. Members suggested, as has been suggested this afternoon, that in order to confirm that that was not the case, we should amend the Bill so as somehow to give the Assembly formal powers over legislation in the period before restoration.

The Assembly is most definitely not intended to be a talking shop. I disagree flatly with the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) on the matter. I do not want to debate with him or to make a remark that he may see as provocative, but some of the contributions this afternoon have not taken account of the background to the present position. I made it clear that I would have preferred a shadow Assembly—a period in which we could have built up trust and working together, and then moved to restoration. That was expressly rejected by the SDLP and by Sinn Fein, who wished instead to move straight to restoration, or to try to do so.

I remind the Committee that we have sought to bring the two positions together and get the Assembly going, seeking to achieve the successful election of a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister in its early days, and the selection of the Executive as well. We have sought to do that, but not with any great expectation that it would succeed, and then to move forward with a deadline at the end of November.

[Mr. Hain]

We hope that the Assembly is a body on the brink of assuming powers over a wide range of economic and social issues in Northern Ireland. That is the objective. The issues that have most often been suggested for referring to it are the ones that are not merely currently important—education and so on—but will raise important questions on the agenda of any devolved Administration and Assembly that assumes power in the near future. Any views that the Assembly expresses from 15 May onwards would need to be listened to very carefully by all concerned, and particular account would have to be taken—I give this assurance—of any that were expressed with cross-community support.

In the nicest way, I remind the hon. Member for South Antrim (Dr. McCrea), who advanced his arguments with passion, that I was the one who helped to draft the statement made by both Prime Ministers in Armagh and inserted the specific references to education, water charges, local government and economic policy, and I am the Secretary of State who has arranged for the business community to come and make an early presentation to the Assembly on its case for economic reform. That is an opportunity—to use a phrase mentioned earlier—for real meat to be discussed in the Assembly. In response to representations made by the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) and a cross-party delegation that he brought, to which he referred yesterday on the subject of industrial de-rating, that is also a matter that I would refer to the Assembly.

I cannot make the Assembly discuss anything. I can refer a matter to a business committee, which I hope will be established and operate by consensus, and that will refer the matter to the floor of the Assembly or to working groups, committees or whatever it decides. May I remind the House that as Secretary of State I pressed hardest for the restoration of devolution, as I want those decisions to be made by a fully restored Assembly?

Lembit Öpik: I am encouraged by the Secretary of State's comments. Given his form on devolution in Wales, I do not doubt his intentions. However, he is asking us to trust his commitment to devolution. Surely, the principle of amendment No. 6 should sit comfortably with his own desire to involve the Assembly in decision making. Is he willing to make a commitment to introduce, perhaps on Report or in another place, a formal system that would ensure that the Assembly, which starts on 15 May, plays a role in the decision-making process in Orders in Council? I do not see why he should have a problem with enshrining that in legislation.

Mr. Hain: I cannot agree to that, because we must not confuse lines of accountability. I am responsible for affairs in Northern Ireland, and I am accountable to the House. When the House considers those issues, it is obviously anxious to reflect on the Assembly's views but, ultimately, I am answerable, in the absence of a fully restored Assembly, to the House. We should not shackle ourselves.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Hain: May I finish this point before accepting interventions, including one from the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon)?

We all agree that devolution is a good thing, and those decisions are much better made in Belfast, but that cannot happen until there is necessary agreement between the parties on the structures on which devolution is to take place. Halfway houses are not possible. There is ministerial responsibility, either here or in Belfast; it is not possible to have both, or for them both to be statutorily defined, as the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) wishes. It is possible, however, to ensure that politics is at work in the Assembly and in the heed that my ministerial team and I take of its views; we must ensure that the politics works to move things forward.

I shall give a concrete example of the dilemma that we face before giving way, as I promised. All the parties oppose water charges, and they would like Northern Ireland to be a unique position, in contrast to the rest of the United Kingdom, so that such charges are not levied. That is a legitimate political case. If the Assembly were not fully restored, and I said that it could vote without responsibilities for its decisions, it would vote on water charges in an oppositionalist mode—I hope that that is not an unfair characterisation—if it decided that it did not want water charges. That decision would knock a great big hole in the budget from April next year, when it is proposed that the first tranche of water charges should be phased in. If the Assembly, acting irresponsibly, in the sense that it does not have responsibility for the consequences of its decisions, did not want water charges—I accept that no one likes to pay more money—that would knock a great big hole in the budget for health, education, children's services and agriculture. Decisions that are made therefore have consequences. The Assembly is not yet fully restored, but when we reach a point where it has responsibility, because it has an Executive who can make recommendations, and the parties in the Executive vote accordingly because they know that their decisions have consequences, I am happy for decisions on water charges, the RPA—the review of public administration—education reform and so on to be made by the Assembly.

Sir Patrick Cormack: May I try to pin down the Secretary of State on the RPA? Is he absolutely fixed on the seven new local authorities, or can that number be revised by the Assembly?

Mr. Hain: The House of Commons voted yesterday to provide instructions to the boundary commission to work on boundaries for seven councils. Parliament has therefore made its decision. However, putting that into effect will still require a series of consequential legislative and regulatory measures, which I hope will go through the Assembly.

The situation in respect of education reform is similar. Opposition to the reform proposals has been expressed, quite properly from their point of view, by DUP and UPP members, yet they have received strong support from the SDLP, Sinn Fein, the teaching profession, educationists and the business community. That shows that these matters are not as black and white as may sometimes be assumed.

Does the hon. Member for South Staffordshire want to come back on that?

Sir Patrick Cormack: As always, I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his impeccable courtesy. Two issues seem to have become slightly mixed up. I agree that there is division over the education reforms, but my observations and conversations lead me to believe that a majority is in favour of amending the 11-plus while maintaining the status quo in respect of selective schools. The Assembly should be able to perpetuate that system, if that is its wish. However, given that the three Northern Ireland parties represented and participating in this House are of one mind about the proposal for seven local authorities, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will assure me that we are not absolutely fixed on that number, whatever Parliament has decided. After all, Parliament can always re-examine a matter and reach a different decision about it, and he can always table further Orders. If the Assembly perpetuates the apparent alliance that exists, he should respond to the questions about the seven authorities.

Mr. Hain: Parliament has decided on the boundary commissioner's remit, and I have explained how the Assembly will be able to influence the subsequent pattern and delivery of local government. Further legislation is needed: I hope that the Assembly will undertake it and that we do not have to introduce it by Order in Council here.

The RPA reform proposal has not been picked out of a paper bag, as it were, to satisfy one party. I might add that the party involved—Sinn Fein, in this case—came to support the proposal very belatedly, and I assure the hon. Member for South Staffordshire that its support was not material to the decision, which was reached after wide consultation and independent assessment.

I do not want to go too far into the matter, but it has been raised and deserves a proper response. The pattern of seven councils was chosen because the local government structure in Northern Ireland needs a strong revenue base that is more or less equal between authorities. There will be no need for cross-subsidy between them, but there will be coterminosity in respect of policing and health. Various other factors apply, and I repeat that the proposal for seven authorities was not made to satisfy one particular party.

Lady Hermon: The Secretary of State has been very generous about giving way. He made a passing reference a few minutes ago to the creation of a business committee. Would he care to elaborate on the construction of that committee? Will it be a revamped and resurrected version of the one that sat in the real Northern Ireland Assembly, or will it be a creation under his direction?

Mr. Hain: Over the past week or so, I have discussed the idea of the business committee with all the parties involved, and it has received unanimous support. The committee will be made up of representatives of the major parties, in the proportions that the hon. Lady would expect, and I expect it to operate by consensus. Its first meeting is due to be held early next week and, as part of the preparatory process, the Presiding Officer is to meet the party Whips tomorrow. I want to allow the parties in the Assembly to take charge of running it, but I do not want it to implode right away, because there is the possibility that factionalisation will occur immediately if the matter is not handled carefully. I am encouraged by the response from the parties, all of which want to establish the Assembly with dignity and certainty in its early days.

3.45 pm

Lady Hermon: I have a broad smile on my face because the Secretary of State has confirmed that the Presiding Officer will be able to bring together in the same room the Whips from the DUP, Sinn Fein, the UUP and other parties in the Assembly.

Mr. Hain rose—

Mr. Dodds: What is new about that?

Mr. Hain: Indeed. The parties have always worked together in the Assembly, and the DUP has made it clear that it will do so.

On the themes raised by the hon. Member for North Down, the Assembly that will sit on 15 May will have different powers from those of the Assembly under devolution. As she has said, I will have wide discretion about how the Assembly will operate, which is entirely defensible—it would not be defensible in any permanent arrangement, but this is not a permanent arrangement. The Assembly will not operate in the manner set out in the Bill after 24 November, but we hope that it will have moved on well before that.

The hon. Member for South Staffordshire was kind enough to pay tribute to our working relationship in this House, and I value his counsel greatly. He suggested that the arrangements give priority to Sinn Fein, but that is expressly not the case. We are trying to square a circle between nationalists and republicans—who did not want a shadow Assembly and who made it emphatically clear that they would not turn up in those circumstances—and Unionists—who wanted one—and this particular mongrel is a product of those circumstances.

As a default position, I have powers as Secretary of State over the choice of Speaker and what matters are referred to the Assembly. However, nothing would delight me more than acting not as a commissar, as the hon. Member for South Staffordshire has jocularly suggested—by the way, I was mortally wounded by that suggestion—but as a facilitator with a default power to make sure that things move forward.

The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire has asked whether the Assembly could replace my appointee as Presiding Officer, and the Bill makes express provision for that eventuality in paragraph 3(1)(b) and paragraph 3(2) of schedule 1. I have suggested to the parties that we should not turn to that question for the present, because the last thing that the Assembly needs is some kind of squabble, although I have not seen any evidence that there would be any disagreement with Eileen Bell's appointment. I think that the hon. Gentleman agrees that it would not be sensible to argue about that matter at the outset, and the same procedure was followed last time. If there is a widespread wish after the summer either to confirm Eileen Bell's appointment or make a different decision, it will be possible to provide for that. After devolution, which I hope will come before the summer, the Assembly will be master of the question and will be free to elect another Presiding Officer. I mean no disrespect to Eileen Bell in raising that matter, and I am sure that the same is true of the hon. Gentleman.

It is widely accepted that there are few alternatives. We need the Assembly to select an Executive in order to pave the way for stable devolved Government. If we had reintroduced the Assembly by ending direct rule under the Northern Ireland Act 2000, and so ending the authority of Ministers and the special legislative powers, we might have created chaos. Ministers would have been selected by the d'Hondt procedure, but it is far from guaranteed that all parties would have put forward Ministers in the present circumstances—in fact, we all know that they would not have done. Consequently, we would have risked having a serious community imbalance. At the very first opportunity for more than three and a half years, we would have marched ourselves straight into a crisis. That would not be a sensible way in which to begin the difficult task of restoring trust as the basis for the restoration of the institutions.

Although we hope that an election to the offices of First Minister and Deputy First Minister will be possible within six weeks, there must be doubt about that, and if it did not happen, under the scheme of simple restoration, there would necessarily have been an Assembly election, which few people would think a good idea in itself and which would be most unlikely to advance matters. I make no apology for our having brought the Assembly back without its formal powers so that it can discuss in a calmer and more focused atmosphere the way forward to selecting an Executive, and people who will not have worked together for nearly four years can begin to experience it again and to build the necessary trust.

As to the breadth of the discretion that I am given under the Bill, it is wide—I make no secret of that—in the same way as it was in 1998 when the Assembly first met. In an ideal world, no doubt all the issues covered—the election of the Presiding Officer, times and places of meetings, the preparation of a set of Standing Orders to meet the needs of the Assembly in its current phase, where the parties sat, and so on—would have been resolved by the parties themselves. However, everybody knows that in present circumstances that could have been extraordinarily protracted, and we do not have the time. It would not be the proper way in which to start off this very important phase of getting devolved Government going again in Northern Ireland.

The Assembly must come back and concentrate on its core task of moving us towards devolution. At that stage, of course, all these arrangements fall back into the hands of the Assembly. Under the scheme of the Bill, the Standing Orders that applied in 2002 at the moment of suspension will come back into effect, displacing those that I have made. It will control its own business and it can elect its own presiding officer, as I have made clear. At that stage, there will necessarily be a greater degree of common purpose among the parties, because they will have succeeded in agreeing the means of returning to devolution, and that is the point at which they can most profitably look at these questions.

Lady Hermon: Can the Secretary of State point to one section of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 that gives the Secretary of State the power, at a transitional period when the Assembly is in shadow mode, to amend or repeal any Act of Parliament and, if he so wishes, to decide that it is expedient to do so without even bringing an order before this House?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Lady will know better than I do, because she was there at the time, that I am proceeding much as we did in 1998 in terms of the appointment of a Presiding Officer, the drawing up of Standing Orders, and so on. We will discuss the other points that she raised later.

I believe that my powers in this regard are justifiable and necessary. However, we will stay faithful to the procedures of the 1998 Act in the devolved Assembly where we can. That, I hope, comes out in the draft standing orders that we have made available. In particular, the selection of the Executive will follow closely the pattern of the 1998 Act. The Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee in the House of Lords has looked at the powers in the Bill, including those that the hon. Member for North Down has questioned. It concluded that they are appropriate in the context of the Bill, but suggested that it would be helpful to have further explanations of the way in which they are to be used. I hope that the details that I am providing, particularly the draft standing orders that we have produced, will provide the necessary reassurance.

The thrust of the Bill is in line with the sense of amendments Nos. 7 and 8, which the hon. Member for Foyle tabled. The measure is precisely about restoring the institutions that the Good Friday agreement established. The principle of fidelity to what was agreed in 1998 is important to SDLP Members—I agree with them—but I hope that they agree that the amendment does not add anything of substance. I hope that, having made their points and got those reassurances from me, they will not press the amendments.

I appreciate that the hon. Member for Foyle has strong concerns for good reasons and I therefore also stress that the talks will be all party and inclusive. I have made that point previously and I repeat it now. Whatever has or has not happened in the past, for whatever reason, it is not possible to proceed through side deals. Talks must be on an all-party basis.

Amendment No. 6, which my hon. Friends the Members for Foyle, for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell), and for South Down (Mr. McGrady) tabled, proposes that before restoration, the Assembly should be given a power of veto over legislation that is the preserve of the House. I do not believe that that is appropriate. As was said yesterday, during direct rule, which I do not want to continue for one day longer than necessary, we are accountable here for the good government of Northern Ireland and we should not tie ourselves to following the will of another body.

Nothing would give me greater pleasure than the restoration of the Assembly, with its Members again taking responsibility for transferred matters. However, I repeat that when the Assembly, on a cross-community basis, expresses views about a specific order or policy, they will be taken into account. That is different from giving a suspended Assembly a power of veto over Parliament.

The hon. Member for Foyle asked about the Secretary of State being able to refer matters to a business committee. If there is a consensus on the business committee, it can proceed without my getting involved. The last thing I want to do is get involved in the Assembly's internal affairs. I hope that that reassures the hon. Member for North Down about seating arrangements and so on. I am happy to leave such matters to the parties and the business committee. I do not want to get involved in where people will sit in the Assembly. It was a matter of contention in the past and, from what I can tell from discussions with all the parties so far, what needs to happen is pretty clear, and that will happen.

Sir Patrick Cormack: The Secretary of State used the words "taken into account". What precisely do they mean? I revert to the review of public administration, on which the three elected participating parties are of one mind. They believe that the numbers will lead to what they call Balkanisation, polarisation and so on and that Northern Ireland should be differently configured for local government. The right hon. Gentleman says that if the Assembly takes that view, it will be "taken into account". Does that mean that it will be reflected in a change?

Mr. Hain: I answered that point in respect of water charges. With all due respect to the hon. Gentleman, whose contribution I greatly value, we are going around in circles, arguing the same point. If we had a fully restored body, which took responsibility for decisions, that is one matter. Taking account of views means exactly that. In the case of a unanimous or cross-party vote, I would pay careful attention to it. I have no interest as Secretary of State, with an Assembly on its way to restoring the institutions—as I believe is the case—in doing anything that will run counter to the Assembly's decisions. That is not my purpose. However, in the meantime we have to govern. That is our responsibility and we are accountable to the House for doing that.

On the Assembly's procedures, especially those for selecting Ministers, the Bill proposes that the procedure for carrying out the primary tasks will be in line with that for which the 1998 Act provides. I hope that the hon. Member for North Down, who tabled amendments Nos. 16, 17 and 24 to 26, and the hon. Members for Montgomeryshire and for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid), who tabled amendment No. 4, have been reassured by the initial draft standing orders, which were made available to hon. Members before Second Reading, that, as the right hon. Member for North Antrim said, we are closely following the procedures. I hope that they will therefore not press the amendments.

The hon. Member for North Down asked why I had put the standing orders in so early. I did it so that the parties could discuss them and the Business Committee could form a view of them. I will happily look at any suggestions for changing any of them.

4 pm

David Simpson (Upper Bann) (DUP): I have a general question on the point that the Secretary of State made to the hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan). He said that there would be inclusive all-party talks. If, for example, Sinn Fein pulled out of the talks at some stage, would the talks continue with the main parties that were left?

Mr. Hain: The term "all-party talks" means exactly that. No party can exercise a veto, either by not appearing at the talks or by seeking to exercise a veto in some other way. If a party chooses to exclude itself, that is that party's decision.

On amendment No. 27, I understand the points that the hon. Member for North Down made about defamation and privilege, and I want to address them. I believe that it is right that the Bill should confer qualified privilege on proceedings in the Assembly in its present mode. As the hon. Member for Belfast, East quite properly pointed out to the hon. Lady, that arrangement mirrors the situation that applied in 1998. I hope that it will encourage debate that is free and frank, while discouraging accusations of a malicious nature.

I should like to go into this matter in some detail, in order to meet the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for North Down. She asked why the proceedings in the Assembly in the form envisaged to 24 November—or to restoration, if that takes place before then—were to be given a lesser degree of privilege in regard to defamation than those of the devolved Assembly. The proceedings of the old, fully fledged—as it were—Assembly enjoyed absolute privilege. In this Assembly, privilege is qualified, in a similar way to that in which it was qualified at the preliminary stage last time. That privilege will not protect the maker of defamatory statements if there is proof of malice on his or her part. The Bill gives the same degree of privilege as that accorded to the transitional Assembly in 1998—it follows exactly the same formula. That was our precedent. Indeed, it was the precedent for much of what we have put into the Bill.

Absolute privilege tends to be conferred only on fully functioning legislatures. Conferring qualified privilege under the Bill is therefore appropriate and reflects the fact that the Assembly has not been fully restored. At a time when there are serious party differences—although we are seeking to narrow them—it does not seem right to give freedom from malicious defamatory statements.

The Bill does not alter the position of the media in relation to privilege. It might assist the House if I point out that the Bill allows for statements in the Assembly to be privileged, excluding those made with malice, whether made by Assembly Members or by those who fairly and accurately report them in the media.

On the name of the Assembly, I cannot accept that it should be known as anything other than the Assembly. As the hon. Members for North Down and for Montgomeryshire have pointed out, the Assembly is composed of all those who have been elected to the full Assembly and who will constitute it on restoration. I agree with the points made by the hon. Member for Belfast, East in that respect. One of the key functions of the Assembly is the selection of an Executive. Once that function has been discharged, the way will be open for the restoration of all the devolved institutions and the resumption of the full legislative and other powers of the fully restored Assembly. The proposals by the hon. Member for North Down in amendments Nos. 21 to 23 that it should be known as "the Forum" would be misleading, although I know that that is not her intention. I hope that she will not press her amendments to a vote.

To conclude, Mrs. Heal—I am proud, as a Welsh MP, that a proud Welsh woman is in the Chair, whose husband is a proud member of my local rugby club—[Laughter.] I think that we had better call it a day at that

I want to reassure right hon. and hon. Members who have raised important points that the new Assembly, which is a difficult task and a fragile flower, is on its way, I believe, to restoration of the institutions. We need to do that by consensus. We have put in the structures with a lot of care and thought, modelled in many respects on what happened in 1998, giving the Assembly the opportunity to take full charge of its affairs, to decide what it wants, to vote on what it wants and to discuss what it wants. In that transition, a default position remains in my hands as Secretary of State to make sure that it is able to proceed in that consensual way, which I hope that it does. I hope that the whole House will back the Bill, and that those who tabled the amendments will, on hearing my reassurances, withdraw them.

Mark Durkan: In respect of amendments Nos. 7 and 8, the Secretary of State has indicated that the Government's purpose in the Bill, and the whole point of the exercise, is to give effect to re-establishing the institutions of the Good Friday agreement. On that basis, he feels that the amendments add nothing. In introducing them, I said that they were probing amendments to register that point, which was certainly made to us in meetings with the British and Irish Governments and registered strongly by the Taoiseach, not only in his joint statement with the Prime Minister on 2 March but on several other occasions. I am glad that our amendments have brought such an explicit statement from the Secretary of State. The Minister with responsibility for political development, the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson), who is now sitting next to the Secretary of State, will be glad to hear that I can take yes for an answer. On that basis, we will not press the amendments to a vote.

Among the various comments on amendments Nos. 7 and 8, there was some misunderstanding of their purpose. The right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) is not in his place, but I point out to him that I did not at any stage say that I believed that the DUP's only intent was to go into the Assembly to wreck it. How could I say that, in circumstances in which it is clear to all of us that this new creature is very much along the lines that the DUP specifically advocated? If anything, on the basis of his contribution yesterday, the DUP's intention would not be to bring down this new creature but to prolong its existence. Clearly, subsequent amendments that they have tabled would do away with the 25 November deadline. He has therefore misapprehended my concern.

In relation to the position of the DUP, I believe that, contrary to 25 November and the notion of a proposed alternative representing a threat to the DUP, in the overall political scheme, the DUP might well be comfortable in those circumstances. It can then make a different case that closing the book on devolution is effectively closing the book on devolution as per the agreement. Drawing down the curtain, as the Secretary of State said yesterday, on the process since 1998—those were the Secretary of State's words—can quickly be converted by the DUP to drawing down the curtain on the Good Friday agreement. As Governments search for an alternative that they do not yet have, the DUP will say, "We always advocated an alternative. The Governments are proposing an alternative that is not agreed; we want an alternative that is agreed." A lot of people in Northern Ireland, including some nationalists, naively believe that the DUP is somehow under the cosh in respect of 25 November and some other alternative, but I do not believe that the DUP appears particularly frightened by that prospect. I also put it on record that Sinn Fein might have an interest in seeing a crash at that stage, as long as it can blame it on the DUP.

We wanted the Assembly to be able to consider possible solutions. If it seems that we are facing total crash and burn, and if there are proposals that could give life to implementation of the Good Friday agreement, the Assembly should be able to consider those proposals. It would do so on an agreed and an inclusive basis, with no side deals or anything else of that kind.I was pleased when the Secretary of State said that there would be no side deals in the negotiations, although he will probably become tired of being continually asked to give assurances in that regard. I accept his assurance and hope that it will extend to all levels of government.

As long ago as 1998, we were negotiating the Good Friday agreement in Castle buildings a few weeks away from Good Friday, grappling with the minutiae of the proposals for strands 1, 2 and 3. Two parties were supposedly negotiating with the others, and supposedly negotiating with the right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy). The right hon. Gentleman, then the Minister responsible for political development, was chairing the strand 1 talks while negotiating with Senator George Mitchell, who was chairing the talks overall. Those two parties, the Ulster Unionist party and the SDLP, received a fax from Downing street giving an outline of what the strand 1 outcome should be.

The SDLP made it clear, in fairly stark terms, that we were not negotiating with a fax machine, whether it was in Downing street or anywhere else. If the Prime Minister wanted to contribute to the negotiations, he should come to Castle buildings and join in, the talks with all the parties and with the Irish Government. Those who were chairing the talks, including the political development Minister, did not know about the faxes from Downing street until we told them.

I hope that that answers the insinuation from some people that the SDLP has not always stood for inclusion, and has been prepared to do deals on its own or in its own way. We have never done that. We are absolutely clear about the integrity of the principle of inclusion, which is why we wrote it into the agreement, ensuring the inclusion of people who opposed the agreement. We always maintained at the time that the Good Friday agreement and its institutions, as they worked and grew, would be capable of involving in partnership and co-operation not just Unionists and nationalists, not just republicans and loyalists, but those who voted yes and those who voted no. We did not want a new permanent divide in Northern Ireland's political life.

I believe that the institutions of the Good Friday agreement are capable of sustaining such partnership and co-operation. That is why—this answers the point made by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik)—I do not accept that changes to the agreement are a necessary precondition for restoration. After all, if the suspension had never happened in the first place and if the DUP, with the mandate that it secured, had entered unsuspended institutions, the DUP would have taken office in those institutions. It would then have used its strength in those institutions, and in the context of a formal review of the agreement, to oversee some of the changes that it seeks. It would find that—as, in fact, its members know—many of us have proposed changes in the workings of the agreement to improve it, at a number of levels and a number of ways. We have even proposed changes in the 1998 Act, because many changes could be made to the Act without denting the agreement.

We do not wish to divide the Committee on amendment No. 7. I shall deal with amendment No. 6 shortly. As for the other amendments, I understand the point that has been made about the Presiding Officer. We feel that it might seem petty, and might be misrepresented and misunderstood, if we created a scramble over the appointment of the Presiding Officer in the current circumstances. People might think that we had something against Eileen Bell, which we do not.

It is interesting that Eileen Bell has been appointed Speaker and Eileen Paisley has been appointed to the House of Lords. Given the common assumption that things happen in threes, Eileens up and down the country are probably waiting with bated breath for some wonderful appointments to come their way.

We will certainly work with Eileen Bell as Speaker. In the circumstances, it is probably better to avoid any unseemly stand-off in regard to the Presiding Officer in the early days of this new creature. As someone who comes from Derry, and who is looking across the Floor at someone who clearly comes from Londonderry, I am not going to get into the issue of what we should call the Assembly; the most important thing is what we do in it.

4.15 pm

As many Members have said, amendment No. 6 is in many ways a modest proposal. It is a modest test of the truth of the Secretary of State's assurance that he wants Assembly Members to have responsibility; indeed, he has sometimes said that he wants them to have "a powerful influence". What is wrong, therefore, with giving the Assembly the power merely of negative resolution over Orders in Council on a cross-community basis? It is not a veto in the pocket of any one party or community, so it could not be abused. The Secretary of State doubted whether there would be cross-party support for providing such a power. I agree that there would not have been cross-party support for a power of affirmative resolution, which would have given a veto to one party or community, but I cannot see what objection even Sinn Fein would have to proving the power of negative resolution on a cross-community basis. If we are meant to participate in this Assembly in anticipation of taking on powers and doing good things, surely we want the ability stop some of the bad proposals coming through via Orders in Council. As we look toward achieving restoration, what is wrong with our being given the power, on a cross-community basis, to put a stop to the gallop of direct rule via Orders in Council?

The Secretary of State said that that cannot be done because such matters are for Parliament to decide and cannot be decided by anybody else. Yet we are told constantly that Parliament does not want to legislate on these matters via Orders in Council—that it wants them to be properly the business of people in Northern Ireland. The Secretary of State tells us that he will not allow us to oppose Orders in Council by way of cross-community support, yet he cites that issue as the very reason why he will advise Parliament against giving us that power.

The Secretary of State says, "We cannot allow anybody else to decide on issues that are a matter for Parliament." I do not like to remind him and his Ministers of the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill, but it comes to mind. We were told that the Government and, through them, this Parliament, were honour-bound—hidebound—to introduce legislation that in fact, nobody liked, agreed with or could justify to victims. We were told that there would be dire consequences if it was not passed, but we were not told what they would be, what the threat was or where it came from. The Bill was withdrawn—and the sky still has not fallen in. We were told that an ulterior entity had a hold and a prior say that bound this Parliament and the Government. In the light of that, I do not regard the Secretary of State's argument as very strong.

Lembit Öpik: As the hon. Gentleman said, the Secretary of State's original argument was that there was no cross-party support for giving the Assembly these additional powers. Given that it is perfectly obvious that every party represented here—apart from Government Front Benchers—agrees with such a proposal, the Secretary of State's argument falls. Is the hon. Gentleman, like me, a bit suspicious of the fact that the Secretary of State then moved on to a different set of justifications for not providing such powers? The best thing that the Secretary of State could do is to recognise the consensus that exists here and give the Assembly something serious to do.

Mark Durkan: I agree fully with the hon. Gentleman. The implication of the Secretary of State's earlier remark was that Sinn Fein might not agree with such a proposal. I can certainly see that Sinn Fein would not agree with giving the power of affirmative resolution; nor would we, and we would not expect the Government to agree to doing so. Such a power would give the various parties and communities a veto in their pocket on all manner of issues.

Whenever Orders in Council are dealt with in this very unsatisfactory way, we are told that the problem is that different parties support different proposals. However, all that we are trying to do is to give formal expression and record to the weight of party opinion and consideration. This is a relatively modest proposal and if the Secretary of State cannot accept it, I will be disappointed.

Mr. Hain: I am provoked into intervening briefly because the hon. Gentleman's party—together with Sinn Fein—did not want the shadow Assembly for which he is now arguing. We could have been in a different position if he had taken a different view.

Mark Durkan: Perhaps the Secretary of State could explain to us at some point the difference between a shadow Assembly and what we have, because it seems to be a shady, shadowy sort of affair anyway. Given that most of the legislation is recycled from the original Northern Ireland Act 1998, which did give us a shadow Assembly, it is hard to see the difference. Our concern was having an Assembly that had powers that people would become comfortable with, such as powers of affirmative resolution and a greater degree of legislative initiative than at present.

We propose these modest powers to test what the Secretary of State is saying and to add to people's justification for participating in this particular Assembly. We want to be able to say that it is not just a talking shop. We certainly want to be able to say that it will not be a talked-at shop or a talked-down-to shop, with business people and others coming in and talking to us as though we had no experience of devolution. We need some ongoing justification of purpose and, in particular, people in the community who want to see their elected representatives doing things for them in their mandated institutions. There would be some point in looking to the Assembly if it at least had the power of political estoppel or temporary injunction on Orders in Council for its lifetime. At least then people from business could come not to give us bland talks, but to advise us on decisions that we could take to affect the fate of an Order in Council. I do not see how the Secretary of State can argue against putting business, trade unions and community interests in such positive and purposeful engagement with the Assembly, as opposed to the talking-shop style exchange that he seems to envisage.

For that reason, we will not seek to divide the House on amendment No. 7, but we wish to vote on amendment No. 6. I understand that that cannot happen now, but only if we reach schedule 1 by 6 pm. On that basis, I ask the Secretary of State to think again and I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2

SELECTION OF PERSONS TO BE MINISTERS ON RESTORATION OF DEVOLVED GOVERNMENT

Mr. Dodds: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 1, line 19, leave out 'before 25th November 2006'.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 1 in page 2, line 10, at end insert—

'(4A) Condition 4 is that parliament has legislated to give effect to any changes necessary to the Northern Ireland Act 1998 in order to allow conditions 1 to 3 to have effect.'.

No. 14, in page 2, line 10, at end insert—

'(4A) Condition 4 is that the IMC shall have reported that they believe that no paramilitary, criminal or other illegal activity is being carried out by or on behalf of the Provisional IRA.'.

No. 11, in schedule 3, page 9, line 4, leave out paragraph 4.

Mr. Dodds: We had a wide debate on the previous group of amendments and we now come to a group of amendments tabled mostly by my party. The purpose of the amendments is to allow the selection of a First Minister, Deputy First Minister and other Ministers, under the arrangements set out in schedule 2, if necessary after the deadline of 24 November 2006. As the legislation is currently drafted, the procedure can no longer be used after the deadline. That is because of the provisions of clause 2(1)(b) and schedule 3(4). Under the Bill as it stands, the only way to elect a First Minister and Deputy First Minister, and to select other Ministers, will be under the arrangements in the 1998 Act, or as it may be amended in the autumn.

Amendments Nos. 10 and 11 do not take away the capacity of the Secretary of State to take any action on 24 November, but merely leave options open that may be more appropriate if progress cannot be made by that date but could be made by May 2007. The amendments simply give the Secretary of State options, rather than closing them down or forcing him to come to the House at another stage with new legislation. We have had enough experience recently of new legislation dealing with Northern Ireland and Members would not be terribly pleased if we had to go through the whole process again.

If it is not possible to restore the Northern Ireland Assembly before 24 November but proves possible thereafter—a circumstance that is catered for in the measure—the many logistical arrangements may mean that it will be easier to make progress on the basis of the Secretary of State's standing orders than on the basis of the Northern Ireland Act. In that event, no Speaker would be elected—the role would have to be re-signed and those in power in 2003 would return to office on restoration. If the Assembly was restored and a First Minister and Deputy First Minister could not be elected, the countdown to an election would begin, despite the Secretary of State's saying that there would be no new elections to the institutions.

Lady Hermon: As there are parties who want to construe the DUP as having ulterior motives, it would be helpful if the hon. Gentleman took this opportunity to put on the record that changing the date is not because the DUP wants to maintain a talking shop on the hill at Stormont.

Mr. Dodds: I am happy to say once again, as most of my hon. Friends said yesterday on Second Reading, that of course we are not in the business of trying to create or maintain a talking shop. Indeed, if amendment No. 6 is pushed to a Division, we shall go into the Lobby to support it. We have always wanted the Assembly that is to be created to have the maximum authority and power and there have been some useful suggestions for making direct rule more accountable in the interim period. That would be sensible and I think that view is shared by parties in Northern Ireland.

We want to take account of the reality spelled out yesterday. When we reach the last week of November, the IRA and Sinn Fein may not have done everything necessary to make them acceptable as members of a Northern Ireland Executive. Let us be frank. Given the findings of the Independent Monitoring Commission report and the current circumstances, it will require a major step change in the provisionals' current attitude to criminality and other things that disqualify them from office to enable them to meet that deadline—although who knows what might happen? My party leader has already told us that he believes in miracles. Given his theological position, no one should be surprised at that statement. I believe in miracles, too—I share many of my right hon. Friend's theological positions as well as his political one.

The provisional movement has let us down many times in the past, however, and it has a fair way to go to convince people that it now has a purely democratic and peaceful methodology. It also has a considerable way to go on policing, as we all know. In the Secretary of State's comments in this place and outside over the past few days, he has referred to policing only in the context of the devolution of policing and justice powers. However, as I said in my contribution to the British-Irish interparliamentary body in Killarney, it is essential to recognise that for members of any party to exercise power as Ministers in any part of the United Kingdom it is extremely important not only that they support the police but that they urge their supporters and the community at large to give information to the police. They should not be half-hearted or equivocal about that matter. That extremely important issue cannot be ducked, set aside or ignored. So those in the provisional movement must deal with lots of issues. They are the ones who are holding up progress and who apparently stand in the way of the restoration of the Executive—not the DUP or the Unionist population.

4.30 pm

Amendment No. 14 would add a requirement to clause 2 that must be met before the Assembly can be restored. A number of conditions are set down in the Bill that must be met before a restoration order can be made, but amendment No. 14 would have the effect of adding the condition that the IMC must have reported that

"no paramilitary, criminal or other illegal activity is being carried out by or on behalf of the Provisional IRA."

Of course, we all know, given the political reality of the situation, what the circumstances must be, but as well as understanding that, it is important that the Bill refers to the outstanding issue of the day, which must be dealt with before the Executive can be restored. It is not just simply a matter of the parties getting together to elect a First Minister and appointing other Ministers; it is the central issue: whether or not Sinn Fein and the IRA have committed themselves to exclusively peaceful and democratic means. I believe that the Bill should refer to that condition, as well as it just being understood as a political necessity. That is the purpose of putting that condition in the Bill.

I hope that when the Minister responds to the debate on this group of amendments, he will seriously consider the matters that we have proposed—I emphasise what has been said by my hon. Friends—in the sense that we want to see this process work. We want to see it deliver. We want to see the restoration of devolution, but we want to see it restored in the right circumstances and in the right conditions.

We do not believe in the use of an arbitrary deadline set down by the Government that may not be met, not as a result of any unwillingness on the part of Unionists or any other democratic party to play their role in devolution, but because of the failure of the republican movement to measure up to what needs to be done. It would be entirely wrong then to see the whole edifice of devolution crash down and for the people of Northern Ireland to suffer in those circumstances. I believe that it is absolutely essential that we should try to maintain the momentum and to try to restore to Northern Ireland the maximum degree of devolution that can be possibly attained in those circumstances.

Lembit Öpik: I rise to speak to amendment No. 1, in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid), which is essentially a probing amendment. We are concerned whether there will be enough time for Parliament to legislate to bring into effect any change to the workings of the Assembly that might be needed before a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister can be elected. We would like the Government to assure us that there will be proper time for Parliament to consider the implications of any change to the workings of the Assembly. That is particularly important, as it is the duty of the two Governments—the one here and the one in Dublin—in conjunction with the Assembly, to review and report on the operation of the Assembly. Colleagues will remember that section 11 of the Good Friday agreement spelt that out very specifically under the heading of "Validation, Implementation and Review". I quote paragraph 8, which states:

"Notwithstanding the above, each institution will publish an annual report on its operations. In addition, the two Governments and the parties in the Assembly will convene a conference 4 years after the agreement comes into effect, to review and report on its operation."

As Ministers know, I was very dissatisfied with the Government's tardiness in conducting that kind of review. The Alliance party was assured that a review would take place. There was enormous obfuscation and delay, prior to the appointment of the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson). In the end, the work that has taken place has not really addressed some of the core issues—for example, the question of political designation. I covered that in an earlier speech and do not need to repeat my criticisms now. Amendment No. 1 asks the Government to make clear how they see the progress towards making sure that sensible changes can be introduced before the First and Deputy First Ministers are elected, without the sham and farce of redesignation being forced on Alliance party members or anybody else.

I will comment briefly on the other amendments. It seems that amendments Nos. 10 and 11 both seek to remove the deadline from the Bill. If I understand things correctly, that would mean that the proposal for an interim Assembly in the Bill could carry on indefinitely, which is not a good idea. My judgment is that the 24 November deadline is necessary to resolve which way we are going to go with Northern Ireland politics.

I am more sympathetic to amendment No. 14. It is clear that we all want to see the end of criminality, in all its forms—not just the so-called politically motivated paramilitary activity. I am encouraged by what the Independent Monitoring Commission has said in its most recent assessment of the matter—the 10th report. I will be interested to hear what the Minister has to say about amendment No. 14, because surely it contains a reasonable expectation.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: I would like to contribute briefly to the debate on amendments Nos. 10 and 14, in particular. I can see the benefit of having an end-date in place. It does tend to concentrate the mind. However, as the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) said yesterday, quite correctly, we have seen so many deadlines come and go in Northern Ireland. I suppose I have to question whether there can be any confidence in the idea that this is a real deadline. I understand fully, and take completely at face value, the assurances that the Secretary of State gave yesterday that it is a deadline, but there are ways of setting further deadlines and still retaining this one. Things can be fudged in one way or another.

I also take the point made yesterday by my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), who has been present for virtually all the debate—he has just left his place for a moment. If we get to, say, 20 November and we are almost there, but not quite, is it right to let the whole thing fall? That is a powerful point. Although I can see the point of a deadline, I think that, on balance, the argument put forward by the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) carries a lot of weight and we will therefore support the Democratic Unionist party if the matter is pressed to a vote.

Amendment No. 14 is difficult to disagree with. The Government have set so much store by what the IMC is saying.

Lembit Öpik: I am a little surprised by what I think that the hon. Gentleman just said. He said that he would support the removal of the deadlines, if that was pushed to a vote. I am not quite sure why he would do that because, although I am pretty sceptical about the Government's willingness to hold to a deadline, I am absolutely certain that the absence of a deadline would guarantee that we will live with this halfway house of an Assembly for the rest of our natural lives.

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman was rather scathing about deadlines himself yesterday. I have every respect for this Parliament—I am sure that hon. Members share that view. I have come into the Chamber—in the case not only of this Bill, but the previous Bill relating to Northern Ireland—undecided on how to vote on a number of issues and I have listened to the arguments. Parliament is at its best when hon. Members do that and are not necessarily whipped into one line or another. [Interruption.] The Minister is laughing, but I make no apology for listening to the debate, which I am sure that he does regularly. I am not entirely convinced that we are right to support the DUP on amendment No. 10, but having listened to the arguments made by the hon. Members for Montgomeryshire and for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds), we will, on balance, do so.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Gentleman has made it clear that his vote is negotiable, so perhaps I can persuade him to swing back towards the case for deadlines. The inference from what he says is that a Conservative Secretary of State for Northern Ireland would not impose a deadline on the interim Assembly. That worries me, so I ask him to think about it. Is he really saying that the antidote to flexible deadlines is no deadline at all? It is my judgment that any Secretary of State for Northern Ireland would have to impose a deadline to get a resolution of the situation.

Mr. Robertson: The hon. Gentleman asks me to speculate about what we would do in government. It is not that far off, so we will have to face up to those questions, but we are not quite there yet. I want to move on from this point because there are other things to discuss, but I will not dodge the hon. Gentleman's question. If he is asking whether no deadline is better than a deadline that is all over the place, I would suggest that it probably is.

Mr. Dodds: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the amendment would not take away the deadline because the Secretary of State would still be able to remove salaries and stop the Assembly from meeting? However, it would mean that the fall-back position would be much softer than the hard landing with a crash and the complete end of everything that would be effect of the Bill.

Mr. Robertson: I am persuaded by the hon. Gentleman's eloquence. He made the important point earlier that if we were almost to reach the deadline, surely it would be better to let the Assembly to continue to run for a while—at least we would have something—than to get rid of everything. That could lead to full devolution more quickly than would otherwise be the case, so, on balance, we will support the DUP if the amendment is pressed to a Division.

The Government set a good deal of store by what the IMC says and I understand why the Secretary of State quoted from the report extensively yesterday. I would be surprised if the Government opposed amendment No. 14. I accept that the IMC cannot dictate what we do in the House because that is up to hon. Members. However, I also accept that there are worries among the Unionist parties and, probably, the SDLP about going into government with people who have not fully given up violence. It does no one on the Unionist side, including me, any good to pretend that there was no good news in yesterday's report—no one has suggested that—but it does the Government no good to pretend that the whole report represented a clean bill of health. I quoted at length yesterday the parts of the report that said that senior members of the IRA were still involved in criminality and cited specific expulsions that were still being carried out by the IRA. That was all in the report as well as the good news, so if we are to accept the IMC report, we must accept the whole report. I thus have a lot of sympathy with amendment No. 14, too.

Dr. Alasdair McDonnell (Belfast, South) (SDLP): I intend to be brief. I am not quite as vociferous, or windy, as some of my colleagues and hon. Members on the other side of the Chamber.

Clause 2 provides that if three conditions are met the Secretary of State will make an order of restoration. The conditions are that a First Minister and Deputy First Minister are elected, that persons are nominated as Ministers, and that each of them takes a pledge of office. I am deeply worried about amendment No. 10, because it would make the Assembly open-ended. The Assembly should not be open-ended because that would undermine the concentrated effort that is required to get devolution back in place.

4.45 pm

I note that DUP colleagues have claimed that the Bill means that the 1998 agreement is dead. That is an exaggerated notion of their mandate. We all have mandates and we can all count numbers, but the place to exercise the mandate and count the numbers is on the Floor of the Assembly when it is reconvened.

We oppose any aspect or concept of a shadow, powerless Assembly, because that could last for ever. The deadline is an essential backstop position, which concentrates minds and gets things done.

I fear that amendment No. 1 would set the precondition for restoration whereby Westminster has to legislate for changes to get the First Minister and the Deputy First Minister elected and an Executive formed. There is nothing wrong with the terms and the details that we worked out in 1998; nor was there anything wrong with the agreement reached in 1998. What was wrong was that a number of the parties failed to honour and implement their responsibilities in 1998 and subsequently. I shall not point fingers. Everyone knows who the wrecking parties were, and it was not the SDLP or the Ulster Unionists. Frankly, the problem had nothing to do with the institutions, the regulations, the Standing Orders and the concepts. Rather, it was the outright refusal by the provos to destroy their weapons. To some extent, that was supplemented, aided and abetted by the refusal by some Unionist politicians to share power.

It would be a profound mistake to make changes to the agreement, or the 1998 Act that flowed from the agreement, a precondition for restoration. Of course, improvements can be made to the working institutions. Improvements can always be made and development can always take place. We gave a long list of improvements that we wanted to see at the conference at Leeds castle two years ago. All of them were consistent with the Good Friday agreement. However, such matters need to be worked out on the Floor of the Assembly or on the margins of Assembly meetings, and between the parties involved. I am worried that my hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), who has always been a good friend and a good supporter of peace and progress in Northern Ireland, has taken up the position set out in amendment No. 1. However, we will have a chance to discuss that later.

I am also deeply concerned about amendment No. 14. Frankly, for the reasons that I outlined, it is unnecessary and irrelevant. The terms will not have been met if we are depending on the IMC. We do not need to hang ourselves on the amendment. I outlined the terms for electing a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister, and for each of them taking the pledge. It appears that the DUP cannot trust itself and will not participate, but we cannot meet the primary conditions of clause 2 without its support. So why do we need an amendment, as a belt-and-braces operation, to ensure that if one of them strays a wee bit, he is pulled back? It is a sort of choke lead.

The DUP is trying to pass the buck for taking up its position. If it has issues with which it wants to deal, let us do that face on, eyeball to eyeball, and, in a gentlemanly fashion, sort them out. We do not need the amendment. Again, the substance of it should be dealt with on the Floor of the Assembly. The amendment makes unreasonable demands and tries to remove the independence of the IMC, an independent body, and suck it in as a partisan political player. We are the political players. Let us sort out the issues.

The amendment also places a loaded gun, so to speak, in the hands of a handful of rogue provos in various places around the country, with the result that half a dozen people can prevent any progress from being made by carrying out systematic disruption that causes the IMC to report negatively on one small case. I do not wish to delay the Committee further. My colleagues and I are opposed to the amendments for the reasons that I have outlined.

Mr. Donaldson: I support the amendments tabled in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) and my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson).

I can assure the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) that the DUP is confident of its position and will remain so. As for being afraid to sit down and talk to the SDLP, we are more than happy to do that at any time. I remind the hon. Gentleman that for years SDLP members ran to the Irish Government with every problem that they had and every issue that they wanted resolved. Off they went to Dublin to get it fixed by the Irish Government, so we will take no lectures from the SDLP about sitting down with our compatriots in Northern Ireland to try to resolve issues.

Dr. McDonnell: Will the hon. Gentleman please explain what he found wrong with our talking to the Irish Government? We have been a consensus-building party for 30 years. I am witnessing the transition from a wrecking party to a party that is trying to be semi-constructive. The Democratic Unionists were in Killarney last weekend. They have been running up and down to Dublin.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I ask all hon. Members to direct their comments to the amendments before the Committee.

Mr. Donaldson: We will certainly do that, Mrs. Heal.

On amendment No. 10 and the deadline, I welcome what the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) said. I congratulate him on his excellent contribution to our debates and on the job that he is doing on the Front Bench for the loyal Opposition. I can tell him that he is held in high esteem in Northern Ireland. He is right about the deadline. The history of the process is littered with the wreckage of deadlines that were passed. Even the Belfast agreement set deadlines for decommissioning and other things, and we saw the IRA and the loyalist paramilitaries drive a coach and horses through those deadlines.

My difficulty is that the current position does not give the Secretary of State sufficient flexibility in circumstances where real progress has been made, but we have not quite got there in terms of what is required from the IRA to end criminality and paramilitarism. Are the Government seriously suggesting that in circumstances where we had another IMC report that indicated progress but concluded that some level of activity was continuing, they would pull the plug on the entire process?

The hon. Member for Foyle (Mark Durkan) is right. They would be pulling the plug on the Belfast agreement and all that goes with it. He argued that that would be welcomed by Democratic Unionists. We have proposed changes to the institutions. We tabled the amendment to bring about changes to the Northern Ireland Act 1998 to ensure the effective and efficient operation of the institutions, and especially to ensure proper lines of accountability.

Let us be clear. Our motivation is to ensure that we get it absolutely right. We do not want, as has been suggested by some Members, to delay the establishment of devolution in Northern Ireland indefinitely. Our party is a devolutionist party, and it believes in a local Government in Northern Ireland. As I said earlier, we would gladly form an Executive today with the democratic parties in the Assembly, including the Social Democratic and Labour party. We have clearly stated that, but we have a difficulty with Sinn Fein—a potential member of a future Executive—given its links with the IRA and ongoing IRA criminality. That is a major problem for us, together with the fact that Sinn Fein does not support the police and the rule of law. Those issues must be resolved.

Let me make it clear that indefinite direct rule is not in our interests or the interests of the people whom we represent. Nor are we interested in being part of an assembly that merely discusses issues and does not ever reach the point of forming an Executive. In amendment No. 10, we do not seek an open-ended scenario in which we simply delay, procrastinate and spin things out for years to come. We are realistic: we know that that will not be allowed to happen. However, the amendment gives us a little more flexibility in the process if progress is made by 24 November, enabling the Secretary of State to keep things going for a further period. The basic concept of the Assembly in the format proposed by the Government is to engage people in issues to help to build trust. That is important, but the exchanges across the Chamber this afternoon demonstrate that it is not just a matter of building trust between our party and the republican elements in our society.

Without doubt, there are many issues at the moment, and Unionists have very little trust in Sinn Fein's position. It is clear from the comments of SDLP Members that they do not trust the DUP's bona fides or our position. We are equally disappointed by their approach to the political process in recent years. At times, they try to out-Sinn Fein Sinn Fein; at times, they take a position that is so hard-line and tough that it makes Gerry Adams look like a poodle. That is unhelpful, and they have refused to contemplate sharing power with Unionists unless their big brothers in Sinn Fein are at their side. I wish that the SDLP would learn to stand on its own two feet. Instead of hiding behind the Irish Government and Sinn Fein, it should rely on its own strength and consider serving in government with Unionists. However, I have said enough about the issue.

Mark Durkan: The hon. Gentleman has forgotten that we adopted a clear position on policing. Our position on the Policing Board was not defined or confined by Sinn Fein or anyone else.

Mr. Donaldson: I accept that, and I applaud the position that the SDLP took after many years of refusing to support the police and refusing to take up seats on the Police Authority. Finally, after 30 years, it pressed its agenda and was able to wring out substantial changes to policing in Northern Ireland. It decided that it was going to support the police, which we welcome. However, I am not talking about policing but about the formation of an Executive or a Government for the people of Northern Ireland. I regret very much the fact that the SDLP has not had the courage to step out and do with an Executive what it was prepared to do with the Policing Board.

I do not accept the distinction between the operation of the Policing Board and the operation of an Executive in Northern Ireland. If the SDLP is prepared to serve with Unionists on a Policing Board and take responsibility for one of the most important issues in Northern Ireland, why on earth can it not do that with us on education, health, roads, housing, planning and all the matters that affect the people whom we represent? I would like that to happen, and I await the day when there is genuine power sharing in Down council, so that the DUP can finally get a look-in and secure a senior appointment. It would be nice to see the SDLP exercising real power sharing in places such as Down district, but we are patient and will wait for that day. Perhaps Down district will be able to match what happens in neighbouring Lisburn, the city that I represent, in terms of the parity that we give to the SDLP. Of the 30 councillors on Lisburn council, only three—or 10 per cent.—belong to the SDLP.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Interesting though that may be, it is not relevant to the amendment.

Mr. Donaldson: I suppose that I was expanding the point a little, Mrs. Heal, but we live and travel in hope that we will get the House's support for the amendment. We are trying to be constructive: we want to ensure that we make progress but with a helpful degree of flexibility.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. David Hanson): I begin by thanking the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) for stepping in to move the amendment on behalf of the right hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) and the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson).

We have been debating three issues in connection with the amendment. The first has to do with the deadline at the end of the period proposed in the Bill, and the second relates to the approach adopted by the provisional IRA and others to arms decommissioning and criminality. Thirdly, we debated the issues raised in amendment No. 1, in the name of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik). I shall deal with each matter in turn.

My first remarks are directed to the hon. Members for Belfast, North and for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson), and to the hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson), who speaks for the official Opposition on these matters. Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it clear that he and the Government as a whole are committed, for clear and appropriate reasons, to setting a deadline for the Bill.

Mr. Dodds: The Minister says that the Government are committed to the deadline, but reports in the media and elsewhere suggest that it is really the Dublin Government who are pushing it, at the behest of some parties. Will he comment on that? Are not the Government here more open minded about the matter than he is trying to suggest?

Mr. Hanson: My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State were present in Armagh on 6 April, as were the Taoiseach and I, when these proposals—for this Bill and to restore the Assembly—were brought forward. The Government of the Irish Republic and the British Government are unanimous about the need to include a deadline in this Bill.

From my perspective, I do not think it appropriate for the people of Northern Ireland to expect that the process will remain open-ended for ever. We have to set a deadline, for a variety of reasons. First, it puts on the parties involved the pressure that must be applied if we are to resolve the question of the Assembly. Secondly, the Assembly elections in May next year are rushing towards us. These things tend to go quickly, and even the hon. Members for Belfast, North, for Lagan Valley and for Tewkesbury must recognise that it is impractical and impossible to ask the people of Northern Ireland to vote again for an Assembly that does not sit, and for Members who do not participate in their legislative functions, even though they maintain their strong constituency roles.

For those reasons, we need to set a deadline, and we have picked 25 November. The hon. Member for Tewkesbury said that he will support the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Belfast, North, but that would remove the deadline from the Bill completely. As the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire and my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, South (Dr. McDonnell) have explained, the absence of a deadline would leave us with an open-ended commitment, with the result that there would be no pressure on the parties to resolve the key issues.

Mr. Gregory Campbell: Does the Minister agree that the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) still pertains? If the Government want to exert pressure, they retain the power—notwithstanding the amendment—to cease at a stroke all allowances and salaries paid to all Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly. If the Minister wants pressure, that pressure can be applied at any time between now and 24 November, and beyond.

Mr. Hanson: The Government will look at exercising that pressure and that power. However, I cannot accept the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Belfast, North because we believe that we must implement a deadline for the resolution of the Executive election for the offices of First Minister and Deputy First Minister. The deadline has been implemented so that we can secure that election in a reasonable time before 25 November and do what everyone who has spoken on both days of this debate wants to do, which is to take power from the British Government and give it back to the hon. Member for Belfast, North and his colleagues in Northern Ireland. I take the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, South that no deadline would mean an open-ended commitment. The deadline is not a threat, and it reflects the political reality of the situation.

I recognise that DUP Members and the hon. Member for North Down (Lady Hermon) need to have trust in the republican movement that paramilitary activity and criminality have ceased, which is key to their entering the Assembly. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell), who clearly expressed that point on Second Reading. I understand that an end to paramilitary activity, criminality and the possession of arms by the IRA is central to entry into the Assembly for the DUP.

As the hon. Member for Tewkesbury recognised, progress has been made, and I shall pick a few quotes from yesterday's IMC report to illustrate that point. Paragraph 2.13 states:

"It remains our absolutely clear view that the PIRA leadership has committed itself to following a peaceful path ... We have noted the remarks by Gerry Adams, President of Sinn Féin"

that

"the war is over and that the movement is committed to the alternative political path."

Paragraph 2.14 states that

"the leadership is engaged in a challenging task in ensuring full compliance with this strategy".

Paragraph 2.15 makes a key point:

"We are not aware of current terrorist, paramilitary or violent activity sanctioned by the leadership. We have had no indications in the last three months of training, engineering activity, recent recruitment or targeting for the purposes of attack."

Finally, paragraph 2.16 states:

"We have found signs that PIRA continues to seek to stop criminal activity by its members and to prevent them from engaging in it."

I recognise that until those matters are fully resolved, DUP Members will have difficulty in entering the Assembly, and I also recognise that the key to their entering the Assembly is the IMC report that will be introduced in October and November this year. However, I cannot support putting that point as a precondition in Bill in the manner suggested by the hon. Member for Belfast, North.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: It would do Conservative Members no good to deny the significant progress in the IMC report, but it does the Government no good to quote selectively, which the Minister has done again. I shall give him the sentence immediately before his final quote:

"We also believe that in a separate incident PIRA itself may have been associated with the forced departure of somebody from the area where he lived."

That is the second of two quotes in paragraph 2.15 about continued expulsions by the IRA. As the Minister knows, other parts of the IMC report mention senior members of the IRA who are involved in criminality. It does not do either side any good to quote selectively.

Mr. Hanson: The hon. Gentleman and I have had a good relationship in the time that we have shadowed each other, and he knows that I do not share his view that I am trying to quote selectively. I recognise that there is still work to be done by the Provisional IRA, but I say to him genuinely and honestly that I believe in the IMC report, and my understanding is that the Provisional IRA leadership are now committed to a political, peaceful role for their ends.

The task for the next few months is to secure that response by all members of the organisation in all parts of Northern Ireland. The IMC report in October or November this year will be critical to the judgments made by hon. Members. I hope that they can have sufficient confidence to go into the Assembly during May on that basis, but I recognise that they probably will not for the reason that the right hon. Member for North Antrim gave yesterday—namely, that the conditions are not right. However, I do not believe that including such provisions in the Bill will assist in making those conditions right. The IMC report is vital in this respect.

Sammy Wilson: Does the Minister accept that it is not sufficient merely for the IMC to say that criminality and so on has ceased, but that there is also a need for those who wish to be involved in the Assembly to give full and unequivocal support to the police? It is a case not only of stopping carrying out criminal activities, but of supporting those who are trying to deal with criminality.

Mr. Hanson: Absolutely; I agree 110 per cent. with the hon. Gentleman. I look forward to the day when Sinn Fein Members—and SDLP Members—take their places on the Policing Board. I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that adherence to the rule of law is fundamental to the operation of a democratic society and that support for the police in operating in that legislative framework is important. When we debated the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill, we discussed the way in which we can, I hope, devolve policing and criminal justice in due course. I understand where hon. Members want to get to, how they want to get there, and the barriers that prevent them from participating in the Assembly, but putting in a legislative framework will not meet that objective. They need certain conditions to be met in order for their confidence to be restored and for their trust in the process to go forward. That is self-evident from their speeches yesterday and today.

I do not believe that amendment No. 1, which was tabled by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire, would add anything to the Bill. I hope that I say that in a helpful mode. Leaving aside the slight oddity of one Bill binding this House to the passing of a further Bill, I cannot see how the amendment would have any practical effect, because the Bill already sets three conditions that must be met before devolution can be restored.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned redesignation and the election of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister. We have acknowledged that several parties have major concerns about institutional matters that they want to be addressed before the restoration of the Assembly. I am happy to have discussions with the parties in Northern Ireland, including the hon. Gentleman's sister party, the Alliance party. We will talk to David Ford and other colleagues to see whether we can get accommodation and agreement between his sister party and the other parties that are represented in the Assembly. That is essential. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already dealt with this point. By definition, the conditions will not be met until legislation is in place.

Lembit Öpik: I am grateful to the Minister for giving the answer for which I was looking. The amendment was merely a probing amendment. Can he confirm that he will be willing to have such meetings with parties that are willing to make that contribution within, say, the next eight weeks? I ask for that because it has taken us a very long time to get from the original correspondence to a situation where the Government are expressly accepting that some things may need to change.

5.15 pm

Mr. Hanson: I am happy to have discussions with the parties. I would not wish, for my benefit, to put a time scale on them at this stage—contradictory as that may seem. The hon. Gentleman knows that as well as dealing with legislation and other matters, we are running Departments in Northern Ireland. The Northern Ireland Office therefore has a heavy work load. I will consider the issues and we will hold discussions. However, on the basis of those reassurances, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not press his amendment No. 1 to a Division.

I am grateful for the debate, which was helpful, but I hope that the hon. Member for Belfast, North will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Dodds: I have listened carefully to the Minister's response. I am grateful for his recognition that the IMC report shows work in progress by the IRA. When we listened to some press reports and comments before it was released, it appeared to some of us that there was an attempt to spin it to suggest that no Unionist could now use the IRA as an excuse in the context of restoring devolved Government. The hon. Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) was right to say that it is essential to examine the IMC report carefully in the round.

It is clear that progress has been made. As we said yesterday, we believe that the Democratic Unionist party can claim much credit for that. Before our position became the dominant one in Unionism, there was a view that the way to get the IRA away from violence was to bring it in and let the violence, drug dealing, intimidation and racketeering continue because being in government and having access to power would gradually wean it from all that. In fact, it had power and continued with its violence, racketeering and so on. We have made it clear that there must be an end to all that before the IRA can access power or authority. That strategy is working. Let us continue to keep up the pressure.

The Minister signally failed to answer the question of what was so magical about the deadline of 24 November. He did not provide one reason or argument to persuade people that the process would be complete by 24 November. No one can say when it will be completed. We all hope and pray, for the good of the people of Northern Ireland, that it will be completed sooner rather than later, but how have the Government arrived at the date of 24 November? No one can say that the IRA will have completed the transformation by that date. We therefore believe that it is wrong to pull down the curtain on the prospects of restoring devolution simply because the IRA may not have fulfilled the necessary conditions to allow Sinn Fein to be part of an Executive in Northern Ireland.

The debate has been useful and we shall not press amendment No. 14 to a Division. Although we believe that it would be useful to include such a provision in the Bill, and we will take account of it along with several other issues when those matters are decided, we will not press it today. However, we shall press amendment No. 10, which covers the deadline, to a Division, for the reasons that I have enunciated. I am grateful for the support of the hon. Member for Tewkesbury and his colleagues. We hope that as many hon. Members as possible can join us in the Lobby.

Question accordingly negatived.

Clause 2 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3

POWER TO MAKE CONSEQUENTIAL PROVISION ETC

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Alan Reid: I have serious worries about the sweeping dictatorial powers that the clause seems to give the Secretary of State. I want to know why he believes the powers are necessary, and I should like him to give examples of occasions on which he would need to use them.

The clause provides for the Secretary of State to make, by order,

"any supplementary, incidental or consequential provision"

and

"any transitional or saving provision"

that he considers expedient. Clause 4 states that the powers in clause 3 are exercisable by affirmative resolution unless the Secretary of State considers it expedient to pass the orders by negative resolution.

In other words, if the Secretary of State considers it expedient, he can do anything that he likes. He can amend Acts of Parliament without Parliament having to vote. Before we give the Secretary of State those broad powers, we expect an explanation and some examples of the occasions on which he intends to use them.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): I hope that the Minister can give us a few assurances. I listened carefully to what was said by the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) and, when I first read the clause, I shared some of his concerns. I hope the Minister will be able to say that the enabling powers given to the Secretary of State are circumscribed by reference to the purposes of the Bill, and also that they would lapse in any case in line with the time limit in the Bill.

Mr. Hanson: As the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) said, clause 3 allows the Secretary of State to make orders in relation to matters arising as a result of things done under the Bill. It is intended to be used to sweep up any consequential or unforeseen matters relating to, particularly, the recall of the Assembly, the repeal of the 2000 Act, the postponement of elections or the dissolution of the Assembly.

For reasons that I hope are understood by both the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) and the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute, the Bill was put together in some haste following the decision of the Prime Minister and the Government to adopt this route. Changes may well be needed that would require primary legislation unless we gave the Secretary of State this power. The power is focused and not meant to have a widespread application. The Bill is short and concise and, in any event, the level of detail required in an order made under clause 3 is not suitable for inclusion in primary legislation. In case there is any misunderstanding, I can assure Members that clause 3 cannot be used to effect changes to, for example, the operation of the institutions as envisaged under the comprehensive agreement of December 2004.

Mr. Dodds: Are any of the changes that the Minister might introduce under clause 3 subject to a resolution of either House, or can they be made simply by Executive order?

Mr. Hanson: In this instance, these are delegated orders for the Secretary of State. As I said, the power applies to particular matters relating to the Bill; it does not have a wider application.

Lembit Öpik: To save time, can the Minister assure me now that our understanding that the Assembly will be entitled to amend and repeal legislation passed during the period of the Assembly's suspension is correct? It would be useful if he could put that on the record.

Mr. Hanson: To return first to the point made by the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds), such changes will be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure of the House; I hope that that is helpful. On the point raised by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), the Assembly can deal with any relevant related matters once it is up and running and has Executive functions, because such functions will relate to matters pertaining to the Assembly's areas of responsibility.

I point out to all four Members who raised issues relating to clause 3 that the Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform Committee of another place has examined it. As the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute knows, the Committee takes a keen interest in these matters, so if we tried to pull a fast one—as the colloquial phrase has it—it would notice. The Committee's report, available today, points out that the powers in the clause are acceptable, and that another place accepts the principle behind it and the degree of parliamentary scrutiny provided for in clause 4, in accordance with the Committee's views on such powers.

I hope that, in the light of those points, I have reassured the hon. Members for Aylesbury, for Argyll and Bute and for Belfast, North. I look forward to their support for the clause.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 4

PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURE FOR ORDERS UNDER SECTION 3

Lady Hermon: As I have already put on the record my deep distaste and dislike for, and my disapproval of, giving unfettered powers to the Secretary of State through this Bill, it is not my wish to move amendment No. 19.

Clause 4 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 5 and 6 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 1

THE ASSEMBLY

Amendment proposed: No. 6, in page 5, line 20, at end insert—

'Assembly control of Orders in Council

7 Paragraph 2 of the Schedule to the 2000 Act is replaced by—

"Parliamentary and Assembly control of Orders in Council

2(1) Except where sub-paragraph (2) applies, an Order in Council may not be made under paragraph 1(1) unless each of the following conditions is met—

(a) Condition 1 is that a draft of the Order has been referred under section 1(1) of the Northern Ireland Act 2006 to the Assembly;

(b) Condition 2 is that a meeting of the Assembly has taken place at which it has had the opportunity to consider the draft of the Order;

(c) Condition 3 is that the Assembly at that meeting has not expressed by resolution passed with cross-community support its opposition to the draft of the Order;

(d) Condition 4 is that the draft of the Order has been approved by resolution of each House of Parliament.

(2) This sub-paragraph applies where the Order declares that the Secretary of State has advised Her Majesty that because of the urgency of the matter it is necessary to make the Order without meeting any of the conditions in sub-paragraph (1).

(3) Where an Order contains a declaration under sub-paragraph (2) it—

(a) must be laid before Parliament after being made; and

(b) ceases to have effect if it is not approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament before the end of the relevant period.

(4) Where an Order contains a declaration under sub-paragraph (2) it—

(a) must be referred to the Assembly under section 1(1) of the Northern Ireland Act 2006 after being made; and

(b) ceases to have effect if before the end of the relevant period—

(i) the Assembly has not had an opportunity to consider the Order; or

(ii) the Assembly has passed a resolution with cross community support expressing its opposition to the Order.

(5) But sub-paragraphs (3)(b) and (4)(b) do not prejudice—

(a) anything done under the Order before it ceased to have effect; or

(b) the making of a new Order.

(6) In this paragraph—

"the Assembly" means the Assembly referred to in paragraph 1 of Schedule 1 to the Northern Ireland Act 2006;

"the relevant period" means the period of 40 days beginning with the date on which the Order is made.'.—[Mark Durkan.]

SELECTION OF MINISTERS

Lady Hermon: I am sure that the Committee will be delighted to know that it is not my intention to move amendment No. 28.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the schedule be the Second schedule to the Bill:—

Lembit Öpik: I have one question: to clarify what the Minister said before about the Assembly's ability to modify legislation—

Mr. Lidington: That is in schedule 3.

Lembit Öpik: I think that it is to do with schedule 3. I am sorry, Mrs. Heal, to detain the Committee, and I thank the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) for putting me right.

Question put and agreed to.

Schedule 2 agreed to.

Schedule 3

NO SELECTION OF MINISTERS

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the schedule be the Third schedule to the Bill:—

Lembit Öpik: I have been thrown into confusion, because I believe that my question relates to schedule 2 after all—[Interruption.]

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I could not hear what the hon. Gentleman was saying.

Lembit Öpik: The point still stands, despite the sneaky Tory trick to get me confused. I want the Minister to clarify one important point. In fairness, thanks to the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), who did some considerable research into the matter, our understanding is that that the reconstituted Assembly would be entitled to modify or repeal any legislation that has been passed, including during suspension. I raise that matter because of a previous suggestion that the Assembly could not alter, modify or repeal legislation that has been passed by Order in Council during suspension. Our understanding—I believe that it is that of the hon. Member for Aylesbury—is that the Assembly is not fettered in that way. It is free to modify any of that legislation. That is important because it is extremely clear to me that we need clarity in the debate and on the record in Hansard, so that there can be no dispute about this matter when the Assembly seeks to modify legislation.

Mr. Hanson: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) for speaking to both schedule 2 and, indeed, schedule 3. I assure him that, when the Assembly is fully restored—I emphasise the words "fully restored"—with an Executive, a First Minister and a Deputy First Minister and its full legislative powers, it can obviously have locus in any matter to do with its responsibilities and it can pass any matter that it wishes. I cannot fetter that potential legislative Assembly in the future by orders that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland or I pass now. I hope that that reassures the hon. Gentleman and that, with that, he will accept schedule 3.

Question put and agreed to.

Schedule 3 agreed to.

Bill reported, without amendment.

Order for Third Reading read.

5.55 pm

Mr. Hain: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third Time.

I thank right hon. and hon. Members for their contributions to the debate. All the contributions have been very positive. The way in which the Bill has gone through the House has been an indication and a signal of where Northern Ireland can go in the future. I commend the Bill to the House and hope that all the politicians in the political parties in Northern Ireland will work together to deliver the opportunity that the Bill provides for self-governance in Northern Ireland again.

5.56 pm

Mr. Lidington: What has been striking about the debate has been the clear readiness on the part of all three of the Northern Ireland parties that take their seats in this House to put the dreadful events of the past behind them, however difficult that step may be, and to look to the future. I hope that, with the passage of this Bill, the remaining major party that has, as yet, refused to take its seats in this House will now accept that it must come and take part and accept the same democratic, peaceful nature of politics that is accepted by all other parties here from Northern Ireland constituencies.

5.57 pm

Mr. Alan Reid: The Liberal Democrats, too, support the Bill and we are pleased that we have reached Third Reading. The only disappointment is that the Government rejected amendment No. 6. Given that all the Northern Ireland parties that are represented in the House supported it, I hope that the Government will think again and, in another place, will table that amendment or something similar. That was the shared will of the Northern Ireland parties and we hope that the Government will give effect to that. The Government have set a deadline of 24 November, which we support. There must be no moving away from that deadline. I hope that the Government will emphasise that that definitely is a deadline.

5.58 pm

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): I welcome the introduction of the Bill and the fact that we are completing its Third Reading. I hope that the tenor of the Bill and of the debate in the Chamber today and yesterday, which showed what happens when there is a willingness to work forward together, sometimes with a sense of humour—perhaps that was absent in the past—will continue. If we bring that to the round-table conferences that we will be having over the next few months, I sincerely hope, on behalf of the people of Northern Ireland, that we can have a new future and a new beginning based on that total trust that we can have in one another. If we fail, it will be because some parties have put party interests before people. I hope that, in this case, the people win and that we carve out the new beginning in Northern Ireland for which we have striven for nearly 40 years. It would be a wonderful achievement if we could do that, not by 24 November, but before the summer recess, because I think that that is possible.

5.59 pm

Mr. Dodds: I am glad to follow the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady). Yesterday we entered into what I think was a time-sharing arrangement. I would certainly be happy to go even further and enter into a power-sharing arrangement with the hon. Gentleman and his party as soon as possible, even before the summer recess. Certainly we have had a very good debate over the past few days.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) said, we are a devolutionist party. We want devolution. We have challenges ahead of us, but we are determined to try to meet those challenges. We go into this new Assembly in a positive mode. We are glad of the opportunity to debate issues of relevance to the people of Northern Ireland and we hope that we can get full restoration, but there are conditions. The IRA and Sinn Fein must become a fully democratic party. I think that Ministers have recognised that in the debate. We look forward to completing the road that we are now on.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third Time, and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. Will all hon. Members who are leaving the Chamber please do so as quickly and quietly as possible?

Freemen of Beverley and the Beverley Pasture Masters

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Coaker.]

6 pm

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): It is a great pleasure to stand in the Chamber and talk about an issue that is of great importance to the people of Beverley: the Freemen of Beverley and the Beverley pasture masters. I plan to speak first about the considerable history of the Beverley pasture masters, move on to the threat to their existence and conclude by discussing how we can ensure that the ancient tradition can be preserved.

As hon. Members may be aware, the town of Beverley is fortunate enough to have some beautiful common land. It is a source of great pride to Beverley residents, and people travel great distances to enjoy it. There are three common pastures in the town: Beverley Westwood, Figham and Swinemoor. Of those, Beverley Westwood is the largest, at more than 600 acres. It was granted to the Beverley freemen in 1380 by the Archbishop of York, Alexander Neville, for the sum of £5. Most people who have visited it would consider that to be money well spent. It is a magnificent landmark for the town and has some interesting history.

As the name suggests, there was once a substantial number of trees on the Westwood. They were frequently felled to provide money for the town and to increase the acreage available for grazing stock. In 1584, the corporation sold more than 1,000 trees, primarily oak and ash. However, new plantations have been established and the replanting of trees is an integral part of the management of the pasture. The Westwood also has a surviving 19th century mill. In 1853, a look at the ordnance survey map would have shown that five corn windmills were in use at that time, and three still exist in part. The tower of one of them, Black Mill, which was built in 1803, is a prominent local landmark.

The Beverley pasture masters are responsible for managing the three common pastures in Beverley. That has been the case since 1836, when the Beverley freemen, concerned that the recently established local council would not look after the pastures properly, petitioned MPs in the hope of establishing a new law that would guarantee independence for the pastures from local government control. They and other freemen from throughout the country were successful. An Act of Parliament, the pasture Act, which made provision for the annual election of pasture masters by the pasture freemen was duly passed. The election is held on 1 March each year and allows for a body of 12 pasture masters to be voted in from among the pasture freemen.

The pasture Act ensured that the common pastures had total independence from local government decision making. No part of the common land can be disposed of for building or any other purposes. The pasture masters also have the power to pass byelaws to ensure better management of the land. As a result, the unique character of the landscape has not been lost.

However, the pasture masters are under threat. To be admitted as a freeman, one must either be born as the son of an existing freeman, or qualify by servitude. If one serves as an apprentice under a freeman, one can apply to be admitted as a freeman. However, the number of apprenticeships has declined rapidly in recent years and the craftsmen offering them frequently now tend not to be freemen.

We are thus left with qualification by birth. To become a freeman of Beverley in that way, one must be born as the son of an existing freeman. Daughters are excluded. One must also be born in the town of Beverley itself. That is fast becoming a problem. In the 19th century, when the tradition of the pasture masters began, people remained in the same town or village for a lifetime. Generations of one family could be found in one place, which meant that the son of a freeman was almost always born in Beverley itself. Today, however, there is greater mobility. Freemen have left Beverley and their children have been born outside the town, so the chain has been broken. The dilemma was compounded nine years ago when the town's maternity hospital was closed. The only people born in Beverley are those who are born at home.

There are now just 100 freemen left in the town. Of those, more than half are in their 50s and 60s, and many are in no shape to begin childrearing again. The situation has become so serious that last year, Neil Walker, a Beverley freeman, and his wife decided that they would have a home birth for their unborn baby. That was a conscious decision, made in order to ensure that a son was born in the town. Luckily, the newborn child was indeed a boy. However, even now there is no guarantee that the son will want to remain in Beverley for the rest of his life. There is certainly no guarantee that he will want to be a pasture master. There is, therefore, the very real danger that this ancient body will literally die out unless action is taken. That would be devastating for the town of Beverley.

What can be done? Essentially, the problem is down to discrimination against daughters and the requirement that freemen are born in the town itself. The dilemma is not exclusive to Beverley. Many towns and villages up and down the country are affected by that ancient anomaly. What steps have been taken to reverse the injustice? The Minister may be aware that a private Member's Bill, the Borough Freedom (Family Succession) Bill, is before the House. It would give the daughters of people made freemen of a town the same rights of succession as their male siblings. It would also remove any requirement limiting admission to the freedom of persons born within a borough's boundaries, meaning that if a freeman moves away from a relevant borough, his son or daughter could still claim succession even though they were born outside the boundaries.

The Bill has had a tumultuous time in both Houses. It was introduced by Lord Mustill in the other place, first appearing in the 2000–01 Session. It did not progress beyond First Reading. Lord Mustill tried again the following year. This time, the Bill did progress through the House of Lords, and was taken up by the then right hon. Member for South-West Surrey, Virginia Bottomley. However, it did not survive the end of the Session. Fast forward a couple of years to the 2004–05 Session and a new version was taken up in the other place by Lord Graham of Edmonton. It progressed safely through the House of Lords, and was sponsored in this House by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Jim Cousins).

However, the Bill has now reached a crossroad. Despite sailing through its First Reading, it has stalled at Second Reading, which it has been due to receive on three separate occasions, most recently on 17 March. Each time it has been a long way down the list of Bills to be read, and there has not been enough time for full parliamentary debate. Second Reading has been deferred to 20 October, when again it is likely to be delayed.

We therefore have to accept that in all likelihood the Bill will fail. That would be desperately disappointing to the people of Beverley, and to the pasture masters and freemen themselves. They have pinned their hopes on its success. Chris Thompson, chairman of the Beverley pasture masters, said recently:

> "We are running out of freemen. We are down to about 100, which includes 12 pasture masters. We are relying on the Bill to change that situation."

The Beverley freemen have been trying for five years now to let women, as well as those born outside the town, join their ranks, but to do so requires a change in legislation. I want to pay tribute to the region's media—the Beverley Guardian, the East Riding Mail and the local BBC, all of which have kept a strong focus on the issue and kept it high on the local agenda.

I do not want to test your patience, Madam Deputy Speaker, but I should like the Minister to bear in mind that the issue is not contentious. A change in legislation has wide cross-party support, both in this House and in the other place. Government support would be gratefully received, not just in Beverley, but in the constituency of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central and across the country. I am aware that Members are not supposed to use an Adjournment debate to call for Government legislation on a particular subject, so I shall hesitate from doing so, but if Ministers were able to find a way of rectifying the problem—perhaps by thinking of a creative way to append it to a major Government Bill at some point—they would be doing a great service to that ancient institution of freemen.

As Lord Graham of Edmonton articulated in the other place in July last year, the freemen are of great sentimental importance to a town. That is certainly the case in Beverley. They are identified with the local community in a way that is much more intimate, continuous and long standing than the exercise of local government franchise or election to local councils. It is a joy in this age to find people who have such a strong allegiance to their community. However, the significance of the freemen is not just ceremonial or sentimental. In Beverley's case, they are responsible for preserving over 1,000 acres of common landscape. It would be a devastating blow to the town if they were to die out. They have been part of Beverley life for hundreds of years. I hope—indeed, I know—that the Minister will bear that in mind when summing up.

6.10 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): I congratulate the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) on securing this afternoon's Adjournment debate and on raising an issue of importance not only to the Freemen of Beverley, but to other Guilds of Freemen who similarly want to change their rules of admission. I have read the press releases that the hon. Gentleman issued in advance of the debate. The matter is clearly of concern to him and his constituents.

I shall keep my response to the debate very short. I hope, however, that the hon. Gentleman will take comfort from my remarks and not regard their brevity as in any way lessening the significance of his contribution or of the issue raised by him and by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Jim Cousins).

As the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness said, my hon. Friend, whom I am pleased to see in his place, is sponsoring a Bill—the Borough Freedom (Family Succession) Bill—which would allow the title to pass to daughters of freemen. Like the hon. Gentleman, I recognise that the procedures for private Members' Bills are such that there is some uncertainty, to say the least, about whether the Bill will make it to the statute book. Having been a Government Whip with some responsibility for private Members' business over a number of years, I know how delicate private Members' Bills can be.

I must say, in honesty and fairness, that having asked my officials to examine the Bill, the Government have grave doubts about whether, as drafted, it would achieve its purpose. As the hon. Gentleman noted, private Members' Bills must overcome considerable obstacles to become legislation, and Government opposition, whether on principle, political or technical, will always prove to be a major hurdle. Nevertheless, we have considerable sympathy with the Bill's objective. I can therefore assure the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend that, if and when a suitable legislative opportunity presents itself, we will consider providing for Guilds of Freemen to amend their rights of admission locally.

Mr. Stuart: I am grateful to the Minister. Will he agree to meet me and the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central to discuss such opportunities?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I am happy to accede to that request. Were the hon. Gentleman to seek a discussion, we could explore the technical deficiencies in the Bill, as we see them, and the possibility of moving the matter forward in due course.

Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend consider whether, if an appropriate amendment could be drafted, the Commons Bill before the House as Government legislation might provide an opportunity to consider these matters?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I am not in a position to give an affirmative response to my hon. Friend. I will take the matter back to the Department and ask officials to examine whether the Commons Bill might be an appropriate vehicle. I do not have that information to hand. Were he and the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness to seek a meeting, we could clarify the matter.

Jim Cousins: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Given the timetable of the Commons Bill, that obviously means that for any meeting with him, time would be pressing.

Jim Fitzpatrick: I do not want to build up hopes among colleagues that there may a way of delivering their ambitions by short-circuiting the legislative process. I do not want to give any false hope that we could expedite the inclusion of relevant provisions in the Commons Bill. I said that the Government were sympathetic to the objective and that we would look for a suitable vehicle. However, such an opportunity may not be forthcoming. I am happy to look at the issue and explore it with colleagues because, as I said, we are sympathetic to their objective of enabling the Freemen of Beverley and others like them to change their rights of succession if they wish to do so.

With that assurance, I again congratulate the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness on raising an issue of great importance to Guilds of Freemen around the country. In doing so, he has provided the House with a flavour of the history and traditions of one of our oldest institutions. I sincerely hope that progress can be made. I am sure that the hon. Gentlemen who have pressed the issue, both in this debate and in a private Member's Bill, will do all that they can to ensure that their endeavours are successful.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fifteen minutes past Six o'clock.

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Safety Cameras

1. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): If he will make a statement on the siting of speed cameras. [66801]

7. Mr. Lee Scott (Ilford, North) (Con): If he will make a statement on the siting of speed cameras. [66807]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): The Department's handbook of rules and guidance for the national safety camera programme for England and Wales sets out strict rules and criteria for the deployment of safety cameras. The criteria ensure that cameras are deployed where there is a strong road safety need and where they can make a difference.

Michael Fabricant: But is that really the case? In 2003, prosecutions went up by 44 per cent., yet fatalities fell by only 2 per cent. The Minister says that so-called safety cameras—let us at least call them speed cameras—are placed in order to stop fatalities, yet often, where they are sited at the scenes of car crashes, those car crashes had nothing to do with speed. Will the Minister review where these cameras are sited?

Dr. Ladyman: The hon. Gentleman needs to keep up with events. We have just had a study of the first four years of the road camera partnerships, which shows a 70 per cent. reduction in vehicles breaking the speed limits at fixed sites and a 42 per cent. reduction in people killed and seriously injured at camera sites. No published work anywhere in the world suggests other than that cameras work in making roads safer. They are put where there is a history of speeding and of people being killed and seriously injured.

Mr. Scott: I thank the Minister for his letter to me of 24 April regarding the speed camera at the bottom of the M11 in my constituency. While noting the contents, may I ask whether that camera will at least be repositioned in an area where it may help safety rather than hinder it, because it seems that accidents have continued to rise there?

Dr. Ladyman: Of course, the positioning of all cameras is kept under review. The camera that the hon. Gentleman mentions was put there to enforce a permanent speed limit on that particular part of motorway, where drivers were continuing to ignore the speed limit. The number of people being seriously injured on that stretch of road was not coming down, so a camera was necessary to enforce the speed limit. If it proves unsuccessful in reducing the rate of casualties, of course I would expect its position to be reviewed.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): In Staffordshire, there are no plans for any new safety cameras in the coming year, yet residents continue to come to me with requests for new speed cameras because of the dangers of speeding traffic. Will my hon. Friend confirm that there is still very strong public support for safety cameras and that there is no obstacle to new ones being erected where there is a need to do so on road safety grounds?

Dr. Ladyman: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. He will recollect that, in December, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced that, from next year, we would have new rules governing how cameras were sited, with local partnerships having greater flexibility in being able to site cameras where they perceived there to be a threat instead of having to wait until people are killed or seriously injured before they do so. My hon. Friend is right to say that there is very strong public support for speed cameras, especially in towns and near to where children are at risk.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): At the weekend, an eight-year-old girl was killed in north Wales as a result of a road traffic accident. Does my hon. Friend agree that a strong message should go out from both sides of the House that speed and traffic kill and is it not unfortunate that that seems to be becoming an issue on which opposing sides of the House do not agree?

Dr. Ladyman: First, let me express my sadness at the news of the little girl being killed in Wales. I am sure that the sympathy of the whole House goes out to her family.

It is very important that we recognise that all the evidence suggests that speed kills and that it is necessary to have strict enforcement at certain dangerous places to ensure that people are obeying the speed limits. If we do that, we will continue to drive down deaths and serious injuries on our roads, as we have over recent years.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): The Department's research, to which the Minister referred, established that, in some 245 cases, there had been no reduction in casualties following the siting of road safety cameras. What has happened on those sites? In how many cases have the cameras been removed and nothing put in their place and in how many have they been replaced with other safety measures?

Dr. Ladyman: If the hon. Gentleman has specific examples about which he would like information, I shall attempt to get it for him. The Department's study showed significant improvements in the rate of casualties across most camera sites. The Department has requested the safety camera partnerships to review the siting of all cameras and ensure that they are in the best place, where they can be most effective.

I detect another example of the Liberal Democrats wanting to have it both ways. They appear to oppose safety cameras but, when they talk to some groups, they demand more and more of them.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The Minister referred to community safety partnerships' ability to urge the placing of cameras when the strict criteria are not necessarily in place. Is not it true that, on several roads, the high speed and the amount of traffic travelling at excess speed discourage pedestrians and cyclists, and that it would, therefore, be reasonable to locate a safety and speed camera on such a road?

Dr. Ladyman: My hon. Friend is correct. Even under existing rules, road safety camera partnerships are entitled to 15 per cent. flexibility. They have some local flexibility to decide where to site cameras. Under the new rules that the Secretary of State announced in December, they will have much greater flexibility from next year, but they will also have to be accountable to local people for where they have decided to site cameras. They are entitled to do that to encourage pedestrians and cyclists if they wish but they must explain to local people exactly what they hope to achieve and their targets for the site.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): On 21 March, the Minister said in Standing Committee A on the Road Safety Bill [Lords] that "the people who deploy cameras must in future either ensure that drivers can see a camera and a speed limit sign in the same field of vision, or put a speed limit on the road as a reminder."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 21 March 2006; c. 75.]

What practical steps has he recently taken to put that into practice?

Dr. Ladyman: As part of the package that the Secretary of State announced in December, we are publishing new guidance to all the safety camera partnerships, making it clear how we wish signage to be improved. It is vital that motorists can see a speed limit sign in the same field of view as a camera. For legal reasons, it is not always possible to put the speed limit on the camera. The notification of, for example, a 30 mph speed limit is done not by repeater signs but by a road sign when one enters the speed limit area and the presence of lamp posts in a built-up area. We therefore have to be careful about exactly how we proceed but the Department is issuing clear and good guidance about how it should make the signs available.

Rail Freight Interchange (Radlett)

2. Anne Main (St. Albans) (Con): If he will make a statement on the proposed rail freight interchange at the former Radlett aerodrome. [66802]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): It is for the private sector to develop proposals and progress them through the necessary approvals including planning consent. I understand that no planning application has yet been made for the proposal to which the hon. Lady refers.

Anne Main: Large consultation exercises are going on. Does the Under-Secretary agree that, if blight is put on houses—it has already been accepted by Helios and Lafarge, which offered to buy a house but have now rescinded the offer and said that there is no possibility of compensation—and the Government decide to push ahead and grant permission against the wishes of local residents, they should ensure that compensation is provided for any blighted properties?

Derek Twigg: The rules of blight are well established. As far as I know, we have not yet received a planning application. Normal planning procedures will apply and it is not appropriate for me to comment at this stage.

Cycling

3. Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): If he will make a statement on his Department's strategy for (a) increasing cycling journey numbers and (b) reducing cycling injuries and deaths. [66803]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Derek Twigg): The Government set up Cycling England to plan and co-ordinate the development of cycling across the country. Cycling England is supporting local authorities by providing expert advice on the design and promotion of cycling and showcasing best practice in six towns. Measures to improve safety include recommending safety and visibility aids, publicity campaigns, promoting cycle training, and raising motorists' awareness through training and testing.

Jo Swinson: Many people are deeply concerned about the draft revised highway code and the effect that it will have on cyclists. If, as is proposed, it is changed to require cyclists to use cycling facilities, a cyclist involved in an accident with a vehicle might not be covered by the motorist's insurance company due to a contributory negligence claim. Will the Minister give us an assurance that the new highway code will not force cyclists off the road for fear of legal consequences?

Derek Twigg: The simple answer is that it will not.

Mr. David S. Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): We want to encourage more cyclists to use our roads in urban areas, but I am sure that many hon. Members will have noticed the increasing propensity of cyclists to ignore traffic regulations. They often cycle straight through red traffic lights and over pedestrian crossings. What action is my hon. Friend's Department taking to increase the education of cyclists, and to enforce existing legislation?

Derek Twigg: We have set up Cycling England, which plays an important role in taking cycling forward, and we will see better cycling safety training and driver awareness. Significant extra sums have been invested, not least in providing safer routes to school to increase the safety of younger people.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): In regard to the point raised by the hon. Member for South Ribble (Mr. Borrow), the House of Lords has recently discussed a proposal for vehicle registration for cycles to encourage cyclists to be more responsible on the roads. What is the Minister's view of that proposal?

Derek Twigg: The key issue is that cycling is a sustainable type of travel that is very good for people's fitness and health, and we want to encourage it. It is also important that we continue to press safety awareness issues and to make them clear to cyclists and motorists alike. Increased investment has been made in cycle training and in developing cycle training programmes, which will be important for improving safety on the roads for cyclists and motorists.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): What about training for motorists? Instead of trying to confine cyclists to using specific cycling provision, which might be inadequate, will my hon. Friend consider the practice in continental Europe, where far more people cycle? One of my constituents, who comes from France, tells me that the French highway code places the onus on motorists to give cyclists plenty of space. Can we look to best practice in European countries and bring our cycling levels up to theirs?

Derek Twigg: Yes, we can clearly learn lessons from such best practice, and we will do so. The consultation on the highway safety code finishes on 10 May and we will listen to any suggestions and proposals made. I hope that, when the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) cycles anywhere, the Lexus carrying his socks and shoes is far enough behind him.

Transport Infrastructure (Northamptonshire)

4. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What discussions his Department has had with the growth areas directorate in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister on additional transport infrastructure provision in north Northamptonshire. [66804]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): The Department continues to work closely with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to agree what the plans for the growth areas mean in detail and how they will affect the Department's investment plans.

Mr. Hollobone: With 52,000 new houses planned for north Northamptonshire in the next 15 years, some respected traffic consultants say that there will be a 75 per cent. increase in vehicle traffic. Local residents are rightly worried about that. The local road infrastructure is already completely inadequate and it will not be able to cope with growth on that scale. Will the Minister undertake to sort out the A14 and advise the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister that large-scale housing expansion cannot take place unless there is a dramatic improvement in the local road infrastructure?

Dr. Ladyman: We recognise that these issues are important and that people wish to be assured that the development of road infrastructure will go hand in hand with the development of new housing. We are working closely with the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to achieve that. For example, the growth areas fund has provided £60 million in Northamptonshire in recent years, and there will be another £50 million in the next two years, along with £27 million for transport projects from the community infrastructure fund. In addition, a range of other initiatives is ongoing. On top of that, we are considering the region's advice on how we should spend its allocation of funding on transport projects in the overall region.

Railways (Personal Safety)

5. Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): What recent representations he has received expressing passenger concerns about personal safety on railways. [66805]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): The Public Accounts Committee and Select Committee on Transport have both recently examined aspects of personal safety on the railway. The Department has, of course, received a number of approaches on the subject from hon. Members and others.

Mr. Khan: I am grateful for that answer. Balham station in my constituency has the sixth worst crime figures out of all the stations run by Southern Railway. My right hon. Friend is aware of the excellent safer station campaign begun by my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Ms Butler) and the Evening Standard. In light of the failure of train operating companies to provide fully staffed stations, and bearing in mind the huge success of British Transport police in making passengers feel safer and in actually making stations safer, what plans does he have to review both the powers and the numbers of British Transport police?

Mr. Darling: As the House is aware, we are considering how best to focus the BTP's activities, primarily with a view to improving safety on stations. My hon. Friend and his colleagues have rightly drawn attention to the importance of making sure that stations are as safe as possible. I think that I am right that Balham station is staffed for the time that it is open, but I hope that the additional BTP officers that we have funded over the past couple of years will also help, as well as the increased use of closed circuit television on both trains and stations. He is right that we should continue to do everything that we can to make stations as safe as possible.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): What action are the Government taking to examine how passengers can be safer on trains in the event of rapid deceleration or derailment? Is any work going on to secure luggage, to give people the option of a belt, or to improve the design of carriages so that there are fewer hard objects and sharp-edged surfaces, as the difference between the inside of a train and a modern car in the standard of safety is scandalous?

Mr. Darling: Yes, work is going on. Specifically, following the tragic accident and derailment in Berkshire in 2004, the Rail Safety and Standards Board is considering the lessons to be learned. Trains in general are much safer and better constructed than they were in the past. There is a lot of evidence to show that, provided that people remain within the train at a time of rapid deceleration or derailment, they have a better chance of not being injured than if, for one reason or another, they are flung out of the train. In addition to that work, we constantly do everything that we can to use all the modern techniques available to make trains as safe as possible. Self-evidently, trains are different from cars. The right hon. Gentleman has previously raised with me the question of seatbelts, and that is still to be investigated, but I assure him that we are considering that.

Ms Dawn Butler (Brent, South) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend tell the House what he is doing to get train operating companies to give passenger safety a higher priority? As my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan) said, I have been working hard with Silverlink and the Labour-run Brent council to ensure that stations are properly staffed and lit. A clear message must be sent that safety must come before profits.

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend has done a great deal to highlight the issue of safety in her constituency and in London generally. The rail companies are acutely aware that, if we continue to see more and more people using trains, we must ensure that stations are safe. That is why we have increased significantly the funding available to British Transport police, both to increase numbers of staff, including special constables, and to make capital expenditure available to improve the safety of stations. Train operating companies must also play their role. As I mentioned earlier, closed circuit television is being used on stations and nearly a third of rolling stock has been replaced over the past seven or eight years, much of which has CCTV on board. The mainstream police forces also have their role to play. Nobody in London, particularly after the Evening Standard campaign over the past few weeks, can be in any doubt that safety is important. Different approaches must be applied at different stations, but we are right to keep the issue at the front of our minds.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): My constituents are concerned about the ever-increasing number of people using trains from Wellingborough who, when they get on are forced to stand because of overcrowding, which must be a danger to personal safety. What does the Secretary of State have in mind to increase capacity on the Wellingborough-London line?

Mr. Darling: As I have said during the past few Question Times, there is no doubt that, as more and more people use the railways, we must increase capacity on the lines, not just in the hon. Gentleman's area but elsewhere. We have significantly increased capacity on the west coast main line, but there are plans to increase it in other areas as well. The objective must be to make rail travel as safe, and as comfortable, as possible, but if we are to increase capacity significantly we must all sign up to increased investment, because the railways cost money to run. Unfortunately, so far the Conservative party has failed to join us in that.

Rail Safety

6. Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): Why there is no statutory limit to the number of standing passengers permitted in a train carriage. [66806]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): All trains are designed to operate safely and effectively even when fully loaded. Franchise conditions nevertheless require operators to take appropriate steps to deal with the need for passengers to stand.

Dr. Iddon: When my constituent Mrs. Marshall complained about the grossly overcrowded commuter trains between Bolton and Manchester, she received a letter from a customer relations officer at Northern Rail Ltd containing the following statement:

"It is not possible to dangerously overcrowd a train, rail vehicles are designed to operate safely when crush loaded."

Does my right hon. Friend agree with that statement or does he agree with me that, if my constituents are to be persuaded to give up their cars and travel into Manchester by train, statements like that are not helpful?

Mr. Darling: I agree that the letter could have been phrased more judiciously. I think there are times when some customer relations officers could benefit from further training—and, indeed, benefit from the huge increase in the amount that we have invested in further education to improve people's skills and standards.

As my hon. Friend is no doubt aware, the TransPennine Express group will introduce new trains over the summer. That will increase capacity between Bolton and Manchester, for example—I know that there has been concern about overcrowding on that line—and it also demonstrates that if people are prepared to devote the necessary resources to improving the railways, it is possible not only to carry more people but to cater for the greater number who are leaving their cars and using trains. Who knows? The railway companies might even improve their communications.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): Many trains are overcrowded at peak times. All those people have paid reasonably high fares to travel in that way, so why should they be packed in like sardines? Does the Secretary of State recall that concern has been expressed many times about the transport of live animals? I suggest that the transport of people should receive the same attention and that train companies should be required to do something about chronic overcrowding.

Mr. Darling: I agree with the hon. Lady, but remind her that, if we are to increase capacity to meet the growing demand for rail travel, that will mean spending more money on longer trains and longer carriages.

Ann Winterton: What about extra carriages?

Mr. Darling: Extra carriages are highly desirable, but they cost money. At some stage, therefore, the Conservative party will have to acknowledge that we must continue to spend a considerable amount on the railways if we are to see improvements.

That is not the only thing that is necessary. We can improve the track—which, again, costs money—and we can get more trains running on the line. We can also ensure, by means of better timetabling and better price structures, that those who do not need to travel at peak times can take advantage of lower prices at other times. Our key task, however—especially in the north-west, where the hon. Lady's constituency is—is to make sure that we spend the money that is needed. It cost nearly £8 billion to upgrade the west coast main line. The reason it cost so much is that, during the previous 25 years, hardly any money was spent on it when it should have been spent.

Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): Rail passenger safety is a matter of concern to all of us. That is why my constituents in Dover and Deal are waiting eagerly for the result of the rail inspectorate's report on Shakespeare cliff tunnels, which will allow the provision of a direct high-speed rail link between London and Dover. Has any progress been made?

Mr. Darling: As my hon. Friend has said, a study is being carried out and I suspect that major works will be necessary, given the tunnel's size. I know that he is concerned about this issue, in that he would like the high-speed train link to extend to Dover. I cannot give him a publication date for the study, but I suspect that it will not be published for some time yet. Obviously, we will need to look at it, because whatever happens, it will probably have spending implications.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): I listened carefully to the Secretary of State and it is true when he says that he is spending £87 million a week on the railways; indeed, he has increased the rail spending budget quite significantly in the past few years. The problem is that, according to the Office of Rail Regulation, between now and 2014 no new trains will be travelling on our railways—there will be no additional passenger train kilometres—and the Government forecast a jump in the number of passengers of some 30 per cent. Does the Secretary of State appreciate that overcrowding is an urgent issue? What projects does he have lined up, starting within the next few years, that will make a difference?

Mr. Darling: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the ORR must decide shortly—by the summer of next year, I think—in conjunction with the Government, how much money will be spent on the railways in the period to 2014. Alongside that, we will publish a White Paper setting out our view of the additional capacity needed. As he rightly says, we have doubled rail spending in the past few years—a move that was absolutely necessary and long overdue. Perhaps he will tell us now, or when he comes to the Dispatch Box again, whether he is prepared to match us on rail spending. I see from an interview that he gave to the widely respected and widely read Coach and Bus Weekly—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Chris Grayling: Once again, I ask the Secretary of State a straightforward question and I do not get an answer. The truth is that, if we are to make a difference to overcrowding on our railways, we need action soon, not White Papers or reviews. We need actual projects with time frames and starting dates, so let me ask the Secretary of State again: what projects does he have lined up, as part of the £87 million a week he is spending on the railways, starting in the next two or three years, that will begin to make a difference to overcrowding?

Mr. Darling: We are spending very substantial sums on improving the network to get more capacity out of it and we are making improvements in terms of the amount of money spent on rolling stock. For example, the Bill that will make Crossrail possible is going through the House and there are projects such as Thameslink throughout the country. Unless the hon. Gentleman is prepared to match us on the necessary spending, none of these projects will happen. We have made huge improvements to the railways and it is interesting to note that the Conservatives have both opposed every single penny that we spent in the past and cannot even match us on the money that we need to spend in future.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Although there are problems with the local train service, my constituents do not normally have to face significant overcrowding on trains. However, there are times when they do: when major international rugby matches take place in Cardiff. At such times, many more people travel by train than usual, many of whom are children travelling with their families, which is great to see. We have seen significant changes in recent years. For example, the British Transport police and others co-operate to ensure better throughput of people, so that they can travel safely. Can we not look more closely at ensuring that proper transport services are provided for big international matches, be they in Cardiff or in London?

Mr. Darling: Yes. The short answer is that improvements can be made. I know that there have been difficulties with providing train services for events at the millennium stadium, and I am sure that the railways can do better.

Rail Fares

8. Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): What assessment he has made of the differences in rail fares between rail operators; and if he will make a statement. [66808]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): Regulated fares are monitored to ensure that train operators comply with the limits set for these fares. Other fares are a matter for train operators themselves.

Simon Hughes: Does the Secretary of State agree that a factor that puts people off switching from travelling by car to travelling by train is the very high fares? In some places, fares are nearly 10 times higher than those for comparable journeys on mainland Europe. Moreover, in some parts of Britain, people pay four times as much to travel with one company as others pay to travel the same distance with another company. Will the Secretary of State take a serious look at the issues of cost and confusion and try to establish a proper fare structure that provides an incentive to travel by train, rather than a disincentive?

Mr. Darling: We need to keep fares under constant review, but given that more and more people are choosing to use the railways, that tends to suggest that they want to use them, are using them and can afford to do so. Indeed, if he compares the prices charged in this country with the rate charged per mile in continental Europe, he will see that many of our fares compare very favourably, and that many are in fact better. He should avoid simply concentrating on the walk-on first-class and standard fares, because many other fares are a lot cheaper than that. When zonal charging is introduced in London, which will affect his constituents, people travelling from one London zone to another will pay the same rate, no matter which part of London they are travelling in. I am sure that his constituents will very much welcome that.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that some of the most competitive rail fares are offered by Hull Trains, the open-access operator that serves Selby, among other places? Does he welcome the rail regulator's decision to allocate three paths on the east coast main line to Grand Central Trains, another open-access operator? That will link some towns and cities in the north-east and Yorkshire to London for the first time, and also offer much more competitive fares for the journey from York to London.

Mr. Darling: I agree that Hull Trains does operate some good services and offer fares that are cheaper than the alternatives. However, I repeat that we must also have regard to the effect that the recent decision in respect of Grand Central Trains will have on Great North Eastern Railway's ability to provide its services, especially the half-hourly service that it wants to provide to Leeds. That is being looked at, and it may be possible to reach an agreement that allows Grand Central Trains to operate and also allows GNER to fulfil its obligations in providing that service to Leeds. It is important to remember that the network has to work as a whole and that it is not possible to look at one service in isolation, although most people using Hull Trains greatly appreciate the services that it provides.

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): In his response to my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling), the Secretary of State revealed that the Government have few plans, if any, to increase capacity, for we all know that Thameslink has no start date or funding. In the past year, however, there have been price rises that passenger groups have described as "eye-wateringly" high. Are not those rises evidence that the Government have only one strategy to combat over-capacity, and that is to price passengers off the railway?

Mr. Darling: No, that is not right. As I said earlier, the range of prices offered on different routes across the network is quite wide. Some first-class, walk-on fares are expensive and have gone up, but other fares are much cheaper in real terms than they were, say, 10 years ago. Then, passenger revenue—the money coming from passengers expressed as a percentage of spending—was at 85 per cent. Today it is 57 per cent., which shows that the taxpayer is paying more now than under the previous Conservative Government.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): The Secretary of State will have noticed that, to take advantage of cheap fares in this flexible system, one has either to be a computer geek or aged about 13. Will he suggest to some of the train operating companies that they could undertake the revolutionary task of making it possible for people to find out when and how often cheap fares are available?

Mr. Darling: I would not claim to be the sort of expert that my hon. Friend describes, but I did not find it too difficult to discover, for example, that the cheapest return fare from London to Birmingham is £20, to Leeds is £19, and to Edinburgh is £25. On any view, those fares are fairly cheap. It is true that first-class or walk-on fares are higher, but we are trying to strike a reasonable balance between what fare payers must pay and what the general taxpayer must pay. The most important thing is to ensure that we continue to spend the money needed to have more trains and so increase capacity on the track. We will set out our plans in the 2007 spending review. If we are to continue to have a railway that serves the interests of passengers in Britain, we will have to maintain that funding, not year on year but decade on decade.

Heathrow Airport

9. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): To what extent Government decisions on the number of permitted flights at Heathrow are informed by projected levels of carbon dioxide emissions. [66809]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): The current limit of 480,000 air transport movements a year at Heathrow is a condition of the 2001 planning consent for terminal 5 and was fixed primarily on grounds of noise. We believe that the best way of ensuring that aviation contributes to the goal of climate stabilisation is through a well designed emissions trading scheme, which is why we are pressing that in Europe and internationally.

Dr. Cable: I welcome the Government's commitment to the CO_2 emissions trading system, but as it will not become effective until 2012 at the earliest, would not it be useful if the existing cap on flights at our major airports were to serve wider environmental purposes as well as narrow, local concerns?

Mr. Darling: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's concern about the level of carbon dioxide at Heathrow and other airports, which is due not just to aircraft but also to other activity—the air quality at Heathrow is affected by the amount of traffic, primarily on the M25 and the M4.

A range of things can be done. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the fuel efficiency of aircraft has improved by 50 per cent. over the past 30 years; today's aircraft are about 75 per cent. quieter than in the 1960s. Other measures are being taken at Heathrow to improve air quality and if road pricing is introduced in this country that, too, will reduce the overall level of harmful emissions in the environment. In relation to aircraft, it is important that we do everything we possibly can—whether it be looking at landing charges or the emissions trading scheme—to reduce the amount of CO_2, which, as the hon. Gentleman says, is a matter of legitimate concern.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): As the Secretary of State knows, aircraft movements at Heathrow are under his control, because Heathrow is a designated airport under the Civil Aviation Act 1982. Fairness requires that an airport that is even busier than Heathrow was when it was designated—namely, Nottingham East Midlands airport—should also come under the Secretary of State's control. Will he bear in mind that the air pollution littered all over Leicestershire is just as bad as the air pollution that covers the constituency of the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable)? Does not he think that it is high time that the Department for Transport got its head round the environmental pollution that is wrecking Leicestershire just as much as it is wrecking west London?

Mr. Darling: The hon. and learned Gentleman is quite right to say that we should be concerned about the environmental consequences of airports and aircraft, but the east midlands economy has greatly benefited from the presence of the airport. It has created jobs and a lot of freight arrives there, so whether we are considering the east midlands airport or Heathrow, it is important to strike a careful balance, to ensure that we meet our environmental obligations while recognising the economic importance of such airports, which are well used by the hon. and learned Gentleman's constituents and others.

A47

10. Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): What criteria his Department is using to assess the need to dual the A47 in Norfolk. [66810]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): The Department is not currently assessing the need to dual the A47 in Norfolk. The A47 was assessed through the Norwich to Peterborough multi-modal study, which reported that dualling was an issue for the longer term, but that some sections should be reviewed towards the end of the decade.

Mr. Simpson: Many of my constituents will find that disappointing and unsatisfactory, in particular Mrs. Andrea Jackson, whose son was tragically killed on the A47 at the Mattishall junction just west of Norwich. I accompanied her to No. 10 to hand in a petition signed by 10,000 local people from a small area in mid-Norfolk, urging the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister to consider, at the very least, remedial action at that junction, which the Highways Agency has been looking into for some time. Surely, death and injury must be the most important criteria, so I am sorry to say that the Minister's answer was not satisfactory.

Dr. Ladyman: Remedial action at a particular junction is one thing; a requirement for us to dual an entire stretch of road, over many, many miles, is another thing entirely. We are indeed looking at the report into the tragic accident to which the hon. Gentleman referred and when we have completed our review of it we will report to him and the local community on how we shall make that junction safer. Safety is one of the factors that we take into account, but only a limited amount of money is available. Of the £1.9 billion for the three years up to 2007–08 that the Highways Agency will spend on the entirety of English trunk roads, fully a quarter will be spent in the east of England so the hon. Gentleman and his constituents are actually doing rather well.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Is the Minister aware that one of the worst parts of the A47 is the stretch through Middleton and East Winch in my constituency? Both parish councils have been pressing for a dual carriageway bypass for many years. When can they expect action from the Government?

Dr. Ladyman: As I have just explained, the multi-modal study suggested that a case may be made for certain parts of the A47 to be considered for dualling at the end of the decade. Currently, there are no short or medium-term plans for dualling along its entire length. Considerable improvements have been made already to parts of the A47, but we must balance the priorities across England and, indeed, across the east of England—and currently, the region and the local county councils are not suggesting to us that dualling the entire length of the A47 is a priority.

Sea Transport of Goods

11. Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): What steps the Government are taking to support the transport of goods by sea. [66811]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): The Government have introduced several measures to support the transport of goods by sea, including water freight grants, of which £22 million has been awarded since 2000 for shipping projects. A further measure—the tonnage tax—provides certainty and clarity about tax liabilities for those shipping companies that choose to opt into the regime.

Mr. McGovern: The Minister may be aware of a recent report from an organisation called Sea and Water, which suggests that, until road pricing is introduced, which would impose a fair charge on hauliers, there is a case for the Government to support more businesses that wish to transport their freight by sea. That view certainly has support in Dundee, where the Michelin tyre factory, which employs more than 600 people from Dundee and the surrounding area, has real concerns about the reduction in ferry crossings on the Rosyth to Zeebrugge route from five to three sailings a week. What plans do the Government have in the short-term to ensure a level playing field in the near future between businesses that transport freight by road and those that do so by sea?

Dr. Ladyman: My hon. Friend will realise that specific support for the scheme that he mentions would come under the responsibilities of the Scottish Executive, so I cannot comment too much on that, other than to say that the Department for Transport and the Scottish Executive collaborated to provide £11 million to start that ferry route. He makes a very fair point, however, in saying that we must encourage the movement of goods by sea. Short-sea shipping needs to be considered as an important option for people who need to move goods. That is why we have the freight facilities grant scheme, which is making substantial sums of money available to people who consider short-sea shipping as an alternative to road transport.

Vehicle Emissions

12. Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): If he will make a statement on progress being made in lowering the average level of emissions per vehicle. [66812]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): Since the early 1990s, pollutant emissions from petrol cars have reduced by around 95 per cent. Diesel cars have delivered up to 80 per cent. reductions. Over the same period, the average level of CO_2 emissions from new cars has fallen by about 11 per cent. The House may be interested to know that Britain's top 10 best-selling cars are all cleaner than the Lexus.

Danny Alexander: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for that reply, but as the UK still has the fourth highest emissions from new cars in the European Union, will he impress on the Chancellor of the Exchequer the need for much stronger incentives for fuel-efficient cars with the banding of vehicle excise duty, while assisting the drivers of such vehicles in remote and rural areas, where a car is a necessity and fuel prices are at the highest, by taking advantage of the derogation allowed under EU law to decrease fuel duty in such areas?

Mr. Darling: On incentives, the changes that the Chancellor made to the company car tax regime have resulted in a much more fuel-efficient fleet. We are also introducing the renewable transport fuel obligation, which will result in the equivalent of 1 million cars being taken off the road.

On the present voluntary agreement among European car manufacturers, the time has now come for us to consider mandatory agreements, because not enough progress is being made and most people would expect car manufacturers right across Europe to make cars cleaner than they are at present.

Ormskirk Bypass

14. Rosie Cooper (West Lancashire) (Lab): When he expects work on the Ormskirk bypass to begin. [66814]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): We are currently considering the north-west region's advice on the priority that it attaches to this and other major transport schemes in the region within the indicative funding allocation for major transport schemes that were announced last July. We expect to respond to the region's advice later in the year.

Rosie Cooper: Can my hon. Friend give me his assurance that Government resources are available for high-priority local transport schemes that have not been included in the regional transport priorities plan, such as the Ormskirk bypass in my constituency? Will he meet with me and Lancashire county council to discuss the future of the Ormskirk bypass?

Dr. Ladyman: I am well aware of my hon. Friend's support for that scheme. She has been a doughty campaigner for it since she entered the House. I am hesitant to give her the entire assurance that she is looking for, since the county council has made the scheme only its second priority and we are still talking to the region about its priorities, but I understand her desire to see the scheme move ahead and if it would help her to understand the issues, I would be happy to meet her to discuss them.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was asked—

Civil Service (Diversity)

21. Lyn Brown (West Ham) (Lab): If he will make a statement on progress with increasing diversity within the civil service. [66793]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Cabinet Office (Mr. Jim Murphy): The civil service has made good progress towards increasing diversity, including at senior levels, but there is still much more to do. We have published and are implementing the diversity 10-point plan. Its aim is to build on the progress so far to deliver a civil service that is truly representative of society.

Lyn Brown: Does he agree that the lack of informal personal networks, and therefore a resultant lack of information about processes, can disadvantage communities? What does he think that we can do to make the playing field more equal?

Mr. Murphy: I agree with my hon. Friend and I know how interested she is in these issues. More can be done, but there has been progress over recent years, as I am sure that she would be first to acknowledge. Among the initiatives being undertaken are a summer development programme for black and minority ethnic citizens and a summer placement scheme for those who are disabled. In particular, we can do more to reach out to those networks of people who lack a formal education the first-time round—those who are seeking a second chance in life—and to try to make the civil service an attractive career option for people who lack the formal and informal networks that she speaks of.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Does the Minister agree that it would help the Government's diversity agenda, and the recruitment of women in the civil service, if there was a civil service Act to protect them from being asked to do things that they do not consider appropriate? Does he think that female recruitment and progression will be helped or hindered by the recent revelations from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister?

Mr. Murphy: The fact is that we waited 148 years for even a draft civil service Bill. We now have that Bill. The hon. Gentleman will just have to be a little more patient when it comes to the Government's specific consideration of a civil service Act. There is, of course, a consultation on the civil service code. Many thousands of people have participated in that and it has been very helpful. Just to reassure him—because I know how genuinely interested he is in these matters—when his party was last in power, 17 per cent. of the civil service were women, but the figure is now up to 29 per cent. That is remarkable progress, but we accept that much more needs to be done.

Information Technology

22. Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the Government's transformational strategy for information technology. [66794]

Mr. Murphy: Information technology is an essential component of the Government's programme to deliver and reform public services. As I announced on 29 March to the House, the implementation plan for the transformational government strategy has been published.

Kitty Ussher: I thank the Minister for that response and I welcome the transformational work that has been done, but does he not agree that there is not much point in people being able to sort out their tax and benefits online, if they cannot afford a computer? Will he therefore commit to doing more to improve IT access and, in particular, broadband access in poorer communities, such as those that many of my constituents live in?

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend has raised these matters before and she is right to do so. Partly in the social exclusion unit and also in the Cabinet Office, we are working to ensure access to wireless broadband, in particular. Many of the households concerned do not have a fixed telephone line, so wireless broadband access is really important for many of our constituents across the country. I have seen projects around the country, such as Eastserve in east Manchester, which serves the type of community that she mentions. In addition, there are about 6,000 UK online centres, which enable low-cost access to the internet for those who do not have the opportunity, as yet, to have computers and broadband access at home.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): I am very pleased to hear that the Minister is developing a transformational strategy for IT, but many of my constituents who are struggling to get their child support payments through the new CS2 system, which is, in many respects, performing worse that the original CSCS system, will find it laughable that the Government are trying to transform even more IT systems. The Government's progress on transforming systems has been a disaster—does the Minister agree with that?

Mr. Murphy: No, I would not agree with that at all. The Child Support Agency is under the management of a new operational improvement plan that is being undertaken, and the Department for Work and Pensions and EDS are working together on a serious problem. No one on either side of the House would suggest that there has been anything other than a serious systems failure. However, the hon. Lady's constituents and mine will realise that most Government projects that are enabled by IT do work, such as the payment modernisation programme, tax self-assessment and the internet job bank. As we further drive the transformational Government programme, we will increasingly rely on well-defined, well-structured and well-costed IT-enabled projects to make public services more relevant and personal to the citizens whom we all serve.

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend rightly welcomes local initiatives to encourage people's access to computers. Is he aware of the Shoreditch digital bridge, which is being formally launched next week? What support are the Government giving such local projects that bring IT and access to technology into people's living rooms in an innovative way?

Mr. Murphy: I am not aware of the specifics of the Shoreditch bridge, but will be happy to become acquainted with it and, if the opportunity arises, to make a visit so that I can listen and learn. There are innovative projects throughout the country. I visited the Western Isles of Scotland, which is at the geographical periphery of this United Kingdom, where IT-enabled projects are helping to maintain schools and education, helping an island population to play their part in that and enabling a crofter, of all industries, to maintain his business. There are thus excellent examples. It is important that we learn from good experiences so that mistakes are not replicated and best practice can be copied throughout the country.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The most transformational thing that the Minister could do would be to get IT systems to talk to one another across the Government, or even, say, in one Department. Let us take, for example, the Home Office, which wants to keep a database of the personal details of every person in the country. Does the Prison Service computer talk to the immigration and nationality directorate computer? Does either communicate with the police national computer or the Courts Service computer? If none of those things happens, can we go back to an easier technology, with each prisoner's file having a big red stamp on the front reading, "Don't release—deport"?

Mr. Murphy: The hon. Gentleman makes his point in his own way. The fact is that we have challenges regarding IT systems, many of which were previously constructed in silos. We need to ensure that across Government the systems talk to each other coherently and sensibly. There are practical examples of that happening. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman has had a chance to do this, but I visited a project in Leamington Spa in which all those involved in the criminal justice system are enabling such conversation to take place and thus delivering for the people of the area. The hon. Gentleman is right that we have to approach data-sharing in a way that ensures that we cut across operational boundaries and have effectiveness in government, but that we do so sensitively to protect individuals' liberty and privacy.

Cyber Security

23. Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): If he will make a statement on co-ordination of cyber security within Government. [66795]

Mr. Murphy: The central sponsor for information assurance is responsible for the UK Government strategy for information assurance. It provides a co-ordination role by looking at the work being done across the Government and identifies gaps and overlaps and works to address them.

Mark Pritchard: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply, but is he confident, given that al-Qaeda has admitted to wanting to create aggressive viruses, that our critical energy infrastructure and military and intelligence services systems are fully robust against any aggressive viruses and terrorism?

Mr. Murphy: I know that the hon. Gentleman takes a keen interest in these matters and that, previously, he has rightly and appropriately declared a remunerated directorship of an internet company. I know that he is to meet officials from the Civil Contingencies Secretariat next week to discuss the specific points that he has raised. Such work is being done on a cross-party basis and I think that that is the right way to progress.

Apart from the terrorist threat online that the hon. Gentleman has rightly raised, and without wishing to appear complacent, our current assessment is that the greatest e-enabled threat to our system is from criminal gangs operating online. We are taking strenuous steps across government and with the business community to address the real dangers that exist.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware of the work of the Information Assurance Advisory Council. He will be aware also that the national high tech crime unit and others liaise with IAAC on issues related to information security. Does my hon. Friend agree with me that other Government Departments can learn lessons from the private sector? Will he encourage active participation between Government Departments and IAAC, which is chaired by Dame Pauline Neville-Jones?

Mr. Murphy: I know that my hon. Friend takes a real interest in the subject. Indeed, I had the opportunity to discuss these matters with him and his constituents when I visited his constituency last year. He is right to say that Government have much to learn from industry, but the private sector has much to learn from Government. It is not a competition about who has the most to learn from whom. We are in this together—the public sector and the private sector. That is why projects such as Get Safe Online are important because they encourage people to take a common-sense approach to their personal finance and to apply that approach to their online existence. There is a great deal going on and we are determined to work with the business community, as my hon. Friend suggests.

Anne Main (St. Albans) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. Lady will give me a moment. I inform the House that the ten-minute Bill will not be moved today.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Anne Main (St. Albans) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Last week, the Home Secretary made a statement regarding the removal and deportation of foreign nationals. I asked the right hon. Gentleman a specific question, which was whether people who had committed a serious sexual offence were put on the sex offenders register before they were released, which is vital if we are to be confident that the registers can help our local police forces. The right hon. Gentleman replied:

"I assure the hon. Lady that precisely the same procedures on the sex offenders register applied to foreign nationals whom she has described as apply to anybody whom commits a sex offence.—[Official Report, 26 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 588.]

Given the rather alarming news that has appeared in some of our newspapers that the police have no details on their registers, has the Home Secretary made any effort to come to the House to correct any reports on these matters?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Lady will know that an urgent question was applied for today. She shakes her head, so perhaps she does not know. However, the application was made. It was refused on the ground that the Home Secretary assures me that he will be making a statement tomorrow. Perhaps the hon. Lady should try to pursue her question tomorrow.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would be grateful if you were to advise the House on the application of the ministerial code, especially as it applies to Parliamentary Private Secretaries. You might be aware, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Stephen Pound), a PPS at the Home Office, has demanded the resignation of a Cabinet Minister,—not his boss but the Deputy Prime Minister. Will you tell us, Mr. Speaker, whether the idea of collective responsibility applies to the ministerial code and whether the Member for Ealing, North might be considering his position?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Lady has been in the House for some time now. She might know that the ministerial code is a matter for the Prime Minister and not for the Speaker.

Orders of the Day

Finance (No. 2) Bill

(Clauses Nos. 13 to 15, 26, 61, 91 and 106, Schedule 14, and new Clauses relating to the effect of provisions of the Bill on section 18 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984)

Considered in Committee.

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Ordered,

That the order in which proceedings in the Committee of the whole House on the Finance Bill (No. 2) are to be taken shall be: new Clauses relating to the effect of provisions of the Bill on section 18 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984, Clause 61, Clause 26, Clause 91, Schedule 14, Clause 106 and Clauses 13 to 15.—[Dawn Primarolo.]

New Clause 1

APPLICATION OF SECTION 18 IHTA 1984

'Notwithstanding any provision of this Act, section 18 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 (transfers between spouses) shall continue to apply to transfers of value between spouses to the extent to which they are exempt transfers under the provisions of that section.'.—[Mrs. Villiers.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment (c) to the new clause, in line 1, leave out from 'Act' to end of line 4 and insert—

'all transfers of value made on or after 22nd March 2006 which would have been exempt under section 18 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 (transfers between spouses) if made immediately prior to 22nd March 2006 shall continue to be exempt.'.

Amendment (a) to the new clause, in line 2, at end insert—

'written into trust by will, life assurance policy and lifetime gift'.

Amendment (b) to the new clause, in line 3, after 'spouses', insert 'and civil partners'.

New clause 2—Application of section IHTA 1984 (No. 2)—

'Notwithstanding any provision of this Act, section 18 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 (transfers between spouses) shall continue to apply to transfers of value written into trust by will, life assurance policy and lifetime gift to spouses and civil partners for two years until—

(a) a full consultation has been undertaken about the operation of that section;

(b) a Regulatory Impact Assessment of the operation of that section has been completed; and

(c) the impact of the Act on transfers of value written into trust through wills, lifetime gifts and life assurance policies has been calculated.'.

New clause 3—Application of section IHTA 1984 (No. 3)—

'Notwithstanding any provision of this Act, all transfers of value made on the death of a person on or after 22nd March 2006 but before 6th April 2008 which would have been exempt under section 18 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 (transfers between spouses) if made immediately prior to 22nd March 2006, shall continue to be exempt.'.

3.35 pm

Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The aim of the new clause is to ensure that husbands and wives continue to be free of the burden of inheritance tax when they transfer property to each other; to ensure that nothing in the Bill narrows the operation of the long-established spouse exemption from inheritance tax in section 18 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984; and to ensure that all transfers covered by section 18 before Budget day will continue to be covered, regardless of other provisions in the Bill, including schedule 20. I am not sure that the Government are minded to accept new clause 1, but if they do so, my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) will wish to move amendment (c). The Opposition are happy to support that amendment, and hope to press the matter to vote, as it has the same general goal as new clause 1, but has more watertight drafting. In the unlikely event that new clause 1 and amendment (c) are accepted there would still be a number of significant problems with schedule 20, to which the Opposition propose to return in Committee.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): The hon. Lady said that her new clause applies to spouses. For the avoidance of doubt, will she accept amendment (b), which could improve it by including civil partners?

Mrs. Villiers: The hon. Gentleman makes a very good point, which I have already taken on board. In my view, section 103 of the Finance Act 2005 means that new clause 1 covers civil partners as well. Essentially, section 103 and the related delegated legislation give civil partners in this context the same rights as spouses. If we solve the problem for spouses, we automatically solve it for civil partners, too.

The Opposition believe that it is vital to save the spouse exemption for husbands, wives and civil partners for the reasons that it was introduced in its present form by the Callaghan Government in 1975—to reflect society's concern for the welfare of bereaved spouses, and to mitigate severe hardship when matrimonial homes had to be sold to pay the tax bill. There are two new modern reasons to reinforce the need to retain the exemption. The first has already been raised by the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant). It is important to preserve the spouse exemption for civil partners, to whom it has only just been granted. As I said, if we are successful today in protecting spouses, section 103 of the Finance Act 2005 will protect civil partners. Secondly, rising house prices, particularly in London and the south-east mean that many more middle-income families are caught by inheritance tax, and could therefore be hit by the changes in the Bill.

The Law Society recently conducted a survey asking its members which of their clients would be affected. I shall quote just a few of the answers. They were people from "every walk of life—teachers/nurses/engineers/computer professionals/office workers/ bank staff/engineers/manual workers—anyone who lives in their own home in the South of England ... police officers ... Civil servants, local government officers, doctors ... shopkeepers: retired people of moderate means who have been prudent ... office managers ... self-employed small business men and women (taxi drivers, carpenters, joiners, plumbers, builders, decorators). Ordinary families working hard to pass saved income to children. Second-marriage couples with an average-priced property wishing to make flexible arrangements for spouse and children. All types, not necessarily high earners but prudent savers and budgeters. Any couple with a 3 bed detached or 4 bed semi who have young children. Regular middle income earners. A whole range of ordinary people—people who have tried to work hard and save for their children's future."

Ann Coffey (Stockport) (Lab): Will the hon. Lady tell me at what level she proposes to set inheritance tax?

Mrs. Villiers: We are not talking about the bands of inheritance tax—that is not the debate—but about new additional and penal inheritance tax charges that will apply to circumstances that are now altogether free of inheritance tax.

On Second Reading, the Paymaster General said that the measures on trust proposed in the Bill were aimed at preventing "wealthy individuals" from

"using trusts ... to shelter their wealth from inheritance tax."—[Official Report, 24 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 460.]

However, trusts seldom give rise to any tax advantages whatever; they are generally tax-neutral. As the impressive coalition of professionals campaigning against these measures has pointed out, the trusts penalised by the Bill are generally motivated by unobjectionable non-tax objectives: family and social objectives, which will become prohibitively expensive as a result of the proposed measures.

Since estate duty was introduced in 1894, trusts have received broadly the same tax treatment as outright gifts. For example, under current rules, a gift on a flexible trust to a spouse, with the remainder going to children at the age of 25, is taxed in the same way as an outright gift of the property to the spouse, which is then passed on to her children on her death. Thus, the tax exemption means that no tax is charged on the first death, but the capital is charged at the full rate when the surviving spouse dies and the property passes to the children.

Far from removing some sort of privileged status, as the Paymaster General claimed on Second Reading, the Government are effectively proposing to introduce additional new and penal tax charges on trusts, treating them more harshly than an outright gift. The Chancellor is actually tearing up a 100-year consensus, repeated only recently by the Revenue in its attempt to maintain a tax system for trusts that does not provide artificial incentives to set up a trust, but equally avoids artificial obstacles to using trusts where they would bring significant non-tax benefits.

Before Budget day, section 18 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 exempted gifts on trusts to spouses in exactly the same way as the system operated for outright gifts and transfers. Unless the Bill is amended, it will become almost impossible to set up a trust for a spouse without losing the exemption, as it will incur an immediate inheritance tax charge on the death of the first spouse. The spousal exemption will survive only in cases falling under the definition of an immediate post-death interest, complying with six very narrow and restrictive conditions set out in the new section 49A of the 1984 Act, as proposed in schedule 20.

No one has yet been able to say with certainty how the six opaquely drafted conditions will apply in practice. It seems clear that severe problems will be caused by conditions 1, 3 and 4. Condition 1 states that the gift must take effect by will or intestacy. That means that spouses will no longer be able to set up trusts for one another during their life time without incurring the new charges. A particular concern is that it is not clear that condition 1 will be satisfied where a trust has been established not under a will, but under a pension policy or death in service arrangements, leaving the threat of the new charges applying in those circumstances.

Condition 3 requires that the power to terminate the surviving spouse's life interest is exercised only by the spouse or with the spouse's permission. That sounds technically innocuous, but the net result is that a significant number of trusts created on divorce would fall outside the provisions of condition 3, with the risk of the new charges applying.

Condition 4 provides that the life interest for a surviving spouse will qualify for the exemption only if, following its termination, assets pass absolutely to the beneficiaries. With very limited exceptions, if the property remains in trust after the death of the live tenant, the spouse exemption will not apply. The net effect of those conditions is that, if there is any flexibility in the trust, the spousal exemption is lost and a bereaved spouse or civil partner will face an immediate inheritance tax bill.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): Given that we are dealing either with divorce or the death of one spouse, which is more likely to be the man than the woman, is not the net effect of the restrictions effectively to penalise women rather than men?

Mrs. Villiers: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. The measure will impact with disproportionate harshness on women.

Because of the rule against flexibility, the spouse exemption will be lost in virtually every case where a trust is set up. Until Budget day, a lawyer who drafted a trust without flexibility might easily find herself on the end of a negligence suit. Indeed, flexibility in trusts has been considered so important that Parliament specifically inserted flexibility into trusts via section 32 of the Trustee Act 1925. The Government's response is to say that if people want to keep their spouse exemption, they can change their wills or vary existing trusts and opt for outright gifts or the restrictive trusts that comply with the conditions that I have just outlined in the new section 49A, but this is not an adequate answer.

The proposals will have a disproportionate effect on many people who, for family reasons—not for tax reasons—do not wish to make outright gifts to their spouse. These people face the invidious choice between making arrangements that they believe are inappropriate for their family's welfare, or facing an unwelcome extra tax bill that could require the family home to be sold.

3.45 pm

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): Can the hon. Lady explain what sort of family reasons those would be?

Mrs. Villiers: Certainly. I will come to that in a moment.

Flexibility is built into modern trusts to help people deal with the complexity of family life in modern Britain and provide responsibly for the future of their families. The Law Society survey to which I referred earlier reported one of its members as saying:

"I prepare at least one will every week of my working life—the majority of my clients who have set up life interest trusts in their will do so to protect children from a first marriage whilst looking after the second spouse or as protection for the children of the same marriage—all this talk of tax evasion is nonsense. The traditional family set-up is no more—trusts have evolved in line with this—it is a shame that the Government has sought to undermine this."

Typical everyday instances where people set up flexible trusts include, as the quote suggests, the need to provide both for a spouse from a second marriage and for the children of a first marriage. A trust can be an invaluable aid in achieving the difficult task of mediating between the interests of step-parents and stepchildren. Trusts are also used to provide for children when a surviving spouse is young and likely to remarry and possibly have children from a subsequent marriage, or to enable trustees to continue to look after the interests of a spouse when old age may mean that mental capacity is affected, or when people are not confident enough that they can foretell all the family circumstances that will apply in a few years. One must remember that wills may be made well in advance of death and in the expectation that they will hold good and provide the right answer for many years to come.

Helen Goodman: Can the hon. Lady explain why a person would want to set up a trust, rather than changing their will if, for example, they got married again or had more children? I do not see the need for a complicated trust device with special rules.

Mrs. Villiers: The trust allows the testator to split the property between his second spouse and his children in a way that he believes is sensible and balances their interests. The typical arrangement is for the second spouse to be given access to the income from the property and the right to live in a property, but for the capital to be preserved and passed on to the children on death.

The legislation ignores the realities of modern family life. Trusts provide an invaluable prop for those who are juggling the competing and sometimes conflicting interests of different family members—a prop that the Government wish to kick away. As Stephen Pallister of solicitors Charles Russell pointed out:

"Thinking of the numerous and obvious reasons why a spouse might leave their estate for the other on death—health, financial difficulties, unstable personality, second marriage and wanting to preserve the capital for the children of a first marriage, etc.—this is a gross mistake by the Government."

Even if people are prepared to sacrifice the flexibility that I have mentioned to avoid the new charges, there are further flaws in the Government's argument that there is no problem with their proposal because people can change their wills or trusts to prevent the new charges from applying. The first problem is that the power to vary the trust is exactly the type of flexibility that the Government seek to outlaw through the restrictive conditions on receiving the spousal exemption, so it seems odd that they are defending their actions by encouraging people to use the system that they propose effectively to outlaw.

[Mrs. Villiers]

Secondly, many variations can be carried out only by going to court—for example, where children are involved—which may not give people permission to vary the trust. The costs of a High Court hearing in the chancery division are prohibitive and will not be justifiable in most of the cases covered by the new rules. Furthermore, there must be a question mark over how well the courts will cope with the significant burden of hearing so many cases.

Frankly, it is not easy to see exactly what tax problem the Revenue is targeting with its proposals. It has indicated informally that its concern is a situation in which the surviving spouse gives up their life interest and distributes all assets to the trust for the next generation. If that is the Revenue's concern, then it is attacking the wrong target. It is not the flexibility in the trusts that allows people to reduce their tax bill in the situation that I have outlined, but the use of the potentially exempt transfer system, which exempts the transfer of the life interest from inheritance tax, if the spouse survives for seven years after they have given up the life interest.

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): Is it not the case that setting up trusts is just a way for a few wealthy individuals to avoid paying inheritance tax?

Mrs. Villiers: As I have said, setting up a trust does not provide inheritance tax advantages. People set up trusts in order to look after their families.

Rather than clobbering all flexible trusts, why not retain the current, long-established rules for trust taxation, which have worked well, but provide that if a spouse's life interest terminates during their lifetime and the assets pass to a continuing flexible trust, then it automatically gives rise to a chargeable transfer, in which case the potentially exempt transfer regime does not apply? That would achieve the result that the Revenue wants more effectively, and it would do so without inflicting the collateral damage of infringing on people's freedom to provide prudently for the future of their families in the way in which they want to and of requiring 1 million wills to be rewritten. We are prepared to work with the Government and expert groups to draft a targeted amendment along those lines.

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): The hon. Lady has acknowledged that any transfer to a spouse is exempt. Will she explain why somebody would set up a trust during their lifetime to transfer assets that are exempt from inheritance tax to their spouse?

Mrs. Villiers: The problem in relation to the creation of lifetime trusts is not nearly as serious as the problem in relation to the creation of trusts on death, because the creation of lifetime trusts is much more unusual. The significant problem concerns the limitations on someone's right to set up a trust on their death.

Dawn Primarolo: As the hon. Lady has acknowledged, there will be no change to the rules on the transfer to the spouse on death of all interest in all property. Those rules will not be changed at all by these arrangements, so what is the point that she is trying to make?

Mrs. Villiers: The Paymaster General is right that there is no change to the rules on making outright transfers to the spouse. The Government propose to change the rules where trusts are set up for spouses, which is a significant restriction of the spousal exemption. Section 18 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 explicitly refers to the ability to set up trusts, and the Paymaster General proposes to limit the ability of people to set up such trusts.

Ann Coffey: Will the hon. Lady explain to the Committee why she feels comfortable in supporting trusts that protect the wealthiest members of our society from paying inheritance tax?

Mrs. Villiers: Trusts protect a wide range of some of the most vulnerable people in our community. If Members do not believe me, they should think back to my quotations from the Law Society—from people who are working on the ground managing people's arrangements for their wills. It is probably in the interests of lawyers for the proposals to go through, because everyone will have to go to them to get their wills changed, yet they care so passionately about the ordinary, middle-income, hardworking, prudent people whom they represent that they are campaigning against the changes in order to enable them to continue to be able to set up the trusts they wish.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that for the past six or seven years every solicitor practising family law who has been asked to draw up a will has recommended to their clients that in the event that they have children or have been divorced, or both, it is in their interests that their will is written into a trust, irrespective of the value of assets in their estate. Moreover, given that average house prices are approaching the point whereby several years hence the majority of estates are likely to fall within the inheritance tax net, we are talking not about the rich but about householders.

Mrs. Villiers: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. For many years, it has been a standard part of more or less every will drafted for a family to include a trust because those arrangements make sense in balancing the different interests of different family members.

While I am broadly sympathetic to the objectives of the Liberal Democrat amendments, I prefer the approach taken in new clause 1 and amendment (c). I appreciate the importance of safeguarding the interests of civil partners, but new clause 1 and amendment (c) already cover that when read in conjunction with the existing legislation.

On new clause 2, I agree that postponement of the measures to give time for consultation and reflection would be very welcome. Amendment (a) and new clause 2 refer to life assurance. On Second Reading, the Chief Secretary said that life assurance policies 'are not affected by the Bill. If that is the Government's aim, I am not convinced that they have yet achieved it. Although reassurance on the point was rushed into the explanatory notes at the last minute, Kevin Martin, president of the Law Society, later disclosed:

"The Revenue has confirmed to us that the Finance Bill does indeed contain nothing on this. There is no specific exclusion for life policy trusts as has been widely claimed. Millions of wills and life policy trusts may be caught."

The Revenue's assurances on life policies seem to be based on the view that premium payments are not additions to the trust because they are made pursuant to the terms of the policy contract. That contested view of the legal position is scant comfort for the policyholders who could be hit with the new IHT charges. Skandia Life has said that as many as 4.5 million people could be affected. In any event, life policies settled on accumulation and maintenance trusts would still be affected. The problem has not been solved, and I hope that the Government will consider taking appropriate measures to tackle it in the Bill.

I urge the Government to accept new clause 1 and amendment (c) and reverse their decision to impose new inheritance tax charges on trusts for spouses and civil partners. I urge them to scrap all the penal new inheritance tax charges that they are proposing. First, no proper consultation has taken place on these new taxes. The Chancellor left them out of his Budget speech and the Revenue failed to mention them in the entirety of a detailed two-year consultation process that it carried out on the taxation of trusts. Secondly, these taxes are retrospective. They apply to existing wills and trusts, many of which will be expensive, difficult and in some cases impossible to amend. Thirdly, no effective assessment has been made of their impact. Upwards of 1 million wills of ordinary working people may need to be reviewed and rewritten, with all the huge costs that that would entail. Finally, they would amount to a tax on prudent families and impact harshly on thousands of ordinary, hardworking people whose only crime is to provide responsibly for their families and to plan for an uncertain future.

If these harsh new tax proposals are anything to go by, the future that middle England faces in Brown's Britain is more uncertain and grim than ever.

4 pm

Chris Bryant: I intend to speak briefly because I want to make only two points.

First, although the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) sounded reasonable, she exaggerated the need for any changes to the Government's proposals. Indeed, the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne), who perhaps owns property that far exceeds the expectations of any of my constituents, gave the game away when he said that half of all properties in Britain will soon—in a matter of a few years—go over the threshold. Not a single property in the Rhondda sells at £300,000. The idea that 50 per cent. of estates in the next few years will reach £325,000 is extraordinary. The hon. Gentleman's mathematics need to be better because between 94 and 96 per cent. of estates do not reach that threshold today and will not do so with the increases in the threshold that the Bill proposes.

Mr. Dunne: Clearly, I am not familiar with property values in the Rhondda, but I know those in my constituency of Ludlow, where the average property value exceeds £200,000. I understand that the average property value in the south-east of England exceeds £300,000.

Chris Bryant: The hon. Gentleman can speak for his constituency, but I dare to suggest that if he considers the whole country, his statement that 50 per cent. of estates will be valued at more than £325,000 in the next few years is a gross exaggeration.

When the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet gave her list of teachers, fire officers and others, she appeared to suggest that all of them—every teacher in the country—will suddenly have to put together a new will and a new trust. She clearly has not met teachers in my constituency, or in the majority of constituencies, who will not get anywhere near the £325,000 figure. Consequently, her comments constitute scaremongering, which is an inappropriate approach to the Bill.

Secondly, the reason for my opposition to new clause 1 and my wholehearted support for the Government's proposals is that there are two alternative directions of travel in which we can move on inheritance tax. One is to undermine inheritance tax—not necessarily by pledging to abolish it, but by suggesting that one disagrees with it and would like to abolish it even if one does not have the gumption to say so. On the other hand—I may be about to step into old-fashioned shoes—some of us believe in inheritance tax for the simple reason that the greatest source of inequality and inequity in British society is inherited wealth. If we do nothing, especially when the wealthiest in our society are doing extremely well, to undermine the progress towards greater inequality, we undermine the fabric of the society in which I want and choose to live.

The hon. Lady was wrong to table new clause 1. We need to do what the Government propose and try to ensure that there are not many different ways of exempting oneself from inheritance tax and that there are not ways that are especially available to the wealthiest in society, who can afford expensive consultants on tax and other matters.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Chris Bryant: Of course I give way to the hon. Gentleman, whose honour itself is inherited.

John Thurso: The hon. Gentleman is too kind. I quite understand the logic of his argument, but will he tell me whether he would like the Government to remove all exemptions to inheritance tax and to apply it to everyone across the board with no exceptions?

Chris Bryant: No. This is another area in which the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet exaggerated earlier. She seemed to suggest that spouses and civil partners were suddenly going to face a new problem in relation to inheritance tax. I do not believe that to be true; it is an exaggeration. However, the Paymaster General might want to clarify the one genuine point that the hon. Lady raised when she described the situation of someone who remarries and wants to ensure that some of their property goes to the children of their first marriage, and that the second wife is happy with that arrangement, as is often the case. Perhaps the Paymaster General could clarify precisely how that will still be possible.

To return to the question that the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) asked me, of course there should be exemptions, and the most important are those for spouses and civil partners.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that prospects under Labour are so poor in his part of the world that no one there will ever reach the inheritance tax threshold?

Chris Bryant: No. The right hon. Gentleman misunderstands the economy of south Wales, just as he did when he was Secretary of State for Wales. I must point out to him that there are more people in paid employment with good prospects today because of the national minimum wage, which he opposed. However, if I continue in that vein, Sir Alan, you will tell me that I am straying somewhat from new clause 1, and I did promise to draw my remarks to a close fairly swiftly.

Inheritance tax is about paying a fair share, and the proposal by the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet tries to undermine the concept of a fair share. We are right to oppose new clause 1.

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): As we have heard, there is a divergence of opinion on what the Bill means. The Red Book suggests that only £15 million would be raised by the changes to inheritance tax and trusts, and that the new regulations would affect only a small number of people. However, the evidence given to the Treasury Committee by John Whiting suggested that the changes would affect a lot of everyday arrangements and a huge number of individuals. The Times suggested that they would affect 100,000 families and the Society of Trust and Estate Practitioners went further, estimating that at least 1 million wills would be affected. The society also estimated that the average cost of rewriting a will was £250. If we multiply that by 1 million, we see that the cost to individuals of rewriting their wills would stand at £250 million, while the benefit to the Treasury of the changes would be £15 million. It is easy to see the disparity between the number of people likely to be affected and the amount of money raised.

Skandia estimated that up to 4.5 million life insurance policies could be affected by the changes, because so many families have life insurance policies written into trusts. Given that the nil rate band does not stay in line with inflation, more and more families will be drawn into the lower end of the system. Therefore, it is not only those who presently fall into the inheritance tax band who will be going back to their solicitors to change their life insurance policies. This will also affect people who are unsure at what point in the future their estate might fall into the inheritance tax band.

Ann Coffey: Will the hon. Lady tell us at what level her party proposes to set inheritance tax?

Julia Goldsworthy: I am very pleased to tell the hon. Lady that we [illegible]tly be announcing a fundamental review of the taxation system, in which all will be revealed. That review will look into making the taxation system fairer and more progressive.

Dawn Primarolo: When the hon. Lady announces the outcome of that review, will it contain the principle that the rules apply to everyone and that no one is allowed to get round them? If so, how would her party enforce them?

Julia Goldsworthy: As I said, the system will be fairer and simpler. The hon. Members for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) and for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) do, in fact, agree on something. Fundamentally, the issue raised by new clause 1 is that of spouse exemption and whether that is changed by the Bill. There is a real lack of clarity, and all the new clauses and the amendments to them are intended to make the situation clearer. Even if the Paymaster General argues that it is already clear, members of the public and professionals have a different interpretation of what the regulations mean.

I can see the good intentions of new clause 1, but its argument is slightly circular—that anything exempt under the new Act will continue to be exempt—and does not make sense. The amendment tabled by the hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) improves his Front-Bench team's phrasing and overcomes that tautology. New clause 2, tabled by Liberal Democrat Members, extends that and calls for a further period of time to have elapsed so that the implications of the legislation can be made absolutely clear, not least for individuals who have died since the Budget either intestate or with their will written into trust. At the moment, the cases of those individuals are subject to considerable uncertainty. I am glad that the hon. Member for Rhondda approves of amendment (b), which, for the avoidance of any doubt whatever, makes it clear that civil partners will also fall under the spousal exemption.

New clause 2 seeks a delay in the implementation of the Act until its impact is fully assessed and understood. Debate in the House and outside shows continuing disagreement about the extent of that impact. Making it explicit that a full consultation will take place would be appreciated, as that did not happen before the proposals in the Bill were put forward. I understand that a partial regulatory impact assessment has been undertaken, but the new clause would ensure that there would be a full regulatory impact. Is the Paymaster General prepared to publish that partial regulatory impact assessment before the relevant clauses are considered in Committee? Will she also provide longer-term projections of the revenue that she estimates the measures will gather? The Red Book gives only a limited time scale and shows that, according to the Government's estimates, the amount of money will be small. Clearly, the professionals think that the opposite might be the case. All the measures in new clause 2 would help to inform the public and make clear what the impact and the revenue implications for the Treasury will be.

As I said, new clause 3 echoes the theme of the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire and extends it. As well as making it absolutely clear that there will be no retrospection for applied transfers of value written into trust made prior to 22 March, it makes provision for people who have died intestate with dependants since 22 March. Currently, their estates are in limbo, and it is not clear how the new regime will apply to them. Fundamentally, it preserves the existing rules of exemption for two years until the new system and its implications are fully established. It also sorts out what happens in relation to people who die in the intervening period.

Surely the fundamental anomaly is that, under the existing regulations, someone can still make a lifetime gift free of inheritance tax if they do not die within seven years. That has not been redressed by the Bill. The changes proposed by the Bill impact on people who are not cash-rich, cannot make cash gifts in kind and thereby avoid inheritance tax, and have houses that have increased greatly in value in the many years that they have lived in them. In my constituency, for example, average house prices are increasing so rapidly, and the gap between house prices and incomes is so great, that more and more households are falling into inheritance tax.

Can the Paymaster General be explicit about what mischief has been done that the Government are trying to overcome, and about their assessment of the impact of any avoidance under the existing trust regime? Will the Government respond to the Treasury Committee's request that they should provide detailed information about how they arrived at their estimate that the new rules on the tax treatment of certain trusts will affect only a "minority of a minority" of the 100,000 discretionary trusts? Will they do that before clause 57 and schedule 20 are considered in Committee?

If, as the Government claim, existing spouse exemptions and other reliefs from inheritance tax will continue to apply when a trust is set up in the case of an individual with dependants dying intestate, can they explain why the professionals beg to differ? Can they specify where that is explicit in the Bill, and can they clearly demonstrate why the new clauses and the amendments to new clause 1 are not necessary? Along with the professionals and many members of the public, I would welcome more clarity, certainty and evidence-based policy-making in this regard.

4.15 pm

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) has identified an extremely important problem, which the Government would be well advised to take seriously.

I do not expect to be a beneficiary of any trust of this kind. I have created no such family trusts in my own family. I no longer have a spouse, so I have no direct interest in that context, either. I sought and gained a clean-break divorce settlement, so the divorce did not trigger the establishment of any trust. I therefore believe that I have approached the matter with independent judgment.

Having exercised my independent judgment, I conclude that there are many people of modest means who, quite legitimately, have taken advice and set up trusts to look after their family interests. In many instances, that was done not on the advice of people who said that it was a tax-efficient way of doing things, but on the advice of those who said that it was the best way of protecting family interests against competing claims within the family—the best way of meeting the legitimate needs and requirements of the children, as against the legitimate needs and requirements of a new spouse or another relative. It might not always be a case of family breakdown; other relatives could be involved, such as grandparents, grandchildren, aunts or uncles. There are numerous combinations for which trusts make a great deal of sense.

One answer that we need to tease out of the Government involves the extent to which the legislation appears to be retrospective. We would all feel easier about it if the Government recognised that over the past nine years they have presided over a tax and legal regime that made it perfectly rational and sensible for families to organise their affairs through trusts. Now they seem to be blowing the whistle. I consider that the Government are legislating retrospectively, in practice if not technically, when they say that they do not like the arrangements that people have made to deal with future events and force them to change those arrangements—arrangements that were made on the basis of good advice and were legal and sensible under the law of the time, which happens to have been approved and supported by this Government over the past nine years.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I understand what the right hon. Gentleman is saying. Did he support the Inheritance Tax Act 1984? As I recall, that Act changed the previous regime of capital transfer tax to the current inheritance tax regime and was open to the very criticisms that he is now making in regard to retrospectivity and people who plan for the future.

Mr. Redwood: I did not support it because I was not a Member of Parliament at the time. [Interruption.] I am telling the hon. Gentleman the truth. I did not support the legislation, and I dare say that if it contained an element of retrospection I would—as a well-known independent voice—have pointed it out.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): The right hon. Gentleman was a member of the Cabinet.

Mr. Redwood: The Minister may recall that I resigned from the Cabinet over matters of principle because I had reached a point at which I did not agree with that Government. The Minister has walked into a heffalump trap of his own making: I am not the person to tease over sticking to my principles.

Mr. Lewis: The right hon. Gentleman wanted to be leader.

Mr. Redwood: It was a long time ago, but if the Minister reads my resignation statement he will see that my resignation was not about that; it was about issues of disagreement between myself and the Government. I hope that he will withdraw his uncharitable remark about my wishes on that occasion.

I hope that the Paymaster General will deal with the issue of retrospection. In this and earlier debates, a number of Members have drawn attention to the high cost, for families of modest means, of going over ground that they thought had been resolved at the time of the original trust settlement—when the grandparents made their offer, when the divorce was agreed, or when something else triggered the arrangement.

The Labour party seems to want to stretch the debate to discover what are the general intentions in relation to inheritance tax. I know that you are very careful to maintain order, Sir Alan, but I will say this: of course I think that a much higher threshold for inheritance tax would be helpful generally and would deal with some of the problems that we seem to be encountering across the Floor today.

Helen Goodman: If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that, can he also tell us whether agrees or disagrees with the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), who says that equality is a problem in this regard? How does the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) reconcile those two ideas?

Mr. Redwood: I am a great believer in equality of opportunity, and the way to have a much richer and more prosperous society is to give greater freedom and to set lower taxes, so that more people can participate in such prosperity. That is exactly the point that I was trying to tease out of the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant). I hope that he is proud to represent his constituency and that he expects some of his constituents to use the opportunities provided under even a Labour Government to build businesses and buy properties, for example, in order to become more prosperous, thereby coming into the tax regime that this Government have so carefully designed to entrap them.

Chris Bryant: The trouble is that when inherited wealth is allowed to ride untrammelled across society, it is much more difficult to achieve equality of opportunity.

Mr. Redwood: I do not think that that is true; indeed, there are many examples to the contrary. I have not inherited any wealth up to this point and I do not have great prospects in that regard, but I do not begrudge those who come from much richer families than mine doing so. If that money trickles down through the generations, it very often does far more good than if it trickles into the sticky hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which seems the only alternative on offer in today's debate.

It would be much better if the inheritance tax system recognised that a person is not very rich just because they have a flat or house that might now be worth a lot of money. There are a number of elderly residents in Kensington and Chelsea living in two or three-bedroom flats that are perhaps worth the best part of £1 million who might be on quite low incomes. Is the Labour party saying that those people must move to realise their asset and to show that they have some wealth? I want to live in a country where, if such people want to carry on living in their two-bedroom flats, they can do so. They should not be treated as rich because, even though they have low incomes and have no other assets to pay all the taxes that Labour now wants to impose on them, they happen to live in a part of the country that has rather high flat and house prices.

I hope that the Paymaster General will deal with the inequality of house prices nationwide, which is not always, as Labour seems to imply, good news for those in high house price areas. Such people could be worse off than those in low house price areas because they have to pay a disproportionately higher proportion of their assets and income in order to secure and maintain their property. In other words, the principle can work in the opposite direction.

The final issue is what should happen in future. If the Paymaster General can persuade us that there is no effective element of retrospection and that there is an injustice to tackle, we have then to test whether she has found a route to tackling the injustice and inequality that she sees, and whether she would do so in a way that would make Britain a more prosperous and equal society. I suspect that she will achieve the opposite of what she wishes to achieve.

I do not want to live in a country where only the super-rich can prosper by—thanks to their access to the really good lawyers—finding a way around the more complicated regulations that the Government have come up with. I do not want to live in a society that sends out the message that it is better to go offshore or live abroad. I know that offshore trusts have been popular with some Labour donors and Ministers, but they are not a particularly good thing to encourage. It is much better to have an honest, low-tax system that is the same for everybody, and which encourages more enterprise and success.

I hope that the Paymaster General will think twice, three times or however long it takes and understand that her proposals contain several objectionable parts. First, retrospection will disrupt family arrangements. Secondly, the suspicion that all trusts are evil tax dodges is clearly not true. Thirdly, on the Paymaster General's idea that such complexity will squeeze the rich and help the poor, I suspect that the rich will escape because they will have access to good lawyers and accountants and can always go offshore. In short, I urge the Government to drop this proposal.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): I had hoped that we might find a few areas of consensus on this issue. There is clearly a range of views on inheritance tax, but I disagree with the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant), who suggested that the new clause is an attack on the principle of IHT. Not all my colleagues will agree, but I think that there is a role for inheritance tax in our system. It may not apply to many people in the Rhondda, but it does to a lot of people in South-West Hertfordshire. The rate may also be open to question, but I do not disagree with the basic idea of inheritance tax.

In addition, the saloon bar wisdom is that wealthy people get around paying inheritance tax by using trusts. I see nothing wrong with trying to address genuine tax evasion; wealthy people should not be able to evade the tax when ordinary people in South-West Hertfordshire, Falmouth and Camborne or anywhere else are stuck with the liability.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) said, the Government have expressed the view that, essentially, trusts should be tax-neutral, and I support that. As she also noted, the Revenue's policy in reforming the income and capital tax treatment of trusts has been to create "a tax system for trusts that does not provide artificial incentives to set up a trust but, equally, avoids artificial obstacles to using trusts where they would bring significant non-tax benefits."

I see nothing wrong with that. Since 1894, when estate duty was introduced, certain types of trust have been equated with outright ownership, and taxed accordingly.

Perhaps the Paymaster General will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe that there is a consensus about the value of the spousal exemption. As my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet said, it was introduced in its current form in 1975, but in some form or other it dates back to 1896. The need for the exemption is easy to understand; in most cases, an inheritance leads to a windfall, but a death usually results in a fall in income and an element of hardship for the surviving spouse.

In addition, there is usually a shared family home. Given the emotional concerns that follow a loss, it would be unduly harsh for a spouse to have to sell a house to pay an inheritance tax bill. Clearly, the particular circumstances of spouses need to be considered, and the Civil Partnership Act 2004 has extended the number of people in that category. We need to ask a couple of questions about the Bill. Does it continue to apply to tax trusts in the same way as to outright gifts, and does the spousal exemption continue to apply?

The Government might argue that the spousal exemption will apply in respect of immediate post-death interests, but the professional advice that I have seen maintains that that will not work because, in practice, it is almost impossible to meet the conditions. Moreover, it is held to be "nigh on impossible for one spouse to leave their estate in trust for the other and obtain the spouse exemption."

As my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet pointed out, there are specific conditions in the draft proposals in respect of inheritance tax that make it very difficult for most trusts to work and still obtain the spousal exemption under the immediate post-death interest definition. Condition 3 requires that the surviving spouse interest can be ended only during her lifetime with her consent. Consequently, a will that states that the surviving spouse has a right to live in a house until remarriage, when the assets pass to the children—the experts say that that is fairly common—will breach that condition and will not be able to benefit from the spousal exemption.

Condition 4 states that, on termination of a surviving spouse's interest, a person will become entitled to the capital outright. However, if the trustees have the right to defer a child's absolute entitlement—again, that is fairly common—then that condition is breached and the spousal exemption is not available.

The immediate post-death interest conditions prohibit flexibility, the need for which was questioned earlier. Again, my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet dealt with that very well. Complex family arrangements are best dealt with through flexibility. We have heard about the case of a widowed second wife, where there are children from the first marriage, which even the hon. Member for Rhondda acknowledged was an issue. There also cases such as that of a young widow who is expected to remarry and have more children; a widow and children with special needs; a childless marriage where both spouses want their assets to go to their respective nephews and nieces; where a property is complex and may impose management demands best performed by trustees rather than the widow; or where a testator has less than full confidence about the distribution of the property.

4.30 pm

Those are all legitimate, reasonable circumstances that a trust is able to address. The trust is a great intellectual achievement of English law and it seems a great pity to dismiss it as the Government seem to be doing. They seem to have a prejudice against trusts as a method of addressing those issues, which relate not to tax evasion or tax minimisation but to personal circumstances.

Dawn Primarolo: If I were to tell the hon. Gentleman that the Government have made provision for precisely the situation he describes and that a straightforward trust set up for one beneficiary—an ex-spouse or civil partner—which goes to them before passing absolutely to another person on the death of the beneficiary, retains their existing inheritance tax treatment, including the spousal exemption, would all his problems be settled?

Mr. Gauke: The right hon. Lady should not take my word; the advice provided by professional after professional is that what the Government are proposing simply will not work. In nearly every case, there is a degree of flexibility, for which the Government are not providing.

Dawn Primarolo: So the hon. Gentleman is saying that he does not believe me when I say that there is flexibility for a spouse or an ex-partner to receive an interest that is eventually passed wholly to a subsequent beneficiary. I am telling him that clearly, but he would rather believe people outside the Chamber than me and civil servants.

Mr. Gauke: I am inclined to believe specialists who work extensively in the field—[Interruption.] If the civil servants had consulted a little more widely—although that is another issue—we might not have found ourselves in these difficulties.

I think that the Government's great concern is that a widow could receive a life interest, terminate the trust and make a lifetime gift and, if she survived for seven years, benefit from provisions relating to potentially exempt transfers. I should be interested to hear from the Paymaster General about the particular difficulties that she considers exist and where the current spousal exemption is being abused. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet rightly pointed out, the Government's proposals are an ineffective way of addressing their concern. Better ways could be found by looking at the potentially exempt transfer route, which would address the matter much better than using such an over-sized sledge hammer to hit that particular nut.

I wait with anticipation to hear whether the Paymaster General will argue that one can always vary a trust on death, thereby resolving many of the problems or injustices. However, such a solution requires both that the trust is one that can be varied and a degree of flexibility, which is clearly not something that the Government want to encourage in trusts, although it would be useful in those circumstances. Variation could also be achieved with the consent of the beneficiaries, but that would not be possible if they were minors. In that case, it would be necessary to go to the court, with all the expense that would incur. If the Government chose to use that argument, it would not be persuasive.

The Government say that the provision will affect only a few people and several Labour Members have suggested that it would apply only to a tiny minority of the wealthy. However, over the past few days, I have been bombarded with documents produced by professionals pointing out that they regularly advise the inclusion of a trust in fairly normal wills, and that it is a common, run-of-the-mill device used to protect a family and to address particular family circumstances. As a matter of course, trusts are involved in wills, not for taxation reasons, but because they provide flexibility. The Government appear not to know that, which suggests a lack of consultation, which has marked the process throughout.

Why have the Government done this? Perhaps saloon bar wisdom and the lack of consultation means that they were not aware of the problems that they have caused, but I wonder whether another element is involved, so I want to offer one or two friendly words of warning to the Labour party. The whole approach smacks of a good old go at the toffs, and we have heard one or two comments along the lines this afternoon that just the wealthy and rich are affected, that the policy does not really matter and that it will play quite well perhaps back in the Rhondda.

The Labour party has been extremely successful in the past three elections, and one of the reasons is that the Prime Minister has managed to distance himself from the perception that the Labour party is a bunch of class warriors. Not for the first time, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has waded in and tried to play the class card, just as he did with Laura Spence and Oxford university, when he rushed in and got the facts wrong, did not understand the matter and rather embarrassed himself. I fear that the Government and the Chancellor have done exactly the same thing with this policy. They think that they have made an attack on the very wealthy and the privileged few, when the reality is that large numbers of ordinary people, not the wealthy, will be affected by this policy. The Government have made a misjudgment, and I suggest that they back off; they could start today by accepting the new clause.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): This has been a very interesting debate so far, and I want to make three points and to ask a question. Sir Alan, you have allowed the debate to range over the philosophy of inheritance tax—very judiciously, if I may say so—because it is important for the public that we have the opportunity to discuss such matters in the Chamber and this is the obvious opportunity to do so.

Perhaps I can start by saying that my personal view of inheritance tax—a view for which I argued, with no success whatsoever, when I was shadow Paymaster General in the shadow Administration in the 1997 Parliament—is that we should reduce the rate of inheritance tax to 10 per cent. That would put out of business the whole industry of providing ways to avoid inheritance tax by structuring and persuading people to give away their property, they hope, more than seven years before they die and would stop people leaving the country to shelter their assets from inheritance tax. Instead, we would make this country something of a haven for people with assets to shelter from inheritance tax or estate duty, or whatever may exist in their own countries. There would be a major Laffer curve effect, and we would reduce the marginal rate from 40 to 10 per cent. We certainly would not reduce the revenue by anything like that amount; the revenue might even increase. That is my own view of how to deal with the problem, but I have so far failed to persuade my hon. Friends, let alone anyone else, that that is the way forward. Perhaps, one day, we shall make progress along those lines.

Helen Goodman: Can the hon. Gentleman explain how the Laffer curve could possibly affect the revenue from inheritance tax? One can understand how it could affect work incentives and the take from income tax, but how could it possibly affect the revenue from inheritance tax?

Mr. Davies: I do not think that the hon. Lady was listening because I tried to explain how that would happen. First, to avoid inheritance tax quite honourably, sensibly and rationally, a considerable number of people try to give their money away to their children more than seven years before they expect that they might be in danger of dying. Clearly, that is a loss to the Revenue. Clearly, there is an element of gambling about it, but I do not think that people would do that if the rate were only 10 per cent., because of the considerable disadvantages and considerable risks; not least that their children may marry the wrong person, so half the money would go to someone else. There are all sorts of risk of that kind, so people would not go in for those schemes as much as they do currently.

Secondly, people are sometimes influenced in their choice of country of residence by the inheritance tax regime. If we have a 40 per cent. regime in this country, people will not come here with large assets and those with substantial assets will tend to move away. I am explaining this at some length because the hon. Lady obviously did not follow the argument when I presented it in slightly more summarised form a few minutes ago, but it is a serious argument and I suggest that she think about it.

The Laffer curve effect means that one reduces the rate of a tax and, as a result, induces behavioural changes. As a result of that, the revenue from the tax rises. That is what I was arguing—I think reasonably—we could achieve through reducing the rate of inheritance tax. I make that point today because I have tried to make it before in private conversation and got nowhere. Perhaps someone who is listening will pick the idea up and it will eventually get somewhere.

My second point is for the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant), who has unfortunately just left the Chamber. He used an extraordinarily bad argument and I am sorry that he is not present. I think that, if he thinks about it, he will confess that it was a bad argument. He said that very few people in his constituency—and, of course, a considerable minority in the country as a whole—have assets that approach the inheritance tax threshold or ever think of setting up a trust in the course of their lives. That is irrespective of the connection between the two things: there may be good arguments, which have nothing whatever to do with inheritance tax, for setting up trusts.

It is perfectly true that the great majority of our fellow citizens do not find themselves in danger of paying IHT or thinking about trusts. However, the hon. Gentleman then suggested that it did not matter if we were making a bad law, because it would affect only a minority of people. That is a bad principle for any legislature to operate on and I would be very sorry indeed if anybody in the British House of Commons thought, on reflection, that that was a sensible way for us to work in this legislature.

Any injustice or perversity is to be avoided and to be regretted if it happens. We must hope, in all our deliberations and decisions, to improve the rationality and fairness of the corpus of law in this country and not to detract from them. If there are problems with the Government's Bill and if it would increase unfairness and perversity, we should reject the proposals, and we should do that irrespective of the number of people who might be sufferers from that irrationality or unfairness. That is a general point of principle.

My third point is that the Government owe us some explanation of their agenda. We have not heard one so far in the debate. They clearly have an agenda—reflected in the Bill—to have a go at trusts. There was an interesting discussion between the Paymaster General and my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) about the extent to which the proposals in the Bill would remove the exemption from inheritance tax, which the right hon. Lady tells us the Government intend to maintain, in the case of inter-spouse transfers on death—that is to say, inheritance by one spouse from another—in the event that that transfer or inheritance takes places by means of a trust. I cannot see any rational reason at all for saying, "Well, we think that it is a good idea to have an exemption from inheritance tax for spouses, but not if the spouses, for whatever reason, have arranged their affairs so that transfer takes place on death by means of a trust or so that the assets pass into a trust on death." We need to know why the Government want to make such a change and if it is a change that they intend to make, as opposed to an effect that they did not anticipate when they drafted the Bill.

Irrespective of that point, which is a matter for debate between my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet and the Paymaster General, there are many other areas where the Bill indisputably, and without any apparent reason, attacks trusts in one way or another, or makes the result of people setting up a trust a damaging and perverse one, which it otherwise would not be. For example, the Bill would ensure that the beneficiaries of accumulation and maintenance trusts would have to come into full title of the assets, and could dispose of them without any restriction, when they were 18 years old. It is amazing to me that anybody in this Chamber, irrespective of their political party, thinks that it is a frightfully good idea to give a large amount of capital, in relation to that family's total assets, to a young person of 18 to dispose of quite freely. Is that sensible? The right hon. Lady may want to give her son such an amount at the age of 18, but I certainly would not want to do that to my children because it would be extremely dangerous. Why should the Government try to change the law so as to force that to happen?

Equally, the Government are changing the law to ensure that the only beneficiaries of accumulation and maintenance trusts can be either those who are benefiting from a criminal injuries order, or the beneficiaries of trusts set out by parents. However, let us consider trusts set up by grandparents, people who wish to set up a trust for the benefit of their own children and the children of a dead sister or brother who have been left in difficulty, or, indeed, people with no children who wish to leave money in a trust for the benefit of the children of their dead brother or sister. Why should we penalise such trusts as against trusts set up by parents? What is the Government's agenda?

I am mystified by why the Government have suddenly got it into their head to have a run at trusts. Was it, as has been suggested, a purely emotional and symbolic thing? Did the Paymaster General suddenly think that trusts are nasty because they are associated with richer people? I am sure that that is not the explanation because I know her too well to think that she would suddenly have such a rush of blood to the head and thus decide to draw up such legislation.

Was a rational calculation made of the amount of money that could be squeezed out of the public by changing the rules on trusts? The hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy), who speaks for the Liberal party—she has also left the Chamber—disposed of that one. She said that on the Government's figures, the provisions will result in a net increase in revenue of £15 million. She gave us an estimate of the cost of rewriting trusts and of taxpayers rearranging their affairs that ran to hundreds of millions.

However, even if the hon. Lady's substantial estimate was a little excessive, on the figures that she gave to the Committee, one can easily envisage that a modest estimate of the costs would be tens of millions. On the test of proportionality to which, I think, the Paymaster General and her Government are committed, the provisions thus fail because the incremental revenue bears no relation to the cost to taxpayers, which is basically a cost to the economy. Although the change might be a good thing for the accountancy and legal professions, it will mean that people will incur large costs that are gratuitously imposed by a piece of legislation with a motive that none of us really understands.

Before we go any further, it would be extremely helpful if the Paymaster General gave the Committee an explanation. Perhaps I have, naively, missed an obvious point, but, if so, I am reassured that no hon. Member on either side of the Chamber appears to have grasped it. What was the objective behind targeting trusts? Why have trusts been scheduled for punishment in such a way? What is the rationale behind the approach? We must have rational government in a sophisticated democracy. If the Government bring forward new measures and want to change the law, the burden must be on them to demonstrate that the change is beneficial and sensible. They must show that they have thought the change through from the point of view of the country's economic interests, fairness and justice to individuals and the proportionality of cost, because they are the classic principles on which good law, including good tax law, must always be based.

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): I am getting the sense that I am in a minority in the Committee as I do not have a legal string to my bow. However, my lack of legal training gives me a distinct advantage when it comes to new clause 1, and amendment (c) to it, because I can, at the very least, appreciate the value of clarity. The new clause is a simple appeal for certainty in a Bill that contains less of that quality than might be desired. The number of people who may be affected by the proposed changes to the taxation of trusts has given all hon. Members cause for concern.

Perhaps my closest brush with the law on wills and trusts comes from "Bleak House", which provides a useful parallel to the Government's proposals. The catalogue of potential beneficiaries at the heart of Jarndyce and Jarndyce, where inheritance is squandered, indolence is encouraged and legal proceedings are interminable, bears close comparison to the lists of those who stand to suffer, if the proposals that we are considering are carried into law—namely widows, minors and the vulnerable.

Indeed, Finance Bills as a whole have more than a passing similarity to Jarndyce as Finance Bills

"in course of time become so complicated that no man alive knows what it means" and nobody

"can talk about it for five minutes without coming to a total disagreement as to all the premises."

The Dickensian fog may have lifted from the Chancery courts but it still sits heavily on schedule 20 and particularly on proposed new section 49A of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984. The Government should be committed to the principle of proportionate rather than punitive taxation, and that commitment is not clear in these provisions.

New clause 1 has a modest aim: to ensure, setting aside all other confusions, that no inheritance tax will be payable on transfers of value between spouses, and not as the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) would have us believe, to avoid inheritance tax completely. The spousal exemption exists to prevent punitive double taxation of an estate. That is a sound proposition, founded on an inoffensive principle. It has, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) said, been the subject of consensus since capital transfer tax was introduced by the Labour Government in 1975. The Chief Secretary echoed the need for just such a principle when he spoke on Second Reading about the need to ensure that people pay their fair share of tax. I know from my brief experience in consideration of the National Insurance Contributions Bill that that particular Labour mantra is very much in vogue. The Paymaster General used it four times in one speech. I am glad that she has taught it to colleagues on the Treasury Bench, but the mantra is as nebulous now as it was then.

The use of trusts as a vehicle for asset protection has made them the target of another Dawn raid because they are perceived as being unfair. The fact that trusts exist to protect assets from more than the taxman does not seem to concern the Government overmuch. It is true that the caveat for those suffering from a disability has been preserved, but only for a very limited class of beneficiaries in which no one can be thought of as vulnerable if they are not first found incapable under the Mental Health Act 1983 or are claiming disability benefits. That is a sop to fairness, but in reality it is deeply regressive and inflexible. It takes care of the mad, but not the bad or the sad. It also fails to draw the sting of schedule 20 because fairness has always been at the heart of trusts.

Most often the very reason why trusts exist is to allow for flexible and equitable distribution of assets in the face of changing and unforeseen circumstances. The Government have been keen to acknowledge that trusts have a positive role to play in assisting people to manage their tax affairs, and in particular in holding assets on behalf of vulnerable people. However, vulnerability is not linked, and never has been, exclusively to disability.

Members of the legal profession made a number of representations to me on the many beneficial effects that trusts may have in restraining a rake's progress or in keeping a fool and his gold well acquainted. Many sound arguments that relate to the age at which the interests of younger beneficiaries should vest regrettably go beyond the scope of new clause 1. No doubt, the issue will be revisited in Standing Committee. However, I regard beneficiaries under a trust as vulnerable if their interests would not be adequately protected without that trust.

That point becomes germane in the context of new clause 1 if we consider the number of trusts created at present to protect the interests of children in the event that a parent should remarry. That is a common situation, and it is merely one item on the exhaustive list given by my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet. As a result of the proposal, many older testators may begin to favour outright gifts to their surviving spouse, rather than risk settling assets on trust, which may fall foul of the spousal exemption and be liable to inheritance tax. Such outright gifts do not allow any measure of flexibility. Furthermore, they do not allow testators to be sure that their children will be provided for if the surviving spouse should decide to favour the other's interests over theirs. Children in that position are undoubtedly vulnerable, so we must ensure that they are protected as before.

Sadly, that state of affairs is not unforeseeable, and it is a nightmare scenario for anyone trying to provide responsibly for a family. Modern matrimonial arrangements are complex, but there should be no doubt about whether people with multiple families will continue to benefit from the existing spousal exemption. We would not want to be responsible for encouraging an epidemic of wicked stepmothers if the provisions encourage the use of outright gifts to the detriment of the prudent protection of children. New clause 1 clarifies interference with the taxation of trusts, which is invidious in principle and may prove unworkable in practice.

Trusts and their taxation are not a subject on which I profess expertise, yet I can readily understand the implication for the average prudent family of any interference with the spousal exemption. The objective of new clause 1 is to offer simple peace of mind to the many people who may be affected by the proposals. Even the legal profession is uncertain about the runaway scope of the changes, and I am more worried about the uncertainty than I am about mere outrage, although we have seen evidence of both. The Law Society, the Chartered Institute of Taxation, the Society of Trust and Estate Practitioners and many other professional bodies have pleaded for clarity. New clause 1 would achieve it by including in the Bill an assurance that surviving spouses will not be subject to inheritance tax if their affairs are structured to maintain flexibility and protection for others.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): I am not a tax accountant or a lawyer, and, given the nature of our debate, I am grateful for that. I am grateful, too, for the briefing that right hon. and hon. Members have received from the Law Society of Scotland. I shall ask the Paymaster General a number of questions at the end of my speech, as Members on both sides of the House are deeply concerned about the legislation's impact, intentional or unintentional. The Chartered Institute of Taxation said that "all the professional bodies hope that HMRC and the government will listen to our representations and modify the proposals to ensure that spouses and civil partners remain exempt and that young and vulnerable people can continue to be protected through trusts without suffering a financial penalty."

Similarly, the Law Society president said:

"This measure will affect millions of ordinary people and not just the very wealthy that the Government claims to be targeting."

The briefing helpfully suggests that it is anomalous that wills involving trusts for the spouse should attract more tax than wills without trusts:

"If no trust is made, no inheritance tax is due until the death of both spouses in a marriage (or partners in a civil partnership). But under the new proposals, if a trust is made, inheritance tax could now be due . . . after the death of the first spouse and again after the death of the second."

Mr. Quentin Davies: I am particularly grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, as I am interrupting his speech to say that he just mentioned a briefing from the Chartered Institute of Taxation, although I have not seen it. It reminded me that I should have mentioned in my earlier intervention—I forgot, Sir Alan—that I am an adviser to the Chartered Institute of Taxation.

5 pm

Stewart Hosie: I thank the hon. Gentleman, and I am sure that the Committee Chairman will be delighted to hear that.

It is interesting to note that the briefing is signed not just by the Chartered Institute of Taxation and the Law Society, but by a large number of other bodies. It discusses the key topic of inheritance tax on life assurance policy pay-outs, stating:

"It is usual for a life assurance policy pay-out to be written in trust for the spouse or children".

It identifies two problems that may result from the new legislation, and continues:

"The proceeds may now be liable to inheritance tax in two circumstances. First, if the life assured dies before the ten-year anniversary when the trust was originally taken out and the trust is not ended at the ten-year anniversary . . . Second, if the person taking out the life cover is in ill health at the ten-year anniversary of the trust."

We heard earlier today that the life insurance company, Skandia, believes that some 4.5 million policies may be affected as a result of the changes.

I have a few questions for the Paymaster General. How many people will be affected by the new regime? Estimates seem to range from almost none to many millions. Will spouses be affected by double taxation—a key point, on which absolute clarity would be particularly helpful? How many policies currently written into trusts may be affected, and have the Government considered that problem? How many wills will need to be changed? Finally, what consultation was carried out with the industry—the life insurance industry, the pensions industry and the legal profession? All relevant bodies seem to be saying that it was very little, and perhaps that explains why the Government are in such a pickle over this problem.

Mr. Dunne: I remind the Committee of my entry in the Register of Members' Interests. I am a settlor of a trust, which I set up for my children with assets that I generated from my own endeavours—in other words, they were not inherited by me prior to my becoming a Member of the House.

I am also the beneficiary of a trust and should like to explain why it was set up. My father set it up in order to gift some assets to me, as a result of my asking a question to his adviser about whether I would be able to borrow against those assets for my other activities. So concerned was my father when he heard that he could be making me a gift that I might then seek to leverage on receipt that he put the assets into a trust, precisely in order to protect them. He was not prepared to allow me, even though I was over 25, to use those assets for a purpose other than he had intended.

Dawn Primarolo: Given that the hon. Gentleman does not have control, is the trust subject to inheritance tax?

Mr. Dunne: I am pleased to say that my father survived more than seven years after the gift was made, so it benefits from the potentially exempt transfer regime.

Dawn Primarolo: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who makes my point that changes to trusts are covered either by the spousal exemption or the seven years provision.

Mr. Dunne: I should like now to deal with the deficiencies of the regime, which I am afraid that the Paymaster missed out of her speech. The first has been mentioned—the retrospective nature of the legislation. I intervened in that regard earlier but would like some definition of the numbers of people involved. It is difficult to secure accurate figures, but my understanding is that approximately 70 per cent. of people in this country die without making a will. Out of a population of 60 million, about 18 million make a will. The Law Society believes that about 15 million people have a will, so the legislation will affect all those who currently have an estate worth more than the inheritance tax threshold of £285,000. It will affect all who anticipate that, during the balance of their lifetime, their estate might fall within the inheritance tax net and all who set up a trust within their will. I pointed out earlier that that applies to virtually everyone who has made a will in the last six or seven years and who has children or a previous wife. It will also affect anybody who wishes to leave assets to their children or to grandchildren under the age of 25. Trusts would arise by virtue of the age of the potential beneficiaries.

The estimate by the Society of Trust and Estate Practitioners is of the order of 1 million people. I have examined the basis for that calculation. It arose from a survey STEP undertook of its members immediately after the Budget statement. Only 11 per cent. of members responded, and they indicated that about 830,000 trusts would be affected. Extrapolating that figure to all the solicitors' firms that are members of STEP would produce a figure of around 8 million.

Helen Goodman: The hon. Gentleman is surely not suggesting that half the people who make a will have assets that are over the inheritance tax threshold. That would be ridiculous.

Mr. Dunne: I did not intend to suggest that. I am trying to demonstrate that there is an enormous disparity between the real figure and the figure quoted by the Paymaster General in a rather defensive letter to the newspapers shortly after the Budget, suggesting that the measure would affect tens of thousands of people. There is no doubt that the figure will be substantially larger.

I argue that millions—not 8 million, but some number of millions—of trusts and wills will need to be reviewed and arrangements altered over the transitional period in order that those assets will not fall within the inheritance tax net. That is the point that I was trying to make by citing the much larger number. Clearly, not all will have any prospect of falling within the net, but a very large proportion will.

There are approximately 150,000 divorces every year in Britain. Regrettable though that is, the partners to the divorce will, under present legislation, almost by definition have to enter into a trust when they set up a will in the event of their divorce.

Dawn Primarolo: I am advised that divorcing couples tend to make a clean break. Solicitors who are involved in divorce cases say that trusts are not widely used in those circumstances. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could elaborate on the facts.

Mr. Dunne: My understanding is that trusts are used by the courts for the settlement of assets in every divorce case that goes through the courts. I accept that that would not necessarily be the case in the event of clean breaks, but it would apply in other cases where significant assets were involved. Those generally go through the courts.

A further category that contributes to the numbers affected are couples who have recently entered into civil partnerships as a result of the legislation that came into effect earlier this year. Many of the new partnerships that have been registered will have taken the trouble to enter into a will, and, where assets are involved, those wills will need to be changed over the transitional period.

Collectively, we are discussing large numbers of people. That undermines the Paymaster General's argument that the measure will affect a small number of people and generate a small amount of revenue.

On the revenue front, I suggest to the Paymaster General, and I should like her to deal with this in her closing remarks, that she has misled the House. She indicated that the revenue gain from the proposal would be about £15 million in the first year. Let me suggest to her why that figure is so woefully wrong. Given the number of trusts and wills that will need to be reviewed and the cost of so doing with professional advice, there will be a significant VAT gain to the Exchequer from the measure. A big-four accountancy practice is currently writing to all its clients, where it is aware that trusts or wills exist, quoting a fee of £295 plus VAT—in total, £347—for the mere exercise of reviewing those people's current trust or will. It also suggests that a further fee will be incurred if people decide to make changes after the Finance Bill has been enacted.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman might suggest to people that rather than going with the big four, they should join a trade union and get a free will.

Mr. Dunne: Unfortunately, I cannot do so, because, as a result of data protection legislation, I do not have the names and addresses of the people to whom the practice has been writing. I am sure that other organisations are willing to offer a cheaper service, but the review charge calculated by the Society of Trust and Estate Practitioners is £341 rather than £347, so anyone who wants to take professional advice must incur a significant fee, which, because it is subject to VAT, will generate substantial revenue to the Chancellor. Some 1 million to 1.5 million such arrangements may need reviewing, which would generate roughly three times the revenue for the Treasury that the Paymaster General has indicated.

The retrospective nature of the legislation raises a more fundamental issue, which is the credibility of the UK as an appropriate place for people with assets to invest or to seek to conduct their business. For many years, it has been an important tenet of tax legislation that retrospective legislation is not encouraged. Because this provision has been introduced with no consultation whatsoever with the industry, it fundamentally undermines this country's long-established reputation for fairness in its taxation dealings. I urge the Paymaster General to consider whether it is worth putting at risk this country's reputation among the wealthy and, in particular, the wealthy from overseas who might want to live here and do business here, by leading such people to think that long-established provisions on tax can be changed without consultation at the drop of a hat on a retrospective basis.

Rob Marris: The measure is not retrospective, although it may change people's expectations. When people of our generation took out mortgages in 1984, we got mortgage interest relief at source, which was later phased out. Our expectation as purchasers was that we would get MIRAS for the 25-year life of the mortgage, but there was no contract with the Government to that effect. The Government changed the position, but the change was not retrospective, although it changed our expectations, and the same is true of this legislation.

Mr. Dunne: I accept that this legislation includes a transitional period over the next two years, but I still argue that many trusts that have existed for decades—centuries in some cases—will be significantly penalised. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) is laughing at the notion that trusts have existed for centuries. I have received representations from the Historic Houses Association—I am sure that other hon. Members have received such representations, too—pointing out that one of the reasons why this country has such a strong built cultural heritage, unlike many continental countries where different forms of taxation have existed and trusts, in particular, have not been involved in tax planning, is that trusts have been able to protect assets from one generation to another. That is not, as the hon. Member for Rhondda may think, a tax avoidance measure, but a measure to preserve assets as a whole, so that they continue to be viable, economically efficient assets rather than being split up among a family.

That takes me to my next point: what is the purpose of such trusts? There is a perception among Members on the Government Benches that they are set up purely to evade tax. As I illustrated with my own case, trusts are usually set up to protect assets from individuals who cannot be trusted, or for valid planning reasons, particularly in relation to the increasingly acute problems arising from multiple families as society, sadly, evolves into individuals having more and more multiple families during their lifetime. If the Bill goes through, it will fetter the choices of spouses who are in a position to do so to allocate assets to provide maintenance for children, especially in the case of a second family where there are also children from the first family. I do not think that that is Government's intention. I assume that they have not thought this through, and I urge them to do so.

5.15 pm

I should like to draw attention to one or two deficiencies in the Bill's drafting. I am sure that we will cover them in greater detail in Committee. The argument was made rather hastily following the Budget—by the Paymaster General, I believe, although it may have been by one of her ministerial colleagues—that a specific carve-out for life policies will be written into trust, but nothing in the Bill does that. Will the Paymaster General to put me right on that, either now or when she winds up?

Dawn Primarolo: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, we are not discussing the Bill and the clause—I only wish we were—but his party's new clause. I will of course reply to his point at the appropriate time in Committee, and I look forward to doing so.

Mr. Dunne: I look forward to that, too. Given that we are digressing for a moment or two, with your indulgence, Sir Michael—

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman should not pray in aid my indulgence. As has been said, he must address his remarks precisely to the new clause that we are discussing.

Mr. Dunne: I am grateful, Sir Michael.

Several people, including spouses who are elderly or incapacitated by mental infirmity, will not be in a position to vary their trust arrangements or wills over the transitional period, and their estates will therefore suffer inheritance tax unnecessarily. I urge the Paymaster General to address that point specifically.

Rob Marris: As I understand it, new clause 2 suggests that everything be put on hold for two years. We may all be in some difficulty here, Sir Michael, because although this is not technically a stand part debate, the nature of the amendments means that in a sense it is. Will my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General say succinctly what the position was before 22 March and what it will be if her proposals are accepted by the Committee? For my part, and I suspect that of other right hon. and hon. Members, there is some confusion as to what the law was before 22 March and what it will be if the Government's proposals go through unamended.

Dawn Primarolo: Mr. Lord—

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Sir Michael.

Dawn Primarolo: I beg your pardon, Sir Michael, and thank the hon. Gentleman very much. Would he like to come and sit on this side of the Committee?

The hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) accused me of misleading the Committee, as the record will show. He may disagree with me—I certainly disagree with him—but I would not be as direct as to suggest that he may be motivated by personal interest in this Chamber, nor do I expect him to accuse me of misleading the Committee when I have not. I hope that he will withdraw that remark. I appreciate that he holds views that are deeply opposed to mine, but I have presented information to the Committee and I shall continue to do that. To suggest that a Minister or any hon. Member actively seeks to mislead is utterly wrong. I hope that he will now withdraw that suggestion.

Mr. Dunne: I am delighted to clarify my remarks to the Paymaster General. I intended not to suggest that she had actively and deliberately misled the Committee but to point out that she had inadvertently misled the Committee because she had not understood the Bill's full implications.

Dawn Primarolo: That is probably as close as I shall get to receiving an apology but, when the hon. Gentleman reads Hansard, he will see exactly what he said.

I shall begin with some of the other points that the hon. Gentleman raised. He asked why no consultation had taken place and said that there was nothing wrong with the sort of trust that we are considering. I shall revert in a moment to the general point about trusts that the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) made. Let me refer to a couple of quotes. On 12 April, the Daily Mail, that well-known Labour paper, reported:

"A trust allows you to pass money to your heirs while protecting it from tax and keeping control over how the money is used . . . Why set up one? First and foremost, to ensure your heirs receive the maximum amount of money free from inheritance tax."

If that is not sufficient, let us consider The Sunday Telegraph of 16 April.

Mrs. Villiers: Does the Paymaster General prefer the view of the Daily Mail or that of the Law Society, the Chartered Institute of Taxation, the Society of Trust and Estate Practitioners, the Low Incomes Tax Reform Group, the Law Society of Scotland, the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, the Association of Chartered Certified Accountants and the Association of Private Client Investment Managers and Stockbrokers, which say that the trusts under attack from the proposals have nothing to do with tax and everything to do with providing responsibly for one's family?

Dawn Primarolo: I find it best to answer one question at a time, and I shall come to those organisations and the hon. Lady's opening remarks shortly. To suggest that the way in which the Government prevent the trusts from being misused somehow damages women's rights is breathtaking, and I shall deal with that shortly.

The hon. Member for Ludlow need only read The Sunday Telegraph of 16 April or The Sunday Times of 23 April, which make it clear that those trusts were being used to avoid inheritance tax by retaining control. The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) mentioned transfer to the spouse. What could be more damaging to a spouse than to be told that a trust had been created that transferred the interest to her, only for her to find that she had no access to the capital and that, in three months, her interest was terminated and had passed on to somebody else, when she had been used as the shield to establish the trust, with the very purpose of avoiding inheritance tax? Even to suggest that using spouse relief in that way strikes a blow for women's independence is rather odd.

Julia Goldsworthy: I would be interested to know what evidence the Treasury had gathered of inheritance tax avoidance through the trust schemes. It is interesting to know the advice of the Daily Mail and The Daily Telegraph, but what is the evidence?

Dawn Primarolo: Of course, I shall come to that. I took part in a debate with one of the hon. Lady's colleagues earlier today and I find the Liberal Democrat position inconsistent and daft. This morning, her colleague argued that the Liberal Democrats want to narrow income inequality, yet this afternoon, she argues that she is happy for it to be perpetuated for the few who hang on to their money through the sort of wills that we are considering.

The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford rightly asked whether the Government were against trusts. He made an important point, and I would like to take this opportunity to clarify the situation. Of course the Government have not suddenly taken against trusts. He knows full well that we are talking about two particular types of trust. We believe that trusts have an important role to play in helping people to manage their affairs—of course they do—but we also believe that a person's choice whether to use a trust structure should not be tax-driven. That should not come as a huge surprise to the hon. Gentleman in the light of the changes that this Government have already made to trusts in previous Finance Bills.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman would agree that it is unfair that some people exploit the trust rules in order to avoid inheritance tax. The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) made a similar point earlier. The Government are not labelling respectable people as tax avoiders. We are saying that a system has emerged in which two types of trust—accumulation and maintenance trusts, and interest in possession trusts—can, in certain circumstances, be configured to provide an unfair tax advantage at the expense of other taxpayers. That is what we are seeking to put right.

Several hon. Members rose—

Dawn Primarolo: I shall just make this point, then I will give way.

The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet said earlier—I am paraphrasing slightly—that if there was nothing in the Bill that affected spouse exemption, the Conservatives would be happy. I would like to say that there is nothing in the Bill that affects spouse exemptions under the normal inheritance tax rules. We will come to the question of children and civil partners—all are protected. I have a feeling, however, that I shall not be allowed to stop there, so I will go into the detail of the relevant clause in order to address the points that hon. Members have raised. First, however, I shall give way to the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford, then to the right hon. Member for Wokingham.

Mr. Quentin Davies: I am grateful to the right hon. Lady for giving way, and for addressing the points that we have raised this afternoon. She says that the Government have no agenda against trusts, and that she accepts that trust law can help people and families to organise their affairs in a rational way. She went on to say that she was worried only about tax avoidance and tax evasion. But what is the tax point involved in saying that the beneficiaries of maintenance trusts—I gave an example earlier—must have full disposal of their assets at the age of 18? Surely she can see the danger of a young person being given money in that way, and that it could be undesirable for individuals and families to have to act in that way. What is the tax point involved?

Dawn Primarolo: I answered that question on Second Reading. The point is that 18 is the age of majority. People can get married or serve their country at that age; they can do all the things that adults can do. People might want to write trusts in which the beneficiaries do not get control of the assets until they are 25, 35, 45 or even 52—that seems a good age today—but this is not about when the individuals get control of the assets, it is about when they come into tax. That is the point that is being made. The hon. Gentleman also knows that, with certain trusts, the beneficiary never materialises. The trusts go on in perpetuity. This relates to situations in which a spouse has the use of a property, for example, and on their death, the property transfers to the children of the first marriage. We need to discuss that matter further. We are not talking about when trusts end but when they never end, control remains and the beneficiary does not have access. That is the problem with which we are trying to deal.

Mr. Redwood: What does the Paymaster General think would be the revenue cost over a five-year period were the Committee to pass the Opposition amendment as opposed to her proposal? I want to get a feel for how big the problem is over a five-year period, as such things take time to work through.

5.30 pm

Dawn Primarolo: The Opposition new clauses would completely negate the Government's legislation, so everything scored in the Red Book would be lost. The right hon. Member for Wokingham understands—I was going to say "needs to appreciate", but that would be totally unfair, as I know that he does—that tax law is about making sure that a situation holds now and does not continue, as well as making sure that no other person is encouraged, and that large numbers of people are not encouraged, to use tax avoidance in that way. Surely, if inheritance tax is raised under certain circumstances with those exemptions—whether a gift and the seven-year rule or the spouse exemption on transfer—the Committee should expect the regime to operate in such a way. There is always a consequence, and if a tax regime is used in a way that it should not be and left unchallenged, the problem will get greater and greater—a point that hon. Members often make to me, saying, "Why are you acting now? Why didn't you act last year? How do you work the balance?" That is the clear answer to the right hon. Gentleman's point.

The right hon. Gentleman also spoke about retrospection, but I completely reject the idea that there is any retrospection. The Government have provided for a two-year transition. If the provision is not enforced until 2008, how can there be retrospection? Everyone will have the opportunity to make the necessary changes.

The hon. Member for Chipping Barnet then adopted the "Let's make it up, because it must be true if we say it," approach. She said that pension and death-in-service payments will be caught by the Bill. That is absolutely not the case. Let us have some rational debate, and hear what the Opposition say about why their new clauses are better. When we discuss that in Standing Committee—the Opposition chose to discuss it in Committee and not on the Floor of the House—we can go through all those issues. It is utterly ridiculous, however, to table a new clause and then say, "Because I say so, it must be true."

Mrs. Villiers: The point about retrospectivity is that many trusts cannot be varied. One would have to go to court and spend a large amount of money on it, and even if a court hearing were to take place, not all courts will allow the trust to be varied. Therefore, the provisions are retrospective, because not everyone will be able to adapt the existing arrangements to comply with the new rules.

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Lady does not know what she is talking about. Legally qualified Conservative Members pointed out on Second Reading that the legal advice is always to review one's will regularly—at least every two years. If I decide that I want to vary my will, I do not have to go to the High Court to do it; I vary my will. The regulations in place for a variation of a will after death or in the circumstances of incapacity—as raised on Second Reading—are clear. Opposition Members are trying to isolate the measure completely from the interaction of all the inheritance tax and trust rules, and they are simply wrong.

Mr. Newmark rose—

John Bercow rose—

Dawn Primarolo: I will give way first to the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) and then to the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow), and then I would appreciate it if I could make some progress on the new clause.

Mr. Newmark: My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) was spot on in referring to the retrospective nature of the Bill. Retrospectivity in this context means that individuals will have to change trusts that are already in place. Non-retrospective legislation would say "From this point on"—or, in the case of this Bill, in two years' time—"these will be the rules." The Bill is retrospective because it will force people to change existing wills and existing trusts.

Dawn Primarolo: I know that the hon. Gentleman is new to the House, but pretending that the world began only when he entered it is utterly ridiculous. Did the Conservative Government agree that when they reduced mortgage interest relief at source—MIRAS—they were doing something retrospective? No, they did not. When they reduced the married couples allowance, were they taking retrospective action because of the expectation that existed? Of course they were not. When they reduced advance corporation tax relief, was that a retrospective measure because all the companies said that they had expected to receive it in perpetuity? Of course it was not. That is such a ridiculous point that I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman wanted to make it.

John Bercow: I am a bit suspicious. I have a high regard for the Paymaster General, but she treated a serious and thoughtful inquiry from my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) as an opportunity to launch into a stream of rather unnecessary invective. May I ask the Paymaster General a simple question? Is she seriously saying that it is ordinarily possible for someone to alter the terms of an existing trust as quickly, simply or inexpensively as that person could alter his or her will? That was the gravamen of the question that my hon. Friend asked, and it deserved a more serious response.

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman and I have known each other for quite a long time. He knows very well that I have not even started on the invective yet.

The point is that the wills set up the trusts, either in the lifetime of an individual or on death. The will is the trigger, and those who want to change their wills can do so. The trusts make it possible to plan for a tax that has not yet been triggered, to retain control of assets whose control will be determined after death. They control the assets beyond death to determine who will get them and who will not. I do not think it unreasonable for us to say that if a trust specifies a certain beneficiary after a certain event, that beneficiary should receive the product.

[Dawn Primarolo]

Rob Marris: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I will, but it will be the last time.

Rob Marris: I am grateful to the Paymaster General for her generosity.

I am becoming a little confused by some of the comments made by Opposition Members. Perhaps I have misunderstood the Government's proposals. I thought that the proposals did not affect trusts that had been set up, say, a year ago—trusts that already exist. If that is the case, the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) is wrong; if not, could the Paymaster General explain why?

Dawn Primarolo: People have two years in which to ensure that there is a proper end to a trust. In that sense, such trusts are affected; otherwise, it would be a bit like our saying, "Just because you have already successfully planned a tax avoidance, we will leave it in place."

It may help the Committee if I explain the purpose of the measure and what it does before dealing with the new clauses. As I have said, the purpose is to stop inheritance tax avoidance through the use of certain types of trust—not all trusts. Before the Budget, it became clear that some wealthy individuals were using trusts in that way. The avoidance worked in different ways, and was often highly technical, but the end result was the same: substantial assets passed from generation to generation with no inheritance tax ever being paid.

I have made it clear that the Government consider it unfair that a small number of wealthy people should be able to exploit trusts in that way by combining rules. The new rules prevent such unfair avoidance, while protecting straightforward and sensible arrangements made by honourable people.

This measure brings accumulation and maintenance trusts and interest in possession trusts into the mainstream tax rules for discretionary trusts. It does not, therefore, create a new regime; it merely brings such trusts into the regime that applies to all the others. The money put into a trust during a person's lifetime—

Mrs. Villiers: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Dawn Primarolo: If I can explain what the provision does, it might help in dealing with the misunderstandings. In respect of money put in trust during a person's lifetime, charges apply on assets over the IHT threshold—currently £285,000—at 20 per cent. on entry. So assets over the value of the threshold get charged at 20 per cent. on entry, and at 6 per cent. every 10 years after that. The only exemption for trusts created during life is that applying to trusts for disabled people, an issue to which we will return.

Where money is put into trust on a person's death, the IHT is due on the estate, as is normal, unless spouse relief or some other exemption applies. If a trust is then set up, it is exempt from charges if it is for a disabled person; if it is an accumulation and maintenance trust set up by a partner for their bereaved child, who will take the assets outright at the age of 18; or if it is an interest in possession trust for the benefit of one person with outright ownership of the assets, passing to another person when the trust ends. That is a very straightforward arrangement and it is in line with existing trust arrangements.

Mr. Gauke: Will the Paymaster General give way?

Dawn Primarolo: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to make at least some headway on the reasons why the new clauses and amendments, including his own, are unacceptable. Having done so, I will of course give way to him.

All the new clauses and amendments before us are unnecessary, because what is asserted will happen will not, in fact. Ever since Budget day, when the Government announced that we planned to change the IHT rules for trusts, there has been enormous misunderstanding, which has continued today. Bearing that in mind, let me remind the Committee what spouse relief is about and what impact our proposals in clause 157 and schedule 20 will have on such relief.

Spouse relief is an inheritance tax exemption on transfers from one spouse to another. So if property starts in the ownership of one spouse and ends up in the ownership—I stress, ownership—of the other, the situation is straightforward: the transfer is exempt from IHT. That means that the bequest rules apply if a gift from one spouse to another is made when both spouses are still living, so let us be clear: our proposals in clause 157 and schedule 20 have no relevance at all to such cases. For the vast majority of people with straightforward affairs, all that they need to know about the IHT proposals is that spouse relief exists and that a transfer can be made to their spouse. The potential overlap between spouse relief and our proposals only arises, therefore, in cases where partners want to use trusts on or after Budget day to make a less than straightforward gift or bequest.

Mr. Gauke: Will the Paymaster General give way on that point?

Dawn Primarolo: No; please let me make some progress on these points.

Transferring assets into trusts is very different from making an outright gift; some people have tried to argue that they amount to the same thing, but they do not. The recipient of an outright gift can do with it as they please, with or without the consent of the person who made the gift—they are the absolute owner. However, if a person places money in a trust, it must be used by the trustees in accordance with that person's wishes. It is the fact that control can continue long after the settlor's death that makes the difference.

5.45 pm

Inheritance tax rules for interest in possession trusts have conferred the same exemptions that would apply if putting assets into trusts were identical to making an outright gift. The result has been that interest in possession trusts can be—and regularly is—used as a highly flexible money box and a long-term shelter from inheritance tax liabilities. That usually requires the settlor to get rid of assets in his lifetime but, where the spouse relief is available, it is possible for the settlor to hold on to his assets until death and completely wipe out any inheritance tax liability, in both the present and the future—all without giving the surviving spouse or civil partner any influence whatsoever over the assets in their name.

Of course, some cases are not avoidance-driven, and a number of exemptions provide appropriate protection for the people involved. First, spouse relief will continue where an interest in possession trust is set up in a person's will to give a life interest to a bereaved spouse or civil partner provided that, when such interest ends, the assets are taken outright by someone else. No further flexible power is necessary in the trust, because it has delivered its objective.

Mr. Gauke: Will the Paymaster General give way on that point?

Dawn Primarolo: I want to make three points. Opposition Members continually claim that various eventualities will not be covered or that different outcomes will arise. When I tell them that they are wrong, they want to ask other questions. Let us deal first with what is on the table.

Secondly, spouse relief will continue if a person dies without a will and their assets are passed to a bereaved spouse or civil partner, whether or not a trust is created under the intestacy rules. Thirdly, the rules will continue to provide for post-death changes where people die with an out-of-date will. If that will provides for a trust that would not qualify for spouse relief under our new rules, the interested parties will have the opportunity that they have always had to put things right. That is another answer to the question about retrospection.

Mr. Gauke: I have two questions. First, will not the possibility of variation allow people to get around the tax avoidance that the Paymaster General mentioned earlier, and so make these provisions ineffective? Secondly, the right hon. Lady described the conditions under which an immediate post-death interest will apply and inheritance tax is not payable. Does she accept that, in the vast majority of cases, trusts contained in wills will not meet those conditions?

Dawn Primarolo: I accept that people who transfer assets under the spouse exemption provisions do not need a trust to safeguard that exemption. I also accept that the gift provisions do not require a trust to be imposed between donor and recipient, and that assets should be transferred to a recipient when that is the donor's clear intention. Assets should not be held in a halfway house that means that the recipient does not get control and that the state does not get the inheritance tax to which it is entitled. Ending that possibility is precisely what the proposed changes are designed to achieve.

The new clause and the other amendments would once again make it possible for the wealthy few to use inheritance tax exemptions and rules to get reliefs beyond their entitlement. By the targeted use of changes to the particular types of trust being used in such cases, the Government propose to preserve the rules and make sure that they are used as they were always intended. For that reason, if the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet and her hon. Friends push the new clause to a vote, I shall ask my hon. Friends to oppose it and I look forward to debating the provision in detail in the Standing Committee.

Mrs. Villiers: I shall review briefly some of the comments that have been made. We began with the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) who expressed with passion his support for inheritance tax and his criticism of the exemptions.

We then heard from the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) who drew on a theme mentioned by many Opposition Members. She pointed out that the proposed changes could affect as many as a million wills and referred to the 4.5 million people who would probably have to review their life assurance policies. She also mentioned the problems in relation to people who have died since the Budget.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) referred to the fact that many people of modest means will be affected by the proposed changes. He pointed out that they are retrospective. I agree with him wholeheartedly, especially because it may not be possible to vary existing trusts. They are affected by the provisions and the courts may refuse variations. It may also be difficult to vary wills, especially when the person who made the will has lost capacity. There will be retrospective effects.

My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) said that the current rules generally deem trusts to be tax-neutral, so they are treated similarly to outright gifts. He pointed out that the Government's proposals would impose penalties on trusts that do not apply to outright gifts. He referred to the long history of the spouse exemption and to the practical difficulties of meeting the six exacting conditions of the draft proposals. Most tellingly, he drew attention to the suspicion that prejudice must be motivating the Government's approach to trusts and argued for a more targeted solution, rather than taking a sledgehammer to crack a nut.

My hon. Friend the Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) said that it was important to improve the rationality of the proposals. He, too, pointed out that the Bill seems to attack trusts for no good reason. My hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) noted that the provisions would hit the vulnerable. He sought clarity and emphasised the importance of retaining the spousal exemption to prevent double taxation of the single estate of a husband and wife.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie) talked about the impact of the proposals in Scotland, where thousands of people could be affected. He made the good point that the Government have not held proper consultations. My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) emphasised the point about retrospectivity and said that the proposed changes would affect a wide range of people, giving instances of their impact on divorce.

The proposals on spousal exemption will have a significant impact on a wide range of ordinary, hard-working people. If the Paymaster General is not prepared to take our word for that, she should take the word of the professional organisations to which I referred earlier. They say:

"The Government's proposed changes to inheritance tax on trusts amount to a tax on prudent families. They will affect millions of ordinary families and not, as the Government has suggested, only the super-rich."

Unless the proposals are amended, in line with our new clause and the many more amendments that we shall table in the Standing Committee, they could leave a million people having to redraft their wills, facing a legal bill of about £275 million. The measure will hit the vulnerable, the young and the bereaved, so I intend to press the new clause to a Division.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Clause 61

COMPUTER EQUIPMENT

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Dawn Primarolo: Prior to 6 April 2006, employers who made computer equipment available for private use by their employees could do so tax-free, providing that the annual amount of the benefit in kind was £500 or less—that is the equivalent of £2,500 of computer equipment, inclusive of VAT. The clause removes that tax exemption. With effect from 6 April 2006, a tax charge will arise on the benefit in kind that arises in those circumstances. However, the clause does not change the position when an employer provides the use of computer equipment solely for work purposes and private use by the employee is not significant.

[Dawn Primarolo]

The question that everybody has been asking is: why are the Government doing this? It is perfectly true that many employees have benefited from the tax exemption, but the home computer initiative has been used extensively by groups that we would not generally expect to have difficulty accessing information technology. For example, 25 per cent. of those participating in the home computer initiative are higher rate taxpayers—more than twice the proportion among taxpayers as a whole. Furthermore, nearly one third of HCI participants are from white-collar industries—often defined as industries with a greater proportion of higher-than-average earners.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): What the Paymaster General is saying is news to the industry, which was not consulted about the problems that the Treasury suddenly discovered at the eleventh hour, just as the ink was drying on the Budget. On the specific point that she just raised, would she say the same thing to the 15,000 nurses who have benefited from the HCI scheme or the 21,000 Tesco employees, who are probably not at the top end of the earning schedule? The evidence was that that level of employee was benefiting more and more from the scheme.

Dawn Primarolo: The information comes from the industry. The hon. Gentleman interrupted me rather early on in my remarks. I was certainly not saying that nobody had benefited from the HCI scheme. The case that the Government are putting is that the benefits have slowed down to a point at which the growth is very small. In particular, it is not targeted on the remaining groups that we need to assist—those on low pay. I was just about to turn to that point.

Last month, the Low Pay Commission published the findings of its review of benefits in kind, salary sacrifice schemes and the accommodation offset. It found that take-up rates were often quite low and many part-time low-paid workers would gain no advantage from salary sacrifice schemes for home computers and other benefits in kind. Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs has evidence that, unfortunately, the tax exemption was being used beyond the scope of its original intention.

On the one hand, the initiative has reached a number of people and has increased usage. On the other hand, it is not targeted particularly at the low paid and its effectiveness has been slowing down, and, in addition, it is being used beyond its original intention. For example, the HCI packages included items such as game consoles and MP3 players and allowed employees to buy equipment out of their gross pay, rather than borrow it. Furthermore, the cost of computer equipment has fallen markedly since 1999 when—

Peter Luff: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman will let me make some progress. I, too, have read the brief from the industry that he has and that has been circulated. If he listens to all my remarks and then contributes to the debate, I will be happy to return to any outstanding matters.

6.15 pm

The cost of computer equipment has fallen markedly since 1999 when the exemption was introduced. Figures produced by the Office for National Statistics show that an equivalent computer that cost £2,500 in 1999 would have cost under £700 in 2005. The Government have therefore concluded that the time has come to remove the exemption and to focus Government support in a better way to improve access to technology for groups with the poorest existing access, such as the unemployed, the elderly and the low paid.

Peter Luff: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I will, but this is the last time that I will give way to the hon. Gentleman. I will then try to make my case and then he can contribute to the debate. If there are any outstanding issues at that stage, I will reply to them.

Peter Luff: This is a debate in which it would be good to have answers to questions. I asked the right hon. Lady's Department questions a month ago, but I have not had answers, so I have to ask those questions now, in this format—otherwise I might have been able to accelerate her speech. Will she please do the Committee the courtesy of producing the evidence that she has about the so-called abuse of the scheme? It does not exist. The industry specifically asked for MP3 players not to be included in the scope of the scheme, but the Treasury insisted that they should be. The industry would be happy to see them excluded. The other equipment to which she referred was not being offered under the terms of the scheme; it was being offered as part of marketing brochures alongside it. The full price was paid. If she has that evidence, please will she produce it? It is important that we see it.

Dawn Primarolo: I am happy to produce that evidence. Indeed, I am happy to produce it to the hon. Gentleman for the company in his constituency for which he has been making the case. The evidence comes from its marketing websites. I think that he will be somewhat shocked when he sees the extent to which packages were being put together involving items that were not supposed to be included in the HCI. That is in addition to the difficulty with take-up. I cannot say that I will put the information in the post to him tonight, but I will certainly do so tomorrow morning and he can look at the evidence. Alternatively, I can give him the website addresses and he can look at them himself—he does not have to take my word for it.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): The evidence of one or two websites is not enough to damn a whole scheme. If the Government have such compelling evidence of abuse, will the Paymaster General explain why so little hard evidence was produced in the regulatory impact assessment that they rushed out last week?

Dawn Primarolo: The Opposition change their argument as they lose each point. The issue with regard to abuse of the scheme—as well as its lack of targeting, the importance of better focusing it, and the problems of not consulting where there are abuses in the scheme because of forestalling—are well known by all Members. If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue to make my case, he will be able to make his and further points can be made.

Following the publication of the digital strategy in April 2005, the Government have continued to acquire an evidence base to enable them to consider focusing their support. In November 2005, the Government published their "Inclusion through Innovation" report. It examined where information and communication technology might deliver the most benefit to excluded groups and considered how that might be achieved. The report found that barriers to using ICT included a lack of relevant content, poor awareness of where to access ICT and a lack of preliminary skills, such as literacy or English language skills. The report also noted that digital inclusion does not mean simply "connecting everyone to the internet".

Community ICT access and intermediaries all form part of a multi-channelled approach that will deliver for the targeted groups. The Government are making the case that it is necessary to use those resources to target the groups in greatest need and in which take-up is lowest.

To ensure the best use of ICT in tackling this type of social exclusion, I am announcing today that the Government are setting up a dedicated digital inclusion team—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] The industry does not mind being represented on the team, so it does not think that the team is to be ridiculed. The team will champion examples of excellence in using highly effective and efficient ICT to tackle the key drivers of exclusion. It will also promote local and national leadership and understanding of the considerable potential of ICT to make a significant improvement to the life chances of excluded people and areas.

Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Dawn Primarolo: No, I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman. Perhaps he will let me make some progress.

Furthermore, I can today announce that we are changing the aims and objectives of the digital strategy to focus on digital inclusion, which reflects the shift in the Government's focus towards a more targeted approach. The strategy is a genuinely cross-government programme that recognises that only concerted action across Government Departments will realise our objectives. As I have said, access to ICT is about more than access to computers. Other technologies, such as digital television, give disadvantaged groups the opportunity to engage with ICT. The UK has a world-leading position in digital television, with more than 70 per cent. of households now accessing that technology.

The Treasury will work collaboratively with industry as we look towards meeting the goals of the digital strategy. We will keep the focus on targeted interventions to help those with specific difficulties. We will build on the success of more than 6,000 UK online centres, more than half of which are located in the 2,000 most deprived wards in England, so that 95 per cent. of the population live within 5 km of such a centre. Because we want to ensure that future generations gain access to technology, the Government are giving £50 million over the next two years for schools to invest in home access to ICT for their students and a further £10 million to provide internet connectivity to the home access network. The announcements make substantial inroads into achieving our objectives, but we will conduct a review in 2008 to explore whether further action is necessary to close any residual digital divide.

I have written to representatives from industry to invite suggestions on the most effective way to focus our support on targeted groups. The Department of Trade and Industry will review the options put forward over the next few months and consider how the Government's objectives can be met.

I would like to provide the reassurance for which I know that some have already asked—the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) has done so—on computer equipment provided for business purposes. Clause 61 does not change the position for computer equipment provided solely for work purposes when any private use by the employee is not significant. We acknowledge employers' concerns in this area and I know that HMRC has been approached by representative groups to work through the issues. I have asked HMRC to work with those representative bodies to ensure that clear practical guidance is produced to help to keep employers' compliance costs to a minimum.

The Government's policies of liberalisation and competition have led to the strong take-up and use of ICT. The creation of new and innovative services and falling prices have all contributed to that. The HCI has played its part in the strong take-up, but it is not appropriate for the Government to keep the scheme going beyond its useful lifespan. The announcements that I have made today will ensure that all can benefit from technology in a cost-effective manner. I commend the clause to the Committee.

Mr. Francois: I want clause 61 to be deleted from the Bill for the chief purpose of saving the popular home computing initiative from abolition by the Government. As we are asking the Government to relent, even at the eleventh hour, I will begin by wishing the Paymaster General a happy birthday. I congratulate her on reaching the age of 29—on a seasonally adjusted basis.

The genesis of the home computing initiative was section 45 of the Finance Act 1999, which said that employers could provide computer equipment including

"printers, scanners, modems, discs and other peripheral devices designed to be used by being connected to or inserted in a computer", for the use of employees and their families at home without the employee incurring a benefit in kind for the purposes of income tax. The measure was designed to help to spread computer literacy among the population. In March 1999, the Chancellor himself proudly told the Daily Record:

"Britain can no longer afford to lag behind America. Inequality in computer learning today will mean inequality in earning power tomorrow".

Between 1999 and 2003, however, relatively few companies took advantage of the tax exemption, largely because it was not widely known or appreciated. In 2003, a working group was formed under the office of the e-envoy to examine how a specific scheme to loan computers to employees, including for private use, might be implemented. Partly as a result of that, the Income Tax (Earning and Pensions) Act 2003 included, in section 320, additional tax incentives specifically to encourage companies to loan computer equipment to their employees up to a maximum tax-free value of £500 a year. It is that section of the ITEPA 2003 that clause 61 would delete. That would have the consequence of effectively sounding the death knell of the scheme, which is why I am asking the Committee to reject the measure.

The home computing initiative, as we have come to understand it, was effectively launched in January 2004 by the Department of Trade and Industry, which, by that time, had taken on board departmental sponsorship of the project. The DTI published specific guidelines for employers and employees on the home computing initiative, thus effectively popularising the scheme. The DTI press release at the time, which contained supporting endorsements from Sir Digby Jones of the CBI and Brendan Barber of the TUC, promoted the scheme in the following terms:

"For employers HCI schemes are about maximising potential in the work place. Basic computer and technology skills are now regarded as essential for the majority of jobs. With home computer access IT confident employees have greater capacity to contribute to an organisation's overall performance and adapt more easily to new roles and opportunities. HCI schemes can also generate employer National Insurance savings."

In practice, the scheme has usually been financed by so-called salary sacrifice, in which employees accept a small decrease in pay in return for being loaned computer equipment by their employer. The employer in turn benefits by paying a reduced rate of national insurance contributions to the Treasury.

We believe that it is ultimately for financial reasons that the Treasury wishes to abandon the scheme. That was effectively confirmed by the Prime Minister last Wednesday when, in reply to a question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff), the Chairman of the Trade and Industry Committee, he said:

"we have to ensure that in any such initiative we obviously balance the revenue that is coming in with the support that is being given."—[Official Report, 26 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 570.]

The decision is thus ultimately financial, as I shall go on to emphasise.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): As far as I understand the case that the hon. Gentleman makes, he seems to agree with the objectives of the initiative. I am sure that he would agree that in such a fast-moving world, it is important to keep reassessing the effectiveness of initiatives. If the digital inclusion team that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General announced came up with a scheme that would better meet Labour Members' objectives, which I understand he shares, would he support that, or is the home computing initiative the only possible scheme that he can imagine supporting?

6.30 pm

Mr. Francois: I shall outline how we believe the scheme can be revised so that it should survive. I am not saying that there should be no modification of the current scheme. I shall outline, as I have said, how we believe that the scheme could be modified both to save money for the Treasury and to improve its operation. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be patient.

Peter Luff: Does my hon. Friend agree that there are two separate points, the first of which is how best to achieve the objectives that are shared across the House? It is difficult to disagree with a word about the objectives in what the Paymaster General said. Secondly, there is the issue of how we move from the one scheme to the other. Would it not have been much better if the Government had signalled now that they want to change the method, if they do—I do not think that they need to do so—and give the industry a year to adjust to a new method, rather than writing a P45 directly from the office of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the workers in the HCI industry?

Mr. Francois: I agree with my hon. Friend. We are looking to the Government this evening for some indication, when the Paymaster General replies, that they intend to retain the scheme, even in a modified form. We are not saying that there can be no change. However, we want an indication from the Minister that if the Government believe that there is abuse, they will modify the scheme to respond to that while maintaining its inherently positive characteristics. I shall press the Paymaster General on exactly that point in a moment.

The scheme has proved popular, with about 500,000 people taking advantage of it effectively to hire a computer from their employer to help to improve their IT skills as part of a modern knowledge-based economy. This is especially important when we are seeking to improve IT skills to allow the UK to continue to compete with economies such as China and India in the 21st century. According to a recent analysis carried out by Hewlett-Packard, China and India between them now produce more than 120,000 IT graduates each year. How are we to compete effectively with that if we are bringing in measures to reduce the spread of IT literacy among our population, which is what the proposed change threatens to do?

A Cabinet Office press release was timed to coincide with the launch of the new initiative in January 2004. It highlighted survey findings that employees with a PC at home had better IT skills and were more familiar with the internet. The DTI guidelines on HCI were entitled, "Maximising Potential in the Workplace". Along with advice on implementing the scheme, numerous references were made to skills. For example, in the CBI's booklet, Sir Digby Jones was quoted as follows:

"Of all the workforce skills required today, there's no question that basic IT literacy is one of the most important . . . Getting IT into the DNA of the workforce must therefore be a primary objective for every organisation that wants to adapt to the high-skills economy of the future."

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the spreading of IT skills of the type that he is describing in the workplace has been under way in a number of areas for quite some years? For example, there is the CLATES qualification, the ECDL and the driving licence system, and other methods have also had significant success with fewer costs and with less of the vulnerability that has been shown to be part of the present scheme that is now being reformed.

Mr. Francois: I accept, with the hon. Gentleman's background in accounting, that some other measures have helped in that regard. Nevertheless, the scheme that we are discussing has been particularly effective and particularly popular, and that is all the more reason not to scrap it. I shall outline the specific advantages as I continue, though I take the hon. Gentleman's point.

In 2005, the Minister of Communities and Local Government, the right hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Miliband), told his regional press the following about the scheme:

"As technology and IT-based business becomes an even bigger part of our regional economy, it is vital that the workforce develops the skills that will keep us competitive. That process should begin in the home so that everyone has the opportunity to become comfortable and competent with computers. That is why the Government is offering tax breaks which reduce the cost of computers to employees while saving money for their employers."

To coincide with the second anniversary of the scheme in 2006, Brendan Barber, the general secretary of the TUC, said:

"Experience has shown that when a business implements an HCI scheme, demand for learning services and training rises significantly."

In short, the HCI scheme has been hailed as an important part of the drive to improve the nation's IT skills, by the Government, in the form of the DTI, and the umbrella bodies of both British industry and the trade union movement combined.

The scheme has enabled almost half a million people to obtain a computer through HCI. Equipment is not only more affordable, but it usually comes with added peace of mind because of features such as warranty cover for the length of the hire agreement and technical support. So, for many who would not ordinarily have had a PC at home, whether because of lack of access to credit, affordability or simple technophobia, HCI has provided a low-risk, cut-price option which allows them to access the world of information technology, to the benefit of themselves, their families, their employer and, ultimately, the wider economy as a whole.

The Government have sought to argue that they are looking for a scheme that is of more benefit to retired people and jobseekers. However, scrapping a scheme that was already working for those in employment and was, indeed, primarily for the benefit of low-paid workers is not the answer.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I get confused these days about what the Conservative party is. Is the hon. Gentleman really saying that he is supporting trade unions, for example, and is supporting also the TU learning fund, which has brought learning, including IT skills, into many workplaces throughout Britain, to some of the lowest paid workers? Are we now getting a call from the Conservative Benches in support of the initiatives that have been introduced by the Government that have helped many workers in workplaces in my region, but which they opposed last year?

Mr. Francois: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the trade union movement, from the general secretary of the TUC downwards, are opposed to the abolition of the scheme, not least because at a local level many trade union officials have put a lot of work into persuading employers to adopt it. The hon. Gentleman must understand, irrespective of the learning fund, that the scheme is one that the trade union movement wants the Government to retain. I have a few quotes to drum that point home in case the hon. Gentleman did not get it the first time around.

Scrapping a scheme that was already working for those in employment will not solve the Government's problem in respect of others. According to the HCI Alliance, 60 per cent. of the scheme's participants are in blue-collar industries and 75 per cent. of them pay the standard rate of tax, or lower. Moreover, as Intel, the computer supplier, argued in a recent letter to me:

"As this scheme is run through the employer even the most financially excluded are able to join. The fact that blue collar workers in the future will be denied such an incentive is genuine cause for concern. This has the potential to create inequity within low paid, hard working families and workforces. 21,000 Tesco workers recently adopted this scheme, many would not have a computer today if this had not been offered to them."

Similarly, Brendan Barber—I hope that the hon. Gentleman is listening—general secretary of the TUC, who has also personally endorsed the scheme that we are trying to save, wrote to the Chancellor requesting a rethink and issued the following statement on 3 April, stressing the value of the scheme, in particular, to the low paid. He said:

"The Home Computing Initiative has helped thousands of low paid workers without confident IT skills buy their first ever computer. Unions up and down the country have been promoting the scheme, often linked to training schemes. The sudden closure of the scheme would mean that many hours of voluntary union effort would go to waste."

Any politician—Tory, Labour, Liberal Democrat or otherwise—will understand the clear intent that lies behind that statement.

Adam Afriyie rose—

Mr. Francois: On that basis, I will give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor (Adam Afriyie).

Adam Afriyie: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way after being so generous in giving way earlier, unlike the Paymaster General. It was clear that the right hon. Lady wanted to establish her case for the abolition of the HCI. The only case that I heard her make was against the Government—a case against abolishing the HCI and a case against the Bill. It seems to me that if there is a better way of approaching the provision of information technology to workers at home, surely that better approach should be described and implemented before the existing scheme is removed. It seems that we are in a bizarre situation when a scheme is being removed that has clearly been successful, but there is nothing to replace it.

Mr. Francois: I thank my hon. Friend for that contribution. The Paymaster General's case can best be described as citing a number of instances of abuse. She referred to a few websites and that was about the extent of it. In the course of my remarks, we can test exactly how much abuse there has been, and then the House can take a decision before we enter the Lobbies.

Let no one argue that the home computing initiative does not benefit people on modest incomes. The Trades Union Congress, companies such as Intel and others have clearly demonstrated that it does. As for the take-up of the scheme, it has taken off in the past year or so and has proved particularly popular in the national health service, with more than 100 trusts and hospitals across the country promoting the scheme to their work forces, including King's College hospital, the Norfolk, Suffolk and Cambridgeshire strategic health authority, the West Midlands ambulance service and even the Sedgefield primary care trust—I hope that that is not the reason why the Chancellor wants to get rid of it. A number of charities have adopted the scheme, including St. John Ambulance, the Institute of Cancer Research, the Royal London Society for the Blind and the Motivation charitable trust, which works with people with a mobility disability and is based in Bristol, not far from the constituency of the Paymaster General.

The scheme has been adopted by a number of private sector organisations, including the British Chambers of Commerce, the Great North Eastern Railway and Yorkshire Water. In total, according to the HCI Alliance, more than 1,000 public and private sector organisations have adopted the HCI scheme to date, often with local trade union support, to help to improve their employees' IT skills. All of that will be put at risk if we do not delete clause 61.

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman has listed all those fantastically important schemes, but can he explain why the proportion of households owning a computer has risen by only four percentage points since 2004?

Mr. Francois: I have already explained to the Paymaster General that the scheme was on the brink of taking off. Sweden has the highest personal computer penetration in the world, and one reason is that it has been running a successful scheme for a number of years.

Dawn Primarolo: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Francois: As a courtesy to the Paymaster General, I shall do so.

Dawn Primarolo: I am grateful, because I do not want the hon. Gentleman to dig himself into a hole. He said that the scheme was just taking off, but from 1999 to 2003 the increase was 29 percentage points.

Mr. Francois: If the Paymaster General had done me the courtesy of listening, she would know that I explained that between 1999 and 2003 the scheme was relatively unpopular, so the Department of Trade and Industry effectively rebooted and relaunched it in 2004, with clearer and better publicised guidelines. The scheme has now begun to take off, and 500,000 users around the country are dependent on the scheme. It is rather worrying that the Paymaster General—a Treasury Minister—will not listen to basic statistics.

Peter Luff: What I have heard from the Paymaster General confirms my worst suspicions. She does not have the slightest idea of what is happening on the ground, as Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs have seriously misled her about the true facts. When the scheme was rebooted, as my hon. Friend said, in January 2004, it took several months for the industry to gear up, but the advantages are only being experienced now. That is why the costs of the scheme are projected to increase every year in the Red Book.

Dawn Primarolo: Four per cent.

Peter Luff: It is no good the hon. Lady saying that, as the scheme was on the verge of success at the precise moment at which the Government scrapped it.

Mr. Francois: As I shall argue, the ultimate reason for the scrapping of the scheme by the Government is its cost. My hon. Friend has hit the nail on the head and the Paymaster General should explain why, if the scheme is not popular, the Treasury's own projections in the Red Book and the regulatory impact assessment to 2011 forecast an increase in costs? If take-up is not good, why does the Treasury expect it to cost more? The Paymaster General must dig herself out of that hole.

Dawn Primarolo: I said that there was misuse.

Mr. Francois: I shall come on to that, and I shall prove that it is not taking place on a scale that would justify the abolition of the scheme.

6.45 pm

The initial decision to scrap the home computing initiative, once it was discovered hidden in the Budget of 22 March, was greeted with incredulity, not least by the HCI Alliance, which only a few days before had discussed with the Treasury ways in which it could be updated. Moreover, it is evident that the Brownite Treasury hardly bothered to tell the Blairite DTI—the scheme's sponsoring Department. Even on Budget day, the DTI promoted the scheme on its website:

> "The real beauty of HCI schemes is that they have the potential to improve performance in almost every area of the organisation. As well as traditional drivers—reducing costs, increasing profitability— they can also contribute to more recent imperatives such as corporate responsibility, individual learning and workplace development."

Even more embarrassingly for the Government, the DTI was in the process of rolling out an HCI scheme for its own staff, as was the Department for Work and Pensions, which has far more staff than the DTI. In addition, the CBI, which actively advocated the scheme for two years at the Government's behest, reacted to the change with consternation. On 30 March, Sir Digby Jones commented:

> "This flies in the face of everything the country is trying to achieve on skills. Seventy-five per cent. of people affected by this change are lower paid taxpayers. They will want to know why the Government has deprived them, and their families, of this opportunity . . . computer literacy has to be a given in a globally competitive economy."

In addition, as we have heard, Brendan Barber of the TUC wrote directly to the Chancellor requesting an urgent rethink, as indeed did my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne).

Stewart Hosie: The hon. Gentleman mentioned flexibility and competitiveness. In the Budget, the Chancellor said that "of 3.4 million unskilled jobs today, we will need only 600,000 by 2020."—[Official Report, 22 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 292.]

Does he agree that the scrapping of the scheme, which created flexibility and competitiveness by giving people skills, would be disastrous if we wish to create skilled labour to replace unskilled labour?

Mr. Francois: I agree. The Chancellor said little about the initiative in his Budget speech but, equally, he said little about the national health service. However, he evidently tried to hide what was being done. Our role in the House is to try to expose that, and then try to persuade the Government to change their mind.

There was adverse reaction from employers who have promoted the scheme to their employees, as the Government encouraged them to do. Andrew Unsworth, the head of e-Government at the city of Edinburgh council, which is Labour-run—at least until Thursday—sent the following e-mail this morning. [Interruption.] That would be lucky for the Labour party. Mr. Unsworth said:

"City of Edinburgh Council has run two very popular schemes for our monthly staff since March 2005. Take-up rates were over 2000 employees, nearly 16 per cent. of those eligible.

We were preparing to launch another scheme making computers available to our weekly and fortnightly paid staff who are predominantly on lower rates of pay. These pay groups may not otherwise be in a financial position to afford computer equipment. We viewed this as an excellent way for employees to benefit from a computer and its educational properties for both them and their families."

He continued:

"This scheme provided an excellent platform to improve literacy, communication skills and overall education for employees and their families. City of Edinburgh is currently introducing more computers to schools and several staff had indicated that they were participating in this scheme for the benefit of their children.

City of Edinburgh Council have followed the HCI guidelines very closely and only included computer packages in their scheme. I would hope that the government would consider reversing its decision in this matter even if it means tightening the guideline to prevent the alleged abuse of the scheme."

Similarly, Mike Clayton, finance director of Essex fire authority, wrote to me on the 24 March:

"Take up for the scheme was excellent with over 1 in 5 employees joining. The level of take up was particularly high for firefighters where over 1 in 4 chose one of the computer packages available."

Mr. Clayton amplified his point:

"15,000 nurses took up the scheme last year. Many low paid nurses, fire officers and other key workers have access to IT for the first time because of HCI. Given the importance of computers in the lives of nearly all citizens, I hope that this proposal can be withdrawn and the take up of computers extended."

Mr. Kevan Jones: The hon. Gentleman has concentrated on the low-paid gaining access to computers, but is it not the case that higher-rate taxpayers accounted for 25 per cent. of the take-up of the scheme, even though they account for 10 per cent. of taxpayers? His arguments would be more credible if the scheme ensured that the money went to the low-paid, as people who pay a higher rate of tax can afford computers without Government assistance.

Mr. Francois: We have already established—and everyone accepts— that 75 per cent. of people who benefited from the scheme were on the standard rate of income tax or lower. The hon. Gentleman wishes to raise the issue of higher rate taxpayers and may wish to know that the general secretary of the TUC made a similar suggestion. I would be interested to hear the Government's answer to that proposal and to find out whether they would be prepared to retain the scheme on that basis—

Mr. Jones rose—

Stephen Hesford (Wirral, West) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Francois: I have given way several times to the hon. Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) and I want to make some progress. I may give way later to the hon. Member for Wirral, West (Stephen Hesford), particularly given that we greatly enjoyed his intervention on my Second Reading speech last week.

I move on now to deal with the reaction of the IT industry, including the companies that had been created to fulfil the home computer initiative objectives by facilitating the supply of computing equipment to both public and private sector enterprises, many of which will go out of business if the provision goes through. The Government's regulatory impact assessment, which was rushed out just last week in response to the furore over this issue, admits that, exceptionally, no small firms impact test has been carried out in this instance, although that would usually be the procedure. It also notes in paragraph 62, in classic Whitehall jargon:

"HMRC does expect there to be an impact for HCI providers. Particularly those in the small business sector that have been set up specifically to provide HCI schemes . . . will be impacted more significantly in the short term than businesses with more diversified business models".

The IT industry body, Intellect, put it more succinctly after the Budget:

"There are about 2,000 individuals working in this industry that Gordon Brown has just signed redundancy notices for".

Before Ministers seek to accuse anyone of crying wolf in this matter, I have to inform the House that the programme of redundancies in the companies established to support the HCI initiative has, unfortunately, already begun. Last month, Red PC became the first company to fall victim to the abolition of the HCI when it was reported that it was about to call in the liquidators. On 24 April, another company, Encompass, announced that it was closing down. As the managing director subsequently told the press:

"As a small company solely involved in providing HCI, I was completely knocked back by the Chancellor's decision. The government's Digital Strategy sets targets for 2008 so I thought the HCI scheme would run until then, and at the very least we would have 12 months notice. To be given 15 days is appalling."

At a time when unemployment is unfortunately on the rise again, it will be a great shame to see further high-tech companies going into liquidation if clause 61 remains in the Bill.

[Mr. Francois]

Most importantly millions of people across the country who might have been able to take advantage of the scheme to improve their and their families' IT skills are now to be denied that opportunity. The Chancellor will now disappoint them if the scheme is withdrawn. Moreover, even those on the existing scheme will be allowed to benefit from it only until whatever agreements they have reached with their employers have expired. That is confirmed by paragraph 71 of the regulatory impact assessment:

"Changes to the exemptions for computers and mobile phones were announced in the Chancellor's Budget statement on 22 March 2006 and will take effect from 6 April 2006. However those people already participating in schemes based on the law as it applied prior to 6 April will not be affected until the period of their current agreement expires and they enter into a new agreement."

In other words, at that point they will be caught by the changes. Even the 500,000 people who are benefiting now will not do so for much longer, once their individual agreements with their employers expire.

Stephen Hesford rose—

Adam Afriyie rose—

Mr. Francois: I promised to give way to the hon. Member for Wirral, West and I shall keep my word.

Stephen Hesford: I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman, who has moved on to the point that I wanted to raise. The problem is his umbrella assertion that there is an HCI industry. I do not readily accept that there is such an industry that will be abolished by the legislation. I believe that the figures quoted by my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General are correct and that there has been a take-up over the last couple of years of only 4 per cent. That being the case, it is not clear what industry has supposed to have grown up over that time. The hon. Gentleman is talking about an industry that sells computers, which has been around for a long time. That industry will continue, irrespective of whether this particular legislation goes ahead. The hon. Gentleman has not taken into account the fact that the scheme will move on to a different phase, focused on provision for the elderly and the unemployed who really need these IT skills—[Interruption.]

Mr. Francois: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way before I was tempted to intervene on him. He is trying to play games with the statistics. He said that the scheme had only a 4 per cent. take-up, but that is nonsense. I have already provided one example of an organisation that saw take-up of 16 per cent. and it has been at that level or higher for a number of organisations. The take-up among employers pushing the scheme has been very healthy and I have already argued that the scheme was about to take off with other organisations—[Interruption.] I have to ask Government Members who are intervening from sedentary positions why, if the scheme was so bad, both the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department for Work and Pensions were about to roll it out for their own employees. Perhaps some Government Member could stand up and answer that question. I will gladly give way to anyone prepared to do so. Silence.

Perhaps the greatest problem in the whole sorry saga is the effect on individuals who have benefited from the scheme. I have already explained how even their benefit will be time-limited. In order to understand how they will be affected, I cite the example of one HCI provider, the company Futuremedia, which established a website to allow subscribers to provide feedback on the scheme. Here are some examples from respondents outlining the benefits that they believe the scheme confers. I have taken four representative examples. One respondent said:

"I joined so that my twelve-year-old daughter would not be disadvantaged when it comes to homework, research and preparations for exams. To date it has proved to be money well spent."

The next respondent said:

"I joined because it gave me the chance to involve myself in the process of gaining new skills. This without the direct pressure of any direct work-related scheme but with help at hand and the knowledge I could work at my own pace in my own time."

A third said:

"I joined as I was looking for a computer for myself but couldn't afford to buy one outright; when the offer came along I decided to apply as it was a cheap and easier way of affording a new computer."

The fourth said:

"As a man approaching my 50th birthday I find it vital to be dragged into the 21st century learning computer skills, as more and more they become an everyday part of life."

Those are just a few of the numerous examples of how HCI was benefiting people in exactly the way intended, allowing them to gain both IT skills and the chance to learn about other subjects online and giving access to a PC to those who could probably not otherwise afford it. All that could be lost if we do not delete clause 61.

For all those reasons, we believe that the scheme needs to be retained not only for the UK IT industry, which could quite conceivably be harmed by the clause, or the 2,000 or so whose jobs could be lost, but for the many employees in the country who would have taken advantage of HCI in the future to help maintain Britain's competitiveness. We believe that not least because all the indications are that HCI was just beginning really to take off.

I now move on to options to save the scheme by producing a revised system, under which it could operate alternatively in future—

7 pm

Adam Afriyie: Just before my hon. Friend moves on to establishing his case for a revised scheme, does he agree that the low take-up of technology at home is not the only problem, because about 500,000 people will have to change their behaviour, which has associated costs? If it costs £50 or £100 to change the arrangements, that could well work out in the region of £25 million to £50 million in additional costs incurred by business.

Mr. Francois: My hon. Friend is right. Many people entered into the arrangement in good faith, having been encouraged to do so by their employers. Indeed, they were ultimately encouraged to do so by the Government. Now, suddenly, that benefit is effectively being withdrawn, or will be once their individual contracts with their employers expire. Those people will understandably feel let down—[Interruption.]

Peter Luff: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Francois: I will briefly, but then I want to outline the alternative.

Peter Luff: The Paymaster General is muttering from a sedentary position something about it being for work. My hon. Friend should be allowed to answer that point, because the Paymaster General obviously does not understand the purpose of the scheme. A DTI document published in January 2004 lists among the benefits for employees' education for their children, entertainment, e-mail and purchasing goods and services; it was clearly intended for home use. It was all about spreading understanding of computing, so I repeat that the Paymaster General obviously does not understand the purpose of the scheme.

Mr. Francois: In my experience, the Paymaster General mutters a lot from a sedentary position. [Interruption.] I really think that she should go away and re-read her brief. Having heard her remarks—I shall listen, of course, to what she says in her wind-up speech—I am not certain that she realises what exactly she is abolishing.

Dawn Primarolo: On a point of order, Mrs. Heal. I have not said a dicky bird. I have been sitting in my place listening to the debate. I do not mind being criticised by the hon. Gentleman, but does he need to make things up?

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sylvia Heal): Order. That is not a point of order for the Chair. May I ask all those participating in the debate to concentrate on the matters in hand? Let us have a little calm.

Mr. Francois: Those who know the Paymaster General well can judge for themselves.

On the options to save the scheme, the Treasury has sought to justify the scrapping of the home computer initiative by citing abuse. On Second Reading the Paymaster General appeared to have no other defence of the Chancellor's ill thought-out decision than to make noises about iPods from a sedentary position. It is true that a loophole existed. A number of products that are entertainment rather than educational, and so are not exactly in the spirit of the scheme, such as MP3 players, game consoles and digital cameras, were ordered in some cases and qualified for the tax exemption because the HCI guidelines from 2004 gave only broad definitions. So there was a loophole which some people attempted to exploit.

However, the Treasury has produced little clear evidence, even tonight, of the extent of the abuse that it claims was occurring, which we believe was only at the margins. As I pointed out in an intervention, there was little hard evidence of the abuse in the Government's own regulatory impact assessment, which they produced last week in a desperate attempt to justify the abolition of the scheme.

Mr. Wills: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Francois: In a moment.

In any event, it would not be difficult to tighten up the rules by producing guidelines that give details about the items to which the tax exemption would not in future apply. It is very simple to do that if the intention is to combat the abuse. Throughout the Bill—

Mr. Wills: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Francois: In a minute.

Throughout the Bill, we will debate ad nauseam all sorts of anti-avoidance proposals that the Government have introduced in the Bill—some of which are highly complex and technical—to try to prevent what the Treasury determines to be abuse. It would be simple to produce relevant guidelines; they would be less complicated than some of the measures that we will debate on real estate investment trusts and group relief. If the Treasury wanted to maintain the scheme, it could easily produce guidelines.

There is a precedent. In Sweden, the Government have for some time operated a scheme similar to the HCI. There were similar concerns there about people seeking to exploit the tax advantages to purchase equipment outside the original spirit of spreading IT skills. However, in 2004, instead of scrapping the scheme, the Swedish Government found a workable solution, by tightening up the rules on qualifying equipment.

For example, the rules stipulated that in future only one personal computer would be allowed per employee; some had attempted to order more than one. The monitor size of those PCs was restricted to 30 in. Peripherals and accessories were divided into two categories; those primarily used connected to a PC, such as keyboards and printers, which were allowed, and those whose primary usage did not involve a PC, such as digital cameras and MP3 players, which were specifically not allowed.

Such restrictions would be relatively simple to introduce, were HMRC to produce a list of equipment that would continue to qualify, perhaps reinforced by another list of equipment that was specifically excluded from the scheme, such as iPods and MP3 players.

Mr. Wills: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Francois: In a minute.

The Government cannot hide behind excuses, such as the difficulty of defining qualifying equipment, because we have just provided them with an empirical example showing how another nation tackled the problem. Moreover, the Government's own regulatory impact assessment concedes that continuing the scheme with tighter guidelines on qualifying equipment, which is characterised in the RIA as option 2, would virtually halve the estimated cost of the scheme to the taxpayer, as projected by the Treasury out to 2010–11, thus allowing the scheme to survive, retaining its key benefits at a reduced cost to the taxpayer on a more tightly defined basis. That should constitute a win-win all round. I urge the Government to take the opportunity while there is still time.

Mr. Wills: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Francois: In a moment.

I come to an important point—the definition of "not significant", which the Paymaster General briefly addressed in her introductory remarks. If the existing exemptions are removed by clause 61, an associated issue arises; how computers provided by employers to employees will be taxed. As the RIA states at paragraph 22:

"If significant private use is made of a computer provided for business purposes a tax charge will arise on the private use element based on the value of the computer and the extent of the business and private use. Employers will also be liable to Class 1A National Insurance contributions."

That could lead to a significant compliance burden for employers if they are required to police the extent of private use by their employees. As the British Chambers of Commerce states in The Times today,

"Businesses have already seen the cost of implementing government regulation rise to over £50 billion since 1998, so to introduce in the small print of the Budget another measure such as this one will further serve to burden employers and impact on their ability to compete effectively."

The Government have responded by arguing that there will be no tax or NIC liability if such use is deemed "not significant", but have not clarified how that will be defined. If clause 61 remains part of the Bill, it is vital that that is clarified so that both employers and employees know where they stand.

The RIA states at paragraph 73 that HMRC will "invite employer representatives to work with them as they develop guidance which will articulate their approach for handling compliance and administration issues that flow from the changes announced in the Budget."

I think I heard the Paymaster General reiterate, but I will ask her to repeat beyond peradventure in her winding-up speech, that the Government are planning to consult industry so that they can clearly define "not significant" and the matter can be clarified once and for all.

If that is the Government's intention, can the Paymaster General estimate how long the process will take? For instance, does she anticipate that it will be concluded successfully by July, as suggested in paragraph 74 of the RIA? Even better, if clause 61 were removed from the Bill, the current exemptions would remain in place and the issue would not arise. As The Times argued this morning in a leader sub-titled "The Treasury sends another nasty message to business",

"Treasury officials have promised to take a 'practical' view of how much private use should be regarded as 'significant'. The most practical approach, when the issue is debated in the Commons today, would be to withdraw it. We are watching."

That is another good reason for deleting clause 61. I shall now give way to the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills).

Mr. Wills: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman for finally giving way. He has moved on from the point on which I wanted to ask him to clarify his intentions. However, I will take advantage of his generosity and ask him to be a little more specific about how he intends to define the scope of the reformed HCI, as he would regard it. Does he accept that the technology is moving so fast that it is difficult to draw the parameters? When the scheme was originally defined, it was appropriate for the technology. He acknowledges that abuses take place, although there is some disagreement about the extent. Those have come about partly as a result of changes in technology that were not conceivable. Although he has tried to provide a constructive alternative, two or three years down the line the technologies may well have moved on again. Is it not right to try and address abuse in the light of the rapid changes in technology?

Mr. Francois: I thank the hon. Gentleman for conceding that we have tried to be constructive about the matter. I welcome the fact that as a former Minister in the Department of Trade and Industry, he has put that on the record. Those canny Swedes thought of that possibility, too. They realised that as technology moved on, particularly in such areas, the list would need to be reviewed regularly to make sure that the definitions remained current. It should be perfectly possible for us to do that too. We come up with an inclusive list and an exclusive list and we review them periodically—say, once a year—to make sure that the definitions remain current. That seems, to coin a phrase, not to be beyond the wit of man, or indeed woman.

To summarise, the HCI scheme has been important in spreading computer literacy among our population, including the lower paid, in order to help our country compete in the 21st century. As such, the scheme should be retained and not effectively wound up, as the Government propose. It should be possible to devise a revised version of the home computer initiative that allows the scheme to survive for its intended purpose, while introducing safeguards to combat the alleged fraud. If the Scandinavians are able to do that, I see no reason why we could not do it as well. The situation is a good example of the old maxim, "Where there's a will, there's a way".

The key question is whether there is a will on the part of the Government to save the scheme, or whether the Chancellor is so desperate for the £300 million in revenue which the Treasury's Red Book estimates would be raised by scrapping the HCI scheme from 2006–07 to 2008–09. Will avarice take over, and will the scheme be cancelled regardless of its obvious merits? Option 2 in the Treasury's regulatory impact assessment would allow the scheme to survive on a honed-down basis.

If we do not hear a convincing argument from the Government tonight—I do not find the digital inclusion team convincing—we shall simply assume that the money that the Chancellor is hoping to recoup has taken precedence over all other considerations and that a financially desperate Chancellor, who loves to talk about the technological revolution and the need to promote a high skills economy, has simply taken the cash. That decision is doubly detrimental, because it will damage our ability to compete in high skills industry with the likes of China and India in the 21st century.

I urge Ministers to draw back from that course while there is still time and to work co-operatively with other parties, industry and scheme users to save that very important scheme. I shall listen to the Paymaster General's reply with genuine interest in the hope that, on behalf of the 500,000 scheme users and the 2,000 employees who will be directly affected, common sense may yet prevail and that that particularly bad decision by an analogue Chancellor may yet be reversed.

Rob Marris: I thank the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) for his speech, a large part of which was thoughtful, although he will not be surprised to learn that I disagree with much of what he said. If clause 61 passes into law, computers provided for use at home solely for business purposes will continue to be allowed, and I shall return to that point.

The hon. Gentleman accepts that times change. The Paymaster General has said that the take-up rate for the HCI scheme in the first four years after its introduction in 1999 was 29 per cent. and that it then fell to 4 per cent., which shows the operation of the law of diminishing returns. I know that the hon. Gentleman was not a Member of the House in 1999, but I strongly suspect that his party failed to support the HCI when it was introduced and when it was reviewed in 2003—he can correct me on that point, if I am wrong. He, along with the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff), now supports the HCI, and the thrust of his speech seemed to be that times change and that the scheme has reached lift-off.

It is true that times change, but we must put the matter into context, which the hon. Gentleman addressed only at the beginning and end of his speech when he discussed India, China and globalisation. He issued a challenge to the House, which I shall answer. The hon. Gentleman, and most Conservative Members in the Chamber, want to retain the HCI, because it is an attempt to upskill our society.

The Government have spent a huge amount of taxpayers' money on trying to upskill our society, and they continue to do so. I will not reel off the figures, because we have all heard them, but Labour Members agree that that spending was certainly correct, whereas Conservative Members are somewhat divided. For example, the education maintenance allowance was piloted in my constituency, and, although I cannot prove it, I posit as cause and effect the fact that staying on rates at 16 greatly increased. That measure involved investing a lot of money in a long-term process of upskilling our economy, which is the context in which we need to understand the HCI.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the trade union learning fund. I served in the Committee that considered that legislation, where Conservative Members opposed it. The trade union learning fund has been very successful as part of a mosaic of measures to upskill our economy. The HCI was part of that mosaic, and the Government now say that they would rather that other things were part of it, too.

As far as I am aware, the HCI did not cover students or pensioners, unless they happened to be in paid employment. As part of the mosaic of upskilling, the Government have been pouring computers into schools. All hon. Members visit schools in their constituencies—I am sure that you have done so in the west midlands, Mrs. Heal—where interactive white boards have been installed, many teachers have been provided with laptops, and increased numbers of computers have been made available to pupils. Indeed, some schools in Wolverhampton are successfully piloting the use of personal digital assistants—I do not know whether PDAs fall within the category of computers, because, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) has said, technology moves on so quickly.

Shortly before the Budget, the hon. Member for Rayleigh asked about support for the scheme by the Department for Work and Pensions and the Department of Trade and Industry. However, the Budget included a lot more money for education, and what is known in the vernacular as "Brown money" consists of money that goes directly to schools—from memory an average secondary school can receive up to £198,000 in the following financial year. It is surprising that the hon. Gentleman has suggested that the abolition of the HCI is simply an act of desperation by the Chancellor, because the Budget included far more extra money for education, which affects skills both directly and indirectly, than will be saved by the abolition of the HCI. The further education White Paper was produced at the beginning of March, and adult learning grants allow people to upskill to level 2 and under-25s to upskill to level 3. The HCI was part of that mosaic of upskilling.

Whether Conservative Members like it or not, those taking advantage of the HCI disproportionately consisted of higher-rate taxpayers. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones) has pointed out, that is not the case in absolute numbers, but it is true proportionally. In round terms, higher-rate taxpayers make up about 10 per cent. of taxpayers, but they made up 25 per cent. of those who benefited from the scheme. That is not to say that we should abolish the scheme just because higher-rate taxpayers benefited disproportionately, but it is worth bearing that point in mind against the backdrop of where the Government want to go on skills provision. We must consider the HCI in that context.

Mr. Kevan Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree with the Low Pay Commission, which has pointed out that many part-time women workers would not benefit under the scheme?

Rob Marris: I did not know that, although it does not surprise me. Although the HCI had some success, times change and we must move on.

It is unfortunate that the HCI appears to have been axed overnight rather than its withdrawal being phased over a year. It is entirely proper for the Treasury to examine whether a tax measure produces a certain effect and whether that effect could be produced through the better use of taxpayers' money. The Opposition would rightly berate any Government who introduced a measure to help with skills and who did not change it for years and years rather than keeping it under review to see whether it worked, whether behaviour changed as a consequence of it and whether they should put taxpayers' money into something else.

Peter Luff: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who is a colleague on the Trade and Industry Committee. On the abolition of the scheme, I would not be so angry if a year's notice had been given on the intention to ban the scheme, which would have been the right way to proceed. The Paymaster General must address why the change is so sudden, because the matter could have been handled much more elegantly and effectively and with less serious consequences for the employees who risk losing their jobs.

Rob Marris: I am sure that the Paymaster General will address that issue later, if she catches your eye, Mrs. Heal. I believe that the hon. Gentleman has a constituency interest in the matter, for which he is rightly fighting. In terms of the economy as a whole, however, we must consider whether, for example, fewer computers will be purchased because of the abolition of the initiative. I do not know the answer to that, but I suspect that many fewer computers will be bought. While, sadly, there may be the P45s to which the hon. Gentleman referred in his constituency, in terms of the economy as a whole more people may be employed in outlets such as Dixon's, which is going to call itself Curry's, or wherever, selling computers to people direct instead of their being refracted through their employers. I do not know the research on that, and I do not know whether the Treasury does.

The hon. Member for Rayleigh mentioned what was said in The Times, and probably in other newspapers, about the idea, which I am sure that the Government do not have, of taxing personal e-mails. I would draw an analogy with company cars. I am sure that the House has spent a lot of time over the years discussing the taxation of company cars. The matter has come to rest in the past few years because, as a House and as a society, we have reached a modus vivendi and a balance as to how much company cars should be taxed. In most cases, company cars are used for business purposes as well as domestically. A car is an expensive piece of kit. Why have a car that one uses at work, and that one then has to park at work, or, if one can prove that there is no secure parking at work, drive home and leave there? When one then went to the supermarket, one had to go in a different car that one had bought oneself. We all recognised that that was a bit silly.

The taxation of part of the value of company cars is done on a fairly rough and ready basis. People do not go round saying, "How many miles have you driven?" There used to be banding. I think that there still is—I do not have a company car any more—but they are pretty broad bands. One does not have to clock every mile as regards whether it is business and personal. There is a contradistinction between the cost of enforcing something and simply getting in some tax while not spending too much on enforcement.

Perhaps we can have a similarly rough and ready approach to computers provided by employers for business use at people's homes by assuming that, say, 75 per cent. is business use as against 25 per cent. that is personal use. Otherwise, we could go on and on, ad infinitum, with the taxpayer subsidising computers at home for people's private use, which was a measure to kick-start IT literacy and competency in 1999. That may be the route that Sweden is taking, and good luck to it if it does.

The Government are absolutely right to set the Bill in the context of the mosaic of upskilling measures for our economy, and absolutely right to review it, but I wish that they had given it a little more time instead of doing it overnight.

Julia Goldsworthy: I welcome the announcement of a dedicated digital inclusion team and hope that it will really tackle exclusion issues. Will the entirety of the £370 million in savings that the abolition of the scheme will generate be transferred into that, or will some go into the Treasury pot?

If the clause remains in the Bill, it will signal the end of a very successful scheme that has helped 500,000 people, more than 75 per cent. of whom were in the lower-income tax brackets. Those people gained access to computers at home, not only for them but for their families. Siemens told us that its participation rate is more than 35 per cent.

Can the Paymaster General tell us more about how the decision to end the scheme was made? I understand that it was made a matter of hours before the Budget with very little consultation with the Department of Trade and Industry. The explanatory notes give this reason for the decision:

> "There is also evidence to suggest that the exemption has been applied beyond the scope of its original intention. Some HCI providers have offered packages that include games consoles and MP3 players and allow employees to buy equipment through salary sacrifice arrangements rather than borrow it".

Will the Paymaster General not only write to the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) with that evidence but place it in the Library so that all Members can have access to it?

The Government claim that there are fundamental problems in two key areas, yet neither need be terminal for the scheme. All that is needed is clearer definition of the existing regulation. The Government would be more believable if, when they gave their reasons, they accompanied them with the hard evidence which, as yet, we have not seen.

The first problem is that of the definition of a computer, which in the original regulation is defined as "computer and peripheral equipment". There is a precedent in terms of how that has been resolved in other countries. Sweden tightened up its definitions of "eligible equipment" and "ineligible equipment", and made it clear that only one computer per household would be eligible. It might be worth paying attention to another Scandinavian precedent—that of Denmark, which cancelled the scheme but brought it back a year later. The Government might be forced to eat their words in future. There are ways of coming up with a series of workable definitions that continue to bring benefits to employees and their families. It should not merely be a case of robbing Peter to pay Paul in order to improve inclusion in other deprived groups.

On the wider issue of salary sacrifice, I understand from the HCI Alliance that the Office of Fair Trading has to approve every single hire agreement that goes through the scheme, so that if a claim fell outside the terms of the scheme, it would not qualify for the exemption. If the Government were able to provide evidence of such abuse, that would help clarify the situation. Certainly, the HCI Alliance has no evidence that it was being abused in that way or beyond the definitions of the regulation.

Withdrawal of the scheme will create a massive compliance problem for employees and employers. The regulatory impact assessment is very helpful. It explains that if the exemption is removed, all employees are technically required to log the time that they spend at home on their work computer using it for leisure purposes, such as checking e-mails or playing computer games, because it will be taxable. The removal of the scheme will create further confusion, not remove it.

Paragraph 18 of the RIA states:

"Where employers and their employees enter into new agreements to loan computer equipment for private use on or after 6 April, the employee will be liable to pay tax on the cash equivalent of the benefit in kind. Employers will be liable to class 1A NICs on the same amount."

The RIA goes on to say in paragraph 22:

"Some employees may be provided with computer equipment or mobile telephones solely for business use. In this situation as long as any private use that it is made of the equipment is not significant there will be no liability to tax. If significant private use is made of a computer provided for business purposes a tax charge will arise on the private use element based on the value of the computer and the extent of the business and private use. Employers will also be liable to class 1A National Insurance contributions."

I will be grateful if the Paymaster General can explain what "significant" means and how employers are planning to fill out their tax returns.

Stewart Hosie: How does the hon. Lady understand the following example? If an employee has a computer for business use and learns to use a new computer package or software development tool that is not directly related to the work that they do but is in line with what the company does, does that count as personal or business use?

Julia Goldsworthy: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman could have an interesting discussion about that with the taxman.

Dawn Primarolo: I can help the hon. Lady on this point. It may be confused in her mind, but it is not confused in employers' minds. The interpretation of what is significant use was in operation before 1999, when the exemption came in, and employers managed to operate it perfectly well. I have said to the Committee that I am happy to ensure that that is restated in that way. Employers have used it before and knew what it meant, and it will not be an intellectual challenge for them.

7.30 pm

Julia Goldsworthy: I hope that employees feel the same way as employers.

Another major problem is the way in which the scheme has been axed with no warning. That has had a negative impact on a variety of businesses. Last week, Meriden announced profit warnings, which are partly due to its significant involvement with the HCI scheme.

On a smaller scale, I was contacted by a business called BizApp, which is based in Cheltenham and was expressly set up to help smaller businesses access the scheme. It now faces the loss of six jobs. It established its business because it identified precisely the same problem about which the Government are now talking: it is difficult for smaller businesses to access the scheme. It found a solution, by automating the process and providing the three-year warranty and support package that so many people found attractive and that small businesses could manage to administer. It wrote:

"We became involved in HCI in 2004 and realised very quickly it was impossible for the industry to bring HCI to the Small to Medium Business Sector because the process was still too complex ... We therefore developed an online platform which automated the whole process. This was no easy task because it was necessary to ensure that all the relevant legislation was adhered to and the platform allowed resellers who use our platform to make substantial savings over the manual methods."

The company was therefore clear that it had identified a problem and found a way in which to overcome it. However, it now faces making its staff redundant because the Government claim that there is insufficient participation from those on lower incomes and more deprived sectors. It is illogical that it cannot now participate in the process of helping people access the scheme.

It is disturbing that the Government have taken so long to provide any indication of the mechanisms on which they will focus their resources. It is interesting that option 2 was rejected because it did not help people from deprived backgrounds. Option 3 announces all the savings and gives no idea of how the Government would target support. That is important because many businesses have invested in and built up infrastructure to provide the HCI. They could use their expertise and investment to provide the scheme to people from more deprived backgrounds, yet all elements of certainty for their business have been taken away. That will have an impact on their confidence to invest in any future scheme and future Government proposals.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I have been listening carefully to the hon. Lady. How will low paid workers, the unemployed or the elderly, to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) referred earlier, benefit from the scheme?

Julia Goldsworthy: I can give the hon. Gentleman a precise example of someone to whom I spoke this morning and who is using the HCI to buy a computer for his mother, who is a pensioner. The whole point of the HCI was to bring computers into private use and encourage their use in the home. Why, therefore, has the Paymaster General rejected modifying the scheme to ensure that the abuses that she mentioned do not take place?

Peter Luff: For the second time in the debate, the Paymaster General indicates that she does not understand the purpose of the scheme that she is abolishing. She shook her head in dismay at the example that the hon. Lady provided, when, according to the Department of Trade and Industry document, which was produced jointly with the Department for Education and Skills and other Departments, that is exactly the sort of purpose for which the scheme was established. It was to take computers into homes, not for business purposes. The Paymaster General clearly does not understand that point.

Julia Goldsworthy: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. The scheme was an initiative to bring computers into the home. Why, therefore, did the Paymaster General reject option 2 and why was the new scheme announced only today? I hope that she will reply in her winding-up speech.

Mr. Wills: I welcome today's announcement by the Government of the digital inclusion team. It is welcome not least because it focuses on the overriding objective of ensuring that all those who are potentially excluded from the benefits of access—everyone who has spoken said that such access was essential—to fast-changing new technologies remain the priority. The emphasis will be on them, not some specific scheme, which, I accept, was relevant when it was introduced and was, incidentally, opposed by Opposition parties at the time. We should focus on the ends, not the means. I therefore greatly welcome the digital inclusion team but I want to ask for reassurance about two matters.

First, my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General spoke generally about those who are potentially excluded from the new technologies. I should be grateful for an assurance that one of the key focuses of the new digital inclusion team will be lower paid workers, especially those on the national minimum wage for whom access to new technologies could be crucial to help them upskill and move up the employment ladder, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) rightly stressed.

The second point is more technical. My right hon. Friend referred to digital television. Of course, that could be enormously important. We are about to move to a switchover from analogue to digital television and that will clearly be important in many different ways. However, I hope that she will reassure me that she will not ask the digital inclusion team to rely on digital television as the main passport to literacy in the new technologies. It is important to bear in mind that there will be a plethora of ways in which to access the new technologies and that the computer is likely to remain important for most people, if not everybody, in that regard. I should therefore be grateful for some reassurance on those points.

Peter Luff: Although you rightly rebuked us, Mrs. Heal, for getting a little excitable earlier in the debate, I know the Paymaster General well enough to realise that she will not take it personally. In that spirit, I join my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) in wishing her an extremely happy birthday. I am sorry that she has to pass it here.

I have two separate concerns. First, was the scheme a good thing—yes or no? A related question is whether it could have been improved. Secondly, was the manner in which it was abolished satisfactory? Although my colleague on the Committee, the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris), said that I spoke from constituency interest, as Chairman of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, I am also worried about the impact of the scheme on the Government's strategy for bridging the digital divide to build new societies. The scheme was originally believed to have played an important part in the process. I freely declare my constituency concern, but I also have a genuine anxiety about the broader issues that precipitate change in Government policy raises.

The scheme's demise deserves a tribute along the lines of Mark Antony's celebrated speech in "Julius Caesar":

"Friends, Romans, countrymen, lend me your ears;
I come to bury Caesar, not to praise him.
The evil that men do lives after them,
The good is oft interred with their bones".

I come to praise the home computing initiative, not to bury it—the Chancellor has done that. The good that the scheme has done lives on. The computers are in homes and much good has been done. The scheme has made a contribution to fulfilling the Government's key objectives of improving IT skills and productivity and increasing access to the internet in UK homes.

I repeat that the Paymaster General made several sedentary comments earlier that suggest that she does not understand the purpose of the scheme. It was not a business scheme but was provided by businesses to their employees for personal use. That was what made it so strong, successful and important. I hope that she has now understood that. The scheme was not for business use of computers at home.

Stewart Hosie: The hon. Gentleman has made that point a few times during the debate. On 24 April, the Paymaster General said:

"With effect from 6 April, a tax charge will arise on computer equipment made available by employers to their employees for private use."—[Official Report, 24 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 461.]

Perhaps she understood the point on 24 April but does not understand it today.

Peter Luff: That is a helpful intervention, which speaks for itself.

The scheme was universally approved by the outside world, including all the stakeholders—to use the Government's word. Although consensus is normally a cause for some concern, it is occasionally right. Those who provided the equipment, those who used it, the trade unions, the CBI—indeed, everyone—believed that the scheme was good and an excellent example of an effective Government-private partnership.

Alas, the evil that the Chancellor has done by abolishing the excellent scheme will live on. Jobs will be lost. There is an HCI industry and companies had invested large sums of money in developing marketing initiatives, in the expectation that it would run for at least an extra two years. One of the questions that I tabled to the Chancellor, to which I have received no reply after more than a month, asked why it has been abolished sooner than anticipated. Large amounts of investment were made on the back of an assurance that the scheme was important and that the Government were committed to it.

Stephen Hesford: I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's argument that an HCI industry exists. Is he arguing for a state subsidy for that industry?

Peter Luff: No, not at all. The hon. Gentleman does not understand how much money the industry has had to invest to make this scheme work. After the debate, I will happily show him the Government's own documentation on how employers and employees should implement the scheme. It is very complicated and difficult; it is not straightforward. The Department for Work and Pensions had a significant sized team of officials working on how it should be implemented, but that scheme has now been abolished, when it was on the point of succeeding.

As I said, the scheme was difficult and complicated. It did not work in 1999, and it was effectively rebooted in 2003 and relaunched in 2004. It is just beginning to have an impact now, which is what makes this precipitate decision so unfortunate. Evesham Technology will survive this body blow, but income from the scheme represents a quarter of its turnover. About £1.5 million a month will disappear overnight.

I was going to make this point to the Paymaster General later, but I have been drawn into making it now. I am about to be nice to her, so I hope that she will listen. No? I will not hold my breath. I might come back to the point later when she can hear. I was about to express my great gratitude to her for the way in which she reacted so diligently—

Dawn Primarolo: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I was not speaking when he accused me of doing so. I am listening to him, but I do not need to look him in the eye to hear what he is saying.

Peter Luff: I am sorry. I thought that the right hon. Lady was reading something.

I am genuinely grateful to the Paymaster General for the way in which she responded to the concern about the impact of the Office of Fair Trading's involvement in the initiative. She was magnificent. She now looks slightly puzzled. Each and every scheme approved under the initiative had to go to the OFT because it technically breached the terms of the Consumer Credit Act 1974. There was huge backlog of cases, and if the scheme had been abolished overnight—as was originally intended—many thousands of computers that had been earmarked for consumers would have been lost. Now, Evesham Technology will have four more months' turnover at £1.5 million a month, so the Paymaster General's action—for which I had to fight hard with her and the OFT—was really appreciated. She has enabled companies such as Evesham Technology to plan for the future, instead of being dumped in it very suddenly. I am genuinely grateful to her for that.

However, a very worrying evil has been done. There is no doubt that those involved in the IT sector—often big multinational companies, not just small ones—have been shocked by the precipitate way in which this Government strategy has suddenly been torn up. I can tell the Paymaster General with absolute certainty that this will reduce industry support for working with the Government on such schemes. The industry will not be prepared to commit management resources and expense to such projects if the Government are suddenly to decide to throw them out.

Sadly, I am not allowed to name the company involved in the scheme, but I can tell the Paymaster General that one multinational IT company that had earmarked a multi-million pound investment for an education IT partnership in this country has now decided to abandon it and to move to another of our European Union competitors. I shall call it a competitor for the purposes of this argument. So the abolition of the scheme has already had the effect of shifting the support of major multinational players away from this country. The manner in which the Government have abolished the scheme is having a serious impact. I am particularly sad that no replacement schemes have been identified or funded, and I am really worried that we will lose the infrastructure to deliver any future schemes that the Government might introduce.

Mr. Francois: My hon. Friend is making an extremely important point. When companies, especially large multinationals, consider making investment decisions, they look at a whole range of factors. One of the most important is confidence in the continuity of the tax regime in the jurisdiction in which they plan to invest. Decisions such as this are therefore injurious, in that they will damage that confidence and have a long-term knock-on effect on investment in this country. Would my hon. Friend like to amplify that point a little more, because of its importance?

Peter Luff: I have talked to many representatives of the Home Computing Initiative Alliance, and they have all expressed their deep concern about the Government's intentions, not just on taxation but on all the initiatives related to home computing. Which of the initiatives will endure? Which will be torn up without warning at the eleventh hour, leaving the massive investment and effort made by the companies worthless and in tatters? This is a serious issue.

Mr. Wills: Will the hon. Gentleman clarify the point raised by the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) about the importance of stability in fiscal regimes? That was a good point, but does it mean that the Conservatives have now abandoned their plans for a flat rate of tax?

Peter Luff: I am not going to speculate on the tax policies drawn up by my Front-Bench colleagues. I do not have any knowledge whatever of them. We all believe that tax policies should change and evolve over time; that is not in dispute. If the Government had made a good case for the abolition of the HCI, I would have accepted its abolition. However, they did not, and they have abolished the scheme in the worst possible way. That is the problem. If only they had taken a bit more time and care over its abolition, we might not be having this debate tonight.

I remind the Paymaster General that, on 19 January 2004, the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—now the Health Secretary—said at the relaunch of the scheme:

> "For individuals—as well as cost savings—HCI schemes can help realise personal and professional potential. Through improved ICT access and use, they provide the tools and resources which further individual learning, enhance workplace skills and increase employment opportunities."

[Peter Luff]

In January this year, on the second anniversary of the scheme, the Minister for Industry and the Regions said that the

"HCI provides a great example of what can be done when the government and industry are working together to fulfil policy objectives".

On 13 March, he repeated that praise in The Times, in a supplement on the HCI, when he stated:

"Since 2003, our home computing scheme has promoted the Government's aim of widening the ownership and use of computers at home, while helping our aim of bridging the digital divide."

As the Paymaster General knows, the DTI offered the scheme to its own staff for the first time on 15 March this year. It was still encouraging its staff to take up the scheme even on the very day of the Budget. It came as a total surprise to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that it was to be abolished. That is a matter of public record.

The most extraordinary quote of all comes from the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his 1999 Budget:

"Inequality in computer learning today will mean inequality in earning power tomorrow, so to bring more computers into more British homes, we will legislate so that employees will be able to secure computers on loan from their companies as a tax-free benefit ... In the new economy, the more individual talent we nurture, the more economic growth we will achieve."—[Official Report, 9 March 1999; Vol. 327, c. 180.]

Yet at the precise moment at which that ambition was beginning to be fulfilled, the scheme was abolished.

The reasons that the Paymaster General gave earlier for abolishing the scheme do not bear even the most cursory critical examination. The job has not been done. She made derisory comments about a 4 per cent. increase in the number of people taking up that initiative, but that is 1 million households by my reckoning. If we are to be internationally competitive, we have a long way to go to increase the penetration of computers in households.

I was particularly disturbed by the Paymaster General's comments on the abuse of the scheme. Of course, everything that we do is abused. The VAT system is abused, and I expect that many hon. Members would love to see it abolished, but I doubt that that would be the response to its abuse. Instead, the response would be to close the loopholes and to police the system more effectively. That should have been the Government's response to abuse of the HCI scheme. If there was significant abuse—which I genuinely doubt—the response should have been to close the loopholes. Indeed, the industry is bursting with ideas on how to close every possible loophole.

As I said earlier, I take particular exception to the Paymaster General's suggestion that Evesham Technology was abusing the scheme by marketing other products. Some of those products were specifically allowed under the scheme. Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs kept the terms vague because it said that it wanted to allow room for emerging technology. Actually, the industry would have liked the terms to be tighter, to avoid any possible abuse. Also, as good entrepreneurs, representatives of the industry offered other products outside the scheme at full market cost in their brochures. They were trying to sell more kit. That is a natural reaction for enterprise. HMRC made the fatal error—a tragic misunderstanding that further undermines my confidence in it—of thinking that those products were being offered as part of the scheme. They were not; they were add-ons that were not included in the scheme's terms. I accept that there is bound to be a modest amount of abuse, but I fear that the abuse that the Paymaster General has referred to will turn out either to have been very modest indeed or to have involved a complete misunderstanding of what was actually going on.

I completely reject the idea that the scheme was not properly focused, because 375,000 lower-paid workers have already benefited from it. All the signs were that, as the scheme extended down into the small and medium-sized businesses, more and more lower-paid workers would benefit. It is no good the Paymaster General shaking her head in disbelief: that is what the evidence showed. It is quite clear that that was beginning to happen.

The TUC expressed its strong support for the scheme. Brendan Barber stated:

"The Home Computing Initiative has helped thousands of low paid workers without confident IT skills buy their first ever computer. Unions up and down the country have been promoting the scheme, often linked to training schemes. The sudden closure of the scheme would mean that many hours of voluntary union effort would go to waste."

I am not sure whether that was the quote that my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh cited earlier. I do not think that it was.

As for suggestions that higher rate taxpayers particularly benefited, I note that the foreword to the information and guidelines booklet referred to developing, not just lower-paid ones. The Government were not focusing on those workers then, and they boasted about the greater benefit that higher rate taxpayers would get from the scheme— the combined taxation benefits meant that the price of a computer fell by 41 per cent. for those higher rate taxpayers compared with a 33 per cent. discount for basic rate taxpayers. An advantage that the Government were trumpeting then is now suddenly a reason for abolishing the scheme.

"a broader skills base for all employees",

We all know that the sole reason for the removal of the scheme is that the Chancellor wanted to save some money at the eleventh hour. That is the only explanation for the fact that the proposal was put in the Budget at the last minute, without any of his colleagues in Whitehall even knowing that it was being considered. That is what makes it so sad. Although I was interested to hear what the Paymaster General had to say in her opening speech, she sounded more like the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry than the Paymaster General. We need to know where responsibility for delivering the Government's digital strategy resides. I wrote to the Prime Minister, following an unsatisfactory exchange in Prime Minister's questions last week, to ask him whether that responsibility now lies with:

"The Chancellor, who did not understand the very serious consequences of his precipitate actions, or the Trade and Industry Secretary, who had only just offered this excellent scheme to his own departmental staff?"

Such crucial policy cannot be made on the hoof in response to bad Budget decisions, but that is what we have seen tonight, and that is why I am so concerned.

I could go on at great length, but other Members wish to speak and we wish to hear the Paymaster General's response. I know that I have sounded excitable and angry at times; that is because I am angry about the way in which the scheme has been abolished. It was delivering the Government's objectives and I resent the way in which they are rewriting history to say that it was not. The method of its abolition was handled appallingly, causing maximum possible despair and despondency in the industry and destroying the vital bond of trust that should exist between Government and the private sector in this important area of policy.

I had hoped, with more time, to list ways in which the scheme could have been improved, all of which have been suggested by the industry, which was discussing them with HMRC officials a few days before the Budget—only a few days before the scheme was abolished. That is what I find utterly extraordinary. Not even HMRC had the slightest idea that the Chancellor was planning to abolish the scheme. It was a last-minute decision, and I plead with the Paymaster General for it to be reconsidered. At least the scheme should be given an extra year for an orderly phase-down while satisfactory alternatives are put in place.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I agree with the aspiration of the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) for wide use of computers in homes across the country. Members on both side of the Committee would agree with that. Part of my constituency is in South Stanley, which is in the top 10 most deprived wards in the country and has one of the lowest uptakes of IT skills, and I doubt whether many of my constituents in that area have benefited from the HCI scheme.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) made the point that the Opposition have portrayed this scheme as the only one put forward by the Government to extend computer literacy and the availability of computers in communities. In my constituency, putting money into education is doing more to increase the use of computers and computer skills, and the Chancellor gave extra money to education in the last Budget. In every school that I visit, I see not only laptops being used by teachers but interactive whiteboards and young people using IT skills in a way that could only be imagined a few years ago.

I referred earlier to the trade union movement, which, I understand, the Conservatives now support. I get confused about their position from day to day. One thing that has led to improved IT skills in many workplaces is the trade union learning fund, which has been consistently opposed by the Conservative party. I look forward to its support in future for that vital initiative, which has brought learning into many workplaces and reached some of the lowest-paid in society. In addition, Durham has a new further education college, with funding for IT from the Government. I reiterate that the Government have not just been tackling lack of IT skills and computer equipment in communities through the HCI scheme but through, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West said, a mosaic of measures.

That is demonstrated by a good initiative in the South Stanley school of technology run by Janet Bridges, the head teacher. That initiative is not just about enabling students to pay for computers; it is giving computers to 300 children, and is paid for by the Government's neighbourhood renewal funding. In those communities, that is the only way in which some children would get direct access to computers at home. Rather than spawning a private industry, it has already allowed local people to create infrastructure and support. Although the HCI scheme has been successful in some parts, it will not reach the hard core of people in poor communities, such as those that I represent, who will not get access to computers without such funding. That is why I support funding being directed to those areas.

I have heard some criticism of the way in which the scheme has been wound up, and the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) made his points well. I find it strange, however, that the Conservatives and Liberal Democrats are now arguing that this type of scheme, of which the late lamented J. K. Galbraith would have been proud, reflects a kind of Keynesian view that money should be put forward to support the computer industry, which, as we know, is a poor and dying sector of our economy. I am sorry, but that is not what it is meant to do. It is meant to direct resources to and ensure skills in some of the poorest communities. That more targeted approach, which the Government are adopting, will bear fruit. In my constituency, I will support that direct help to low-paid, elderly and unemployed people, who need access to computers and skills not just in the home but in village halls and libraries

Peter Luff: The hon. Gentleman is making an important point—of course we want lower-paid people to get access to information technology. To make maximum use of that, however, it must be in their homes. There is no point having open access schemes in public places where people will be reluctant to enter private and confidential data. In relation to the success of the Government's e-initiative, people will not fill out an income tax return online in a public place or do anything confidential where they cannot secure data, and families will not get the benefit. If low-paid people are to benefit most effectively, computers must be in their homes.

Mr. Jones: I take the hon. Gentleman's point. Unfortunately, however, I, unlike the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) who referred to her elderly or low-paid constituent whose rich relative purchased a computer, do not have many constituents for whom that is the case. In schools, hardware is being given to kids because that is the only way that they will get access to computers in the home. I do not disagree with the hon. Gentleman's points, but he must recognise that many low-paid workers, unemployed and elderly people will not be able to purchase the equipment. I would be radical and say that in some cases we should give the equipment free to certain user groups, as it will end up certainly saving them money and also saving the Exchequer money in relation to the accessing of certain services. I would welcome support for that initiative from the Conservative Front Bench.

[Mr. Jones]

As other Members have pointed out, the scheme has been successful in allowing certain sections of the community to access computers. That is good, but we now need to ensure that we direct money and resources to those who will never get access to computer equipment or IT skills unless we do such targeting.

Mr. Newmark: This year, the Chancellor presented a Budget for Britain's future, a Budget which will supposedly equip this country for the increasing challenges of global competitiveness. Unfortunately, clause 61 will do anything but that. The foreword to the HCI guidelines published in 2004 had no hesitation in stating that the scheme was an extremely powerful catalyst for an organisation that wants to exploit the clear and indisputable link between individual learning, workplace productivity and overall competitiveness.

The then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, now the Secretary of State for Health, has fallen on hard times since the heady days when she was able to add her signature to a statement, alongside those of the director general of the CBI and the general secretary of the TUC. If only the Royal College of Nursing were as co-operative. The strength of Government support was also indicated by the fact that the guidelines were issued by three Departments: the Department of Trade and Industry, the Cabinet Office and the Department for Education and Skills, with—I stress the word "with"—the backing of the Treasury.

Sadly, Members have not been surprised by the lack of consultation before the scrapping of the HCI, but the contrast between the close co-operation of 2004 and the chaos of 2006 is particularly stark. No longer is there joint authorship; the DTI itself was busy investing thousands of pounds in a scheme for its own staff, unaware that just across the road in the Treasury, Ministers were planning to axe the very same scheme.

We should also contrast the flamboyantly named Office of the e-Envoy, which existed until 2004, with the present e-Government Unit. The first had a responsibility to get the nation online, and, with the HCI, piloted a project that actually worked. Its successor focuses on "delivering and transforming public services through information technology."

We now have the paradox of a Government investing in online services—an example is the £340 million spent by Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs on expanding electronic tax returns—while simultaneously cutting spending on a project that has successfully delivered on its promise to increase the uptake of personal computers by low-paid workers. There is a delightful irony here, which I know many of my hon. Friends will appreciate: in the long litany of disasters that have come about because of Government investment in IT projects there is one notable success, and it is being cancelled. Perhaps the Government will consider applying some of the £71 million compensation which has been paid as a result of the tax credits IT fiasco to the continuation of the HCI scheme. The subsidising of a success by a disaster would be a rather neat compromise.

On Second Reading, the Chief Secretary reminded the House that

"times have changed and are changing rapidly".—[Official Report, 24 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 368.]

Indeed they are, but they are not changing so rapidly that they excuse the total absence of consultation on the end of the HCI. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) was also helpful when he said that this issue

"seems to have become a big deal".—[Official Report, 24 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 410.]

I am sure that my constituent Mr. Jon Emin is grateful for that sage pronouncement. I should add, however, that the hon. Gentleman made some thoughtful suggestions in his speech today.

Mr. Emin is the director of a company which, over the past few years, has been working to deliver the NCI scheme to the NHS. To date, he has helped to provide some of the 15,000 personal computers for nurses. He wrote to me that the HCI was "one of the few good things that this current Government" have achieved. He continued:

"There are still millions of low paid workers—in smaller organisations which are now finally being reached by the HCI administrators—yet to take advantage of this scheme, not to mention all the nurses, council workers and teachers who have not yet been given the opportunity to take part.

Is this fair? We think not.

The Government claim that it's trying to help UK Plc become more IT literate, but this clearly goes against that claim."

My constituent enclosed a copy of a letter that he had received from the director of finance at the Public and Commercial Services Union. It stated:

"We were about to introduce the scheme to our staff and have over the last few months undertaken a considerable amount of work to get the scheme off the ground. Both PCS and its employees are therefore extremely disappointed" that the Government intend to end the scheme. As I am sure the Paymaster General will tell us, taxpayers are often "extremely disappointed" by Budget measures that leave them worse off, but the Government have given no explanation for their decision, and there is a sense that the Chancellor may have believed that no one would notice clause 61.

Let me now deal with the question of definitions in amendments Nos. 2 and 17. On Second Reading, the Paymaster General gleefully challenged my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mrs. Villiers) on what definition of computer equipment should be applied for the purposes of the scheme. She should have been a little less triumphant. In the Standing Committee that considered the 2004 Finance Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) asked her "to clarify what is included as eligible equipment."

That was two years ago. If the Paymaster General had given an answer in 2004, she might have been able to prevent the two years of abuse—[Hon. Members: "Alleged abuse!"]—alleged abuse—that the Government are using as a justification for axing the HCI. Instead, she said that the Office of the e-Envoy

"will be monitoring take-up in the coming months. That information will demonstrate to us whether the £500 is reasonable, what type of equipment is being purchased and how wide take-up is."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 18 May 2004; c. 216–8.]

It is sad, therefore, that the Office of the e-Envoy was itself axed along with whatever evidence of abuse it may have found. The Government should have provided a definition of computer equipment back in 1999, and certainly when Ministers were pressed for one in 2004. A definition must be open to regular review.

iPods have been mentioned with some derision in debates, but the average iPod now has more memory than the average home computer did when the scheme was initiated in 1999. Furthermore, podcasting is increasingly being used as a business tool. That is why amendment No. 2 emphasises the need for industry and user consultation, with the aim of arriving at a workable, flexible definition that is not open to abuse.

The notion that people have been buying games consoles and iPods is as yet unproved, but I was interested to learn that "entertainment" was among the list of benefits that the DTI believed to stem from home computer ownership. It was mentioned in its 2004 guidelines, along with education, e-mail and e-government, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) pointed out earlier.

It seems always to have been envisaged that

"most new computers support the latest video game, DVDs and other popular multimedia formats."

Why the Government's new-found technological puritanism?

Before I end my speech, I want to refer to the lack of evidence and the solution proffered by amendment No. 18. In 2004, the Paymaster General said:

"Since the exemption was introduced, we have not had exact figures on the take-up for obvious deregulatory reasons."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 18 May 2004; c. 217.]

Conservative Members are all in favour of deregulation, but it is unfortunate that this single example of obvious deregulation should have had the inadvertent effect of undermining a successful IT initiative.

The Minister for Industry and the Regions, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Alun Michael), admitted in a recent parliamentary answer:

"I am unable to provide a statistical breakdown of how many individuals have participated in the Home Computing Initiative Scheme in each year since 1999, broken down or by region."

Instead, he said only that

"A recent estimation provided by the HCI Alliance (BT, Intel and Microsoft) indicates that over 500,000 units have been loaned under the Home Computer Initiative Scheme since 1999."—[Official Report, 25 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 989W.]

The Government's evidence base for axing the HCI seems to have been provided by the very organisation that is lobbying for its continuation. That is an absurdity. Perhaps the Minister will tell us where is the evidence, where was the consultation, and where is the need to scrap an IT project that has helped the lowest-paid people to improve their skills and prospects.

Mr. Gauke: I want to make four brief points about the proposal to abolish the HCI, which is perhaps symptomatic of the Government's approach to many forms of taxation.

First, I want to echo the point made forcefully by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff), in what I thought was an excellent speech, about the uncertainty created by constant tinkering with taxation regimes. If incentives are introduced, expanded five years later and abolished two years after that, there will always be the difficulty of businesses not being confident that they are working in a stable environment. Such a situation can impact on research and development, for example; indeed, it has had a considerable impact on productivity. This Government, and particularly this Chancellor, have a tendency to meddle and to tinker, and this is an example.

My next two points relate to the taxation of employees and employers in respect of home computers—an issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois)—which are treated as a benefit in kind. One consequence of abolishing the HCI is that the question again arises of how home computers are treated. They will not be considered as a benefit in kind where their personal use is not significant, and guidance will be provided on this issue. However, businesses will obviously have to police such usage carefully. They will have to issue guidance themselves and monitor employees to ensure that computers are not used for personal purposes. However, most work computers are to some extent used for personal purposes. I suspect that most people occasionally use computers at work for personal matters and for sending personal e-mails—that is what happens in the real world—and the same applies to the use of home computers. Of course, people are supposed to use computers to complete their tax returns, but that, too, is personal use. So the clause will impose a significant bureaucratic burden on business, which is often another consequence of Government policies.

As I said, the Government are going to introduce guidance, and I suspect that there will be a generous and fairly broad definition of what constitutes insignificant use. I am slightly worried, however, at the prospect of the law saying one thing and the guidance saying another—it is saying that people need not worry. My fear is that, instead of having a tightly defined law that people should obey, we will have a loosely defined law that people will obey only sometimes, depending on the guidance. That would not be an ideal arrangement.

Rob Marris: Surely it is up to a business to decide whether such use is significant. If it is, class 1 national insurance contributions would have to be paid. If it is not, it is a benefit in kind, on which tax is paid by the employee, not the employer.

Mr. Gauke: The employer, when providing such a facility to their employees, will be expected to provide some advice. As the hon. Gentleman says, national insurance contributions would have to be paid, and the employer would need to take a view on that point. A degree of monitoring would be required.

My fourth point relates to one that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) made with characteristic candour: the lack of consultation surrounding this proposal, which was rushed out without regard for the need to examine the various arguments. The Paymaster General says that there is concern about possible abuse, but why do we not look at this proposal closely and carefully? We have heard about how other countries deal with this issue—how one can have an HCI scheme without its being abused. My hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh and others referred to what I call the "Minnie the Moocher" argument: if the Paymaster General had looked at the scheme in Sweden, it would have given everything that she was needing. That did not happen, which was a great pity.

Dawn Primarolo: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Swedish scheme has been recommended for abolition, and for exactly the same reasons as we have abolished the HCI here?

Mr. Gauke: My understanding is that that scheme is in place. Indeed, we heard earlier that the Danish scheme was abolished and then brought back, because it was missed.

We have to ask why the HCI is being abolished. I suspect that the Treasury was looking to save a few hundred million pounds, and that the HCI caught the eye of someone there. That is a great pity, but perhaps there is also another reason. The Chancellor has been associated with various polices, such as the individual learning account. He was criticised for being very slow in identifying fraud and misuse of the ILA, and he resisted getting rid of it. I wonder whether the question of not allowing the HCI to continue was a sensitive issue for the Treasury. None the less, the Government's scrapping of that scheme was a panicky overreaction. There should have been consultation and we should have addressed the real concerns, but that has not happened.

8.15 pm

Mr. Dunne: I am grateful to you, Mr. O'Hara, for allowing me to contribute to this debate. This is a novel experience for me on two counts. This is the first time since joining this House that I have attended a debate in which the Government are insisting on scrapping a successful measure; in my experience, they usually seek to abandon failed initiatives that they have introduced during their tenure. To witness them abandoning a successful one is surprising, to say the least.

I am pleased that the Paymaster General has an opportunity today to defuse criticism of this penny-pinching, revenue-retaining measure by making a positive announcement on digital inclusion. In my experience, the Paymaster General is usually asked to defend the indefensible on the Chancellor's behalf, but today she is able to announce some good news. However, it is a classic new Labour move: on the one hand, we are debating a measure, the withdrawal of which will save the Treasury £300 million over three years; on the other, Labour is sweetening the pill with a £50 million new initiative, but it is merely a sleight of hand to try and distract attention from the bigger issue.

Having said that, I welcome the digital inclusion initiative and I should like to comment briefly on it, given that the Paymaster General introduced it into this debate. I hope that the new cross-departmental unit will address the severe shortcomings of the digital TV footprint. It is claimed that digital TV will reach 98.5 per cent. of the population. Given that the Paymaster General has taken an interest in this subject, I will send to her and to whoever is responsible for running the new unit a map that the Shropshire Star helpfully provided. It shows the area along the Welsh marches that would be excluded from digital TV coverage. That area includes most of the western half of my constituency and all the area classified as an area of outstanding natural beauty, which amounts to about 80 per cent. of south Shropshire district. I look forward to hearing about the measures that this magnificent new unit will implement to provide coverage for my constituents.

I want to speak to amendment No. 2 to clause 61. The home computing initiative has encouraged home-working, and before I illustrate this issue with some comments about my constituents, I want briefly to highlight some of the non-financial benefits that derive from home working of which the Paymaster General may not be aware. BT, one of the largest employers in the country, has undertaken research among its work force. It states:

"People working from home are 7 per cent. happier than their office-based colleagues".

So there is a happiness quotient to this issue. The research also noted that there is among such people, on account of BT's home-working policy. These non-financial but none the less important factors are being put at risk by this penny-pinching Government measure. There are 8 million people working from home, who—

"20 per cent. less absenteeism than the national average"

Dawn Primarolo: People working from home are not affected by this measure. The hon. Gentleman is speaking to an amendment that has not been selected and about a subject that we are not debating.

Mr. Dunne: As I said earlier, I am supporting my Front-Bench colleagues' amendment to clause 61, which we are debating and which is about home computing.

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. Edward O'Hara): Order. I must rule from the Chair that the Paymaster General is correct: amendment No. 2 has not been selected.

Mr. Dunne: I stand corrected, Mr. O'Hara, and I am grateful for that clarification.

On the general subject of home computing and the amendments that have been selected, I want to draw to the attention—

The Temporary Chairman: Order. According to my information, no amendments to clause 61 have been selected.

Mr. Dunne: I am grateful again, Mr. O'Hara, for making that clear. I shall therefore explain very briefly why the Government's proposals are so important to me and my constituents.

Shropshire was the home of the first industrial revolution, and it is also the home of the current home working revolution. I represent the southern part of the county and am delighted to say that it is second only to the Isles of Scilly—and the House will not be surprised that there is significant amount of home working there—in terms of the number of home workers per head of the population. In my area, 15 per cent. of self-employed people now work from home.

Dawn Primarolo: What is the relevance of those figures?

Mr. Dunne: The Minister is questioning the relevance of those figures—

Mr. Ivan Lewis: What is the relevance of the whole speech?

Mr. Dunne: The relevance is that home working is put at risk by the Government's proposal to scrap the home computing initiative, which has meant that people, especially in rural areas, now have improved access to broadband, for example. It has also improved access to work for those people in deprived rural areas who lack public transport and job opportunities. Even people with their own transport have to travel a long way to work in such areas.

Rob Marris: At the risk of detaining the House, will the hon. Gentleman say more about his statistics? Labour Members usually understand the term "home working" to mean the gross exploitation of labour, such as paying people piece rates to pack Christmas crackers at home. It is not taken to mean the wonderful world of telecommuting by computer.

Mr. Dunne: I shall give the House a specific example of the sort of effective and high-tech home working that goes on in my constituency and across the country. A company called Premier Medical processes insurance policy claims, and about half of its staff work from home. The hon. Gentleman is a neighbour of mine and, if he is interested, I should be delighted to take him to meet the magnificent managers who have relocated the business to my area from the south-east.

I hope that the Paymaster General will explain why the Government want to scrap an initiative that is working so well.

Mr. Francois: It falls to me sum up this interesting and sometimes vigorous debate on the future of the home computing initiative and clause 61. A number of contributions were made and I am sorry that time constraints mean that I cannot refer to all of them individually, but I shall attempt at least to genuflect to some where I can.

I welcome the Paymaster General's commitment that HMRC, in consultation with industry, will issue guidelines to define what constitutes a "not significant" use of a computer. We have pressed the Government on that quite hard over the past week. We tabled amendments on the subject, and I am pleased that the Government have listened to us and agreed to produce a definition. I hope that it will remove doubt, but I repeat that it would be better to delete clause 61 from the Bill, so that the problem would not arise in the first place.

First, in her opening speech the Paymaster General did not provide a convincing rationale for abolishing the scheme. She talked vaguely about a few websites that provide examples of inappropriate equipment, but was unable to quantify that or to put clear figures on the extent of the abuse. If the Government's argument is based on the claim that abuse has been widespread, I should have expected the right hon. Lady to have been able to give firmer examples.

Secondly, we have argued that the scheme could be saved by being more tightly defined. The abuse that the Government claim is going on could be prevented if they were to produce an inclusive list of the products that would continue to qualify, and an exclusive list of those that would not. We have referred to the other countries that have done exactly that, and I point out to the Paymaster General that although a debate is taking place in Sweden about whether the scheme there should continue, it is still in force and is likely to remain so. It is incorrect to say that the Swedes have decided to scrap it: they are debating what to do.

Peter Luff: My understanding is exactly the same as my hon. Friend's. I left the Chamber to check what was happening in Sweden, and was told by a person in that country that the scheme is not going to be scrapped. If the Paymaster General has contradictory information, she should share it with the House.

Mr. Francois: I agree with my hon. Friend, the Chairman of the Trade and Industry Committee. We have used Sweden as a specific and empirical example of how guidelines could be produced to allow the scheme to survive, were the Government so minded. The problem is not one of definition; it is that the Government wants the money.

Thirdly, the Treasury's own regulatory impact assessment confirms that a more tightly defined scheme could be continued at a reduced cost to the taxpayer. Option 2 of the Treasury's RIA is entitled "Refocus the Exemptions"—exactly what we have argued. The Treasury estimates that a refocused scheme would cost £190 million a year to 2010–11, compared with the £370 million a year that the scheme would cost were it to continue unaltered. I refer the Paymaster General to the table printed below paragraph 76 of the RIA.

It is therefore possible to refocus the scheme, keep it alive and save all its benefits—and save money for the taxpayer in the process. That has to be a win-win proposition and the House would be wise to adopt it. Arguments in the scheme's defence have been made by the CBI and the TUC, other Government Departments such as the DTI, employers that have implemented it at the Government's behest, companies that were set up to support it and the people who are benefiting. However, given the attitude exhibited by the Paymaster General and the other Labour Members who have contributed to the debate, I fear that the Government have closed their ears and minds to them all. To put it bluntly, they are minded to take the money instead.

This is a poor decision. It will be detrimental to our long-term competitiveness in the 21st century, not least in respect of countries such as China and India. Moreover, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) noted, the next time that the Government launch a scheme to promote information technology and look to business and the unions to support it, who on earth will believe them? Effectively, they are canning this scheme after only two years of operation. How will major multinationals looking to invest in IT projects and facilities in this country view that?

[Mr. Francois]

We all know what has happened—a decision was taken just before the Budget to take the money. Under pressure, the Government have been desperately scrabbling around for a way to justify that decision. This evening, they have suddenly come up with the digital inclusion team as a fig leaf that they hope will do just that. The Government's proposal marks a sorry decision, so I genuinely make one last plea to the Committee, including the Labour Members who have expressed reservations about the measure: join us in the Lobby and save the home computing initiative from that awful, mistaken proposal. I move that clause 61 be deleted from the Bill—

The Temporary Chairman: Order. The Chairman puts motions at the appropriate time.

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) made a nice try, Mr. O'Hara, but he was not fast enough.

I think that it would help the Committee if we reflected on the introduction of the regime, its performance and the current position, to clear up some of the misunderstandings.

I assure the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) that no amendments have been selected. If he looks at the annunciator screen, he will see that it says, "Clause 61 stand part". There has been no attempt to amend the clause, which would be almost impossible due to the definitional problems. Furthermore, the clause has nothing to do with home working, so I shall park all those points.

8.30 pm

At the time of the 1999 Budget, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said:

> "We hope this new measure will encourage business to loan computers to their employees and that it will be as successful as a similar scheme developed in Sweden . . . There are real benefits to business, employees and the wider community from increasing access to computers."

The digital strategy launched in April 2004 was assessed by the Prime Minister's strategy unit, with a foreword by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The assessment stated:

> "The conclusions in this report will be implemented by government and will play a crucial role in improving the cohesion of our society, the wealth of our economy and the quality of the life of our people."

The report was reflecting on the fact that the home computing initiative was not sufficiently targeted to help the low paid, the unemployed and the excluded.

The HCI was underpinned by a tax exemption, which can be found at section 320 of the Income Tax (Earnings and Pensions) Act 2003. It allowed an employer to lend a computer to an employee for private use, tax free. If an agreement between the employer and the employee was in effect a hire purchase agreement, the tax exemption did not apply and any direction issued by the Office of Fair Trading would not cover it. That means that the tax exemption does not apply where the computer equipment has been bought, whether for a mother or otherwise. That is quite clear.

As Members have pointed out, the HCI was modelled on a Swedish scheme introduced to increase home computer ownership. The evidence from Sweden shows that between 1996 and 2001 home computer penetration rose by 29 per cent. to 56 per cent., a compound annual growth rate of about 14 per cent. However, over the same period, UK household penetration increased from 27 per cent. to 44 per cent., a compound annual growth rate equivalent to 12 per cent. So the UK achieved a comparable rate of growth in home computer take-up when the HCI was barely used, demonstrating that the HCI itself has not had a strong impact. I am not saying that it has not helped, but other issues have been involved, such as competition and liberalisation.

With regard to other international comparisons, a similar HCI scheme was introduced in the Netherlands but it was scrapped several months ago, citing the same sort of reasons as those in the UK. In Sweden, the Agency for Public Management, which is responsible for efficient public administration and promoting e-government, recommended abolishing the scheme in August 2005, as its positive effects had declined while its costs remained high. The Swedish Finance Minister is considering action at present.

Mr. Francois: Where is the evidence?

Dawn Primarolo: I am putting the evidence to the Committee.

In the Netherlands and in Sweden, whatever the Finance Ministers decide to do, as in the UK, there have been rising costs, poor targets and a lack of impact on the important areas that the Committee has identified.

The hon. Gentleman asked why the Government did not target misuse of the scheme. That is a bit rich, as the Conservatives did not manage to get any of their amendments selected, for precisely the reason that we constantly give: it is extremely difficult to draft legislation to cover certain types of equipment while excluding others, because the technology is changing.

The hon. Member for Rayleigh said, "Well let's do it once a year." Once a year, he wants a completely new statement that would be out of date already, excluding equipment that would not otherwise have been included in the system. Opposition Members say that the scheme should be restricted—perhaps to basic rate taxpayers or someone else—while complaining about administrative burdens and the scheme's complexities. So, the Government had to take a decision. If the scheme is poorly targeted and abused and if we cannot target it sensibly, the Government must determine the best way to proceed, and the best way to proceed is the way that the Government have said: through our digital strategy and the announcements that I have made today.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) asked, "Why change overnight?" We had problems in the system, which I will come to, and we could not find a way to squeeze them out of the system, and we needed to ensure that we refocused. I cannot see how that could have been done in any other way. When the scheme was introduced in 1999, it was made clear that it would be kept under review. When the digital strategy came out, it was made clear that that review was ongoing, particularly in respect of targeting. There can be no doubt in any quarter that the Government were considering this, although I accept that some people do not like the outcome.

Peter Luff: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Dawn Primarolo: No, it has been a very long debate.

Peter Luff: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Dawn Primarolo: No, I should like to complete—

Peter Luff: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Dawn Primarolo: No, I do not wish to give way.

It has now been suggested—I can only suggest that it is wilful misinterpretation of the proposed changes—that the removal of the tax exemption in section 320 of the ITEPA 2003 is somehow undermined where an employer provides computer equipment solely for work purposes and that, where any private use is not significant, no tax charge will arise. That was the case before 1999, and it is the case now. Employers need to work under that system; they have worked under it in the past. The idea that the Opposition have wrung a concession out of the Government is preposterous. All the Government have said is that employers must operate under the same rules as applied in 1999, and that if they require guidance and they want to discuss it we are happy to do so—but the idea that this is something new is just ridiculous.

The hon. Member for Rayleigh referred to the regulatory impact assessment and says that it analysed the impact of removing the tax exemptions, but he should read a bit further because it then refers to mobile phones and computers. It summarised the evidence of misuse, but it also made it clear that that was only one of the reasons on which the decision was based. There was a lack of focus, poor targeting, rising costs and abuse.

Let us deal with the abuse. I am sorry that I did not take longer in introducing the clause, by going through the types of things that are now being offered. We have got PCs, which will be "a delight for intense gamers and the users of high-performance visual application."

We have then got option 7—I will not embarrass the taxpayer by saying who is offering such schemes—that says:

"This is the complete home entertainment package. This is an enhancement."

Then, having made it clear that this is about what is on loan to employees—this comes to the point about take-up—one of the websites very helpfully asks:

"What happens at the end of the scheme?"— that is, comes to the end of the negotiated settlement—and it says,

"You may be able to start a new scheme with a more up to date computer."

So people who have already got a computer will get another one, but the scheme is supposed to be about take-up by the low paid and the excluded.

The website then says:

"Can I get more than one computer?"

That is not the purpose of the scheme, but the website goes further. I really do not know how this will be used: apparently, people can have as part of their package a massage ball. I have not figured out, because I do not have one, exactly how that is plugged into the computer and is part of the HCI—and I do not want to hear any rude comments—but I am sure that the hon. Member for Rayleigh might prefer to take up the mug warmer option in the HCI, or perhaps he would like to go further.

Peter Luff: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Dawn Primarolo: Not at the moment, because the hon. Gentleman asked me for the evidence and then ridiculed me when I did not provide it. I am going on to give it.

Perhaps the home cinema package is helping the excluded—or iPods, which are great, but are hardly about ensuring the take-up of information and communications technology initiatives by the socially excluded. I freely admit that I made a mistake in being much too kind to the hon. Gentleman. I referred to websites and said that I would let him have details. I should have said that if he looks at the sites, he will see that about 75 per cent. show signs of offering leisure equipment outside of the intended exemption.

What have the Government done? My hon. Friends the Members for North Swindon (Mr. Wills), for North Durham (Mr. Jones) and for Wolverhampton, South-West referred to that. We have refocused on the low paid and the unemployed, and on making sure that we truly have a strategy that reaches the parts that are excluded from information technology.

When removing any tax relief, the Government have not only to consider its popularity, but whether it is still meeting its aims and is not imposing an unfair burden on the taxpayer population as a whole. The tax exemption was a popular scheme and has given many employees access to home computers since 1999, but it does nothing to help those groups who are the most technologically excluded—those on the minimum wage, those not in employment and the elderly. That is what the Government are moving to do and that is why they are removing the HCI exemption. I commend the clause to the House.

Question put, That the clause stand part of the Bill:—

Clause 61 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 26

ABOLITION OF CORPORATION TAX STARTING RATE AND NON-CORPORATE DISTRIBUTION RATE

Julia Goldsworthy: I beg to move amendment No. 27, in page 26, line 19 [Vol I], at end insert—

"( ) At the end of section 8 of ICTA there is inserted—

"(3A) Notwithstanding the provisions of this section—

(a) corporation tax shall not be charged on the profits of a company where the profits of the company for any accounting period in question do not exceed a limit of £500;

(b) where an accounting period is shorter than 12 months that £500 limit shall be reduced in proportion to the reduction in accounting period; and

(c) where a company has associated companies, that £500 limit shall be reduced in proportion to the number of associates during the accounting period.".".

The amendment was tabled because of concerns that many small clubs and societies will once again have to pay corporation tax on very small amounts of income as a result of the abolition of the nil rate corporation tax band, which I broadly support. Such income arises from the negligible amount of interest arising from the associated costs of dealing with tax affairs. As many as 64,000 small clubs or associations could be affected, and the compliance costs for taxpayers and HMRC are unlikely to be outweighed by any tax raised. Even if HMRC does not expend any effort in undertaking to pursue small clubs and societies for tax, the clubs themselves are technically required to provide that information, and the most responsible among them will take on that burden. They may even believe that they need to seek new or differently skilled officers, especially given the substantial coverage of the frequent changes to small business tax in the past six years. The amendment would help to prevent such a burden from being imposed once again on many small societies, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): I support the amendment, and I should like to match the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) in brevity. Professional bodies have raised their concerns about the matter with Revenue and Customs, which has expressed a willingness to tackle it with a concession. However, there is anxiety that that concession may not have the legal standing that it had had prior to the Wilkinson case. The Opposition would therefore welcome confirmation that the concession stands and has legal weight, thus preventing an undue burden falling on small clubs and associations.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): This has been a useful, well-targeted and focused debate. The amendment is drafted rather widely, but I commend the hon. Members for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) and for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) on focusing their contributions tightly on concerns about clubs and societies, thus reflecting representations from the Institute for Chartered Accountants. However, there is no need for an amendment to achieve the result desired by the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne.

For many years, the Inland Revenue and, latterly, HMRC have not sought corporation tax returns from clubs and unincorporated associations with very small tax liabilities. That practice was established before the introduction of the starting rate of corporation tax, and it will not be affected by the changes in clause 26. Any club or society that is unclear about its tax position should ask its local HMRC office for advice. Clubs and unincorporated associations with larger profits may wish to consider whether they are eligible for the generous tax reliefs resulting from Government changes to existing schemes for grassroots clubs that are genuinely accessible to all under community and amateur sports clubs provisions.

9 pm

The amendment would involve unnecessary costs and complexities, so I hope that the hon. Lady will feel able to withdraw it. The purpose that she mentioned and the hon. Member for Fareham repeated is not being sought. Sensible practices are already in force within HMRC to ensure that the corporation tax regime is applied reasonably in respect of clubs and unincorporated associations. Going further down the path suggested by the amendment, and particularly building it into legislation, would be counter-productive. I hope that the hon. Lady will withdraw the amendment, so that the House can move on to the more substantive questions in the clause stand part debate.

Julia Goldsworthy: I am slightly reassured by the Minister's remarks. It would be preferable for HMRC to deal with the problem through concession and, historically, that would be the most appropriate course. However, that might not be possible formally because of the House of Lords decision in the Wilkinson case of 2005, which cast doubt on the extent of HMRC's discretionary powers not to apply the strict letter of the law in appropriate circumstances.

Without HMRC being able to put its policy into effect with a public pronouncement about the position of clubs and societies, it will nevertheless have to deal with their inquiries. With its ability to deal with those concessions in doubt, I thought that the best way to bring the matter to the Committee's attention was through my amendment. I shall not seek to divide the Committee on this occasion, but I would ask the Minister to look into ways of ensuring that small societies are not adversely affected by the extra administrative burden that the reintroduction of the zero rate will impose.

In conclusion, I request that the Government consult urgently the small clubs and societies affected by the amendment and ensure that they are properly informed of their responsibilities. I also request that the Government undertake to tackle the problem of concessions, as exposed by the Wilkinson case. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

John Healey: Clause 26 essentially introduces schedule 14. Together, the effect is to replace the starting rate of corporation tax and the non-corporate distribution rate with a single small companies rate, which is currently set at 19 per cent.

There are three important aspects of the background to the provisions, which the Committee may wish to consider in deciding whether the clause should stand part of the Bill. First, there are the reasons why the Government introduced the starting rate of corporation tax. Secondly, we had a wide-ranging debate with business and its representatives about the proper form of taxation for small businesses. Thirdly, responses were made to our announcement last December in the pre-Budget report that, as a result of those discussions, we had decided to remove the non-corporate distribution rate and starting rates of corporation tax.

The Government have consistently supported business and enterprise. We have provided a tax regime with incentives for individuals to invest not just for their own future, but for the wider prosperity of Britain. We have also provided incentives to encourage business to expand and grow. We introduced the starting rate of corporation tax at 10 per cent. in the year 2000 and then reduced it to 0 per cent. in 2002 in order to provide the means for small companies to reinvest their profits in their business.

As the Committee knows, we always keep the tax system and its operation under close review. We did so in respect of this particular matter, as we undertook to do when we introduced the measure. We saw that the benefits of incorporation and being able to access the starting rate were being used by some small businesses not as a step to growth, but simply as a vehicle to reduce their tax and national insurance contributions liability, while continuing to trade in exactly the same way as before, drawing profits in the form of dividends and not reinvesting them in the business. We therefore introduced the non-corporate distribution rate in 2004 to ensure that the benefits of the starting rate remained focused on companies that were retaining their profits for growth.

We said at the time that the problem of tax-motivated incorporation was part of a wider issue and that the NCDR was not the end of the matter, but that we would consider the long-term strategic issues raised by these developments, to ensure that the tax system adequately reflects the realities of today's changing labour market and business environment. In the pre-Budget report in 2004 we published a discussion paper and invited views from, among others, smaller firms and their advisers on these wider issues.

The responses ranged almost as widely as the organisations. One thing is clear; there is no single fix that will level the field between all small businesses, irrespective of legal form. Although there was no consensus about the specific changes that they wanted, one overriding feature of the responses from all quarters was a strong preference for simplicity over approaches that risked introducing further complexity. Responding directly to the debate and to our own analysis of the situation, we announced in the pre-Budget report in 2005 that we would replace the starting rate and the non-corporate distribution rate with a single small companies rate. That is what clause 26 achieves.

We wanted to refocus the way that we provide incentives for small firms that invest and grow. We announced that the first year capital allowances for small businesses would be increased for the year beginning April 2006 to 50 per cent., and that the turnover threshold for the VAT annual accounting scheme would be increased to £1.35 million; doubled, in effect. We also announced that we would look to increase the threshold for the VAT cash accounting scheme to a similar threshold, pending state aids clearance from the European Commission. Rather than favouring the incorporated small business, these measures will assist the incorporated as well as the unincorporated small business.

About 4.2 million businesses are eligible to benefit from the increase in first-year allowances, 1.08 million small businesses are eligible to benefit from the increased threshold of the VAT annual accounting scheme, and about 733,000 businesses are eligible to benefit from the increase in the threshold for the VAT cash accounting scheme, if we can put it in place pending state aids clearance.

That move in December was welcomed by business. In response to the pre-Budget report, the Federation of Small Businesses commented:

"The replacement of the zero rate of corporation tax by increased capital allowances for small business was welcome. This will reduce differences in the taxation of small business, depending on how they are organised";

precisely the aim of the move. Furthermore, there is a clear ongoing desire and commitment on the part of businesses and their representative organisations to continue to work with us on the longer-term future of taxation for small business.

In the Budget in March we therefore stated that we continue to believe that all individuals and businesses must pay their fair share of national insurance contributions and tax, irrespective of legal form. We also said that we would continue to review the tax and NI systems to ensure that that was the case, and that we would produce proposals for discussion consistent with a set of principles that include simplicity for compliant businesses, support for businesses in their aspirations to grow, and maintaining the attractiveness of the UK as a business location. These are the principles that underpin the provisions in clause 26. I commend the clause and the principles to the House.

Mr. Hoban: I am grateful for the opportunity to debate clause 26. The Financial Secretary briefly discussed the history of the measure, and I want to spend a little more time on that, because I think it important to understand why we are where we are. The current situation is not a surprise, because there were indications along the way that it would happen. In the Finance Bill, the Government are taking more than £800 million out of small businesses over the next three years with scant compensation for the additional costs that those businesses must bear at a time when small businesses are facing higher burdens through not only tax but regulation.

The Chancellor introduced the measure to stimulate business but later restricted it with complex legislation around the non-corporate distribution rate, which added to the complexity of the system. He then announced the measure's abolition, saying that it was a bold move to simplify the system, but he was simplifying his own handiwork and the damage that he had created.

As the Financial Secretary has said, the corporation tax starting rate was introduced by the Chancellor at 10 per cent. on profits up to £10,000. In his 1999 Budget speech, the Chancellor said:

"I want to create an even lower rate, which will give new incentives for men and women to start their own businesses and work their way up ... The legislation will ensure that the beneficiaries are genuinely those who take risks. And 85 per cent. of the firms gaining from the 10p tax rate will have fewer than 10 employees—the very firms that we most want to see grow; the very firms whose growth will create the greatest number of new jobs."—[Official Report, 9 March 1999; Vol. 327, c. 177.]

The measure was clearly targeted to stimulate business. To reinforce its impact, the Chancellor reduced the starting rate from 10 per cent. to 1 per cent. in his 2002 Budget. Hon. Members may remember that that was also the Budget in which he increased national insurance contributions, so perhaps the reduction was seen as compensation for small businesses for the increase in national insurance.

When we debated those changes in Committee and on the Floor of the House, hon. Members identified some of the risks. In 2002, we supported the introduction of the zero rate, and we oppose its being scrapped in the Finance Bill. We welcomed the relief that it provided for small businesses and object to the burdens that it places on them today. We want to support our small businesses, not attack them when they feel vulnerable because of increased regulation and red tape.

I want to highlight three issues: the bias towards incorporation created by the measure; the cost of the zero rate against the money that the measure will save; and the economic benefit accruing from the zero rate. It was clear in 2002 that there would be an incentive for unincorporated businesses to become limited companies. Indeed, I made that point in Standing Committee in 2002, where I pointed out the concern among unincorporated businesses about the fiscal advantage of incorporation:

"Many unincorporated businesses feel that the Government are trying to drive them towards incorporation. They do not wish to incur the additional costs of incorporation, but the tax regime is such that they feel almost obliged to do so because if they did not, they would be significantly worse off."—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, 16 May 2002; c. 104.]

Both the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey), who served on that Committee and the Institute for Fiscal Studies have commented on that matter.

In Committee, the Paymaster General chose to dismiss the views of not only a new Back Bencher but the Institute for Fiscal Studies. She highlighted incentives for unincorporated businesses and attempted to explain why they should not automatically seek to take up incorporation:

"It is not a question of the Government making companies choose between incorporation or unincorporation ... but of demonstrating clearly the steps to help businesses".—[Official Report, 30 April 2002; Vol. 404, c. 912.]

Given the strength of those incentives, it is remarkable that any business embarked on the route that this year's Red Book described as "tackling tax motivated incorporation", since the attractions, according to the Paymaster General, of the other support for business were such that they should not feel the need to be incorporated. The Government highlighted the cost of the zero rate of corporation tax. That was the subject of the report that the IFS produced during the consideration of the Finance Bill 2002. The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton said of that report:

"Through its analysis of the survey on personal incomes 1998–9, it says that 1.2 million self-employed people each stand to gain in excess of £500."

[Mr. Hoban]

He said that the IFS calculated that

"the cost would be £1.2 billion, compared with the highest possible figure from the Government so far of £450 million."—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, 16 May 2002; c. 108.]

Typically, the Paymaster General was trenchant in her remarks, batting away the IFS, saying:

"Sometimes its figures are nearly right and sometimes they are spectacularly wrong."

She went on:

"The Government stand by their estimates in the Red Book of costs rising to £450 million."—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, 16 May 2002; c. 114–115.]

On that occasion, the Paymaster General was right, as it was spectacularly wrong. The Red Book shows that the saving to Government in 2008–09 through scrapping the zero rate of corporation tax—£530 million—is not that dissimilar from the highest cost that she predicted in those debates back in 2002.

The other issue that we debated then concerned the economic benefits and what would happen as a consequence of the zero rate being introduced. Again, the Paymaster General mounted a robust defence:

"We believe that cutting corporation tax is an effective way of targeting support at small and growing businesses. It also encourages would-be entrepreneurs to set up new companies."

She heralded the measure as

"a targeted reduction in tax to help small and new companies thrive and grow."—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, 16 May 2002; c. 114.]

It is rather difficult, four years later, to see why the Paymaster General and the Treasury have deviated from their robust line of defence of the zero rate of corporation tax. The measure went through after detailed and robust scrutiny on both sides of the House. The then Member for Arundel and South Downs tried to make amendments to extend some of the benefits for incorporated companies to unincorporated companies, but the Paymaster General's remarks show that she vigorously defended of the attractiveness of remaining an unincorporated business.

The Treasury then started to get cold feet. Having looked again, it introduced the non-corporate distribution rate. By the time of the 2003 pre-Budget report, it was clear that many businesses had incorporated, which was described as "avoidance" by the Revenue. In the PBR speech, the Chancellor talked about the need to ensure that small companies paid the right amount of tax. Following those remarks, in the Finance Bill 2004, we saw the introduction of the non-corporate distribution rate, which was to ensure that where dividends were paid to shareholders, they were taxed at 19 per cent. rather than 0 per cent. But the mechanics of the NCDR impose differential rates of corporation tax between distributed and non-distributed profits. That is complicated to manage and added to the complexity of the tax system.

Despite all that, the Government threatened further complexity to try to tighten the system. It is no surprise that most respondents to the PBR consultation said that they favoured simplification over options that risked additional complexity. But who created the additional complexity? It was the Chancellor, who is trying to unpick the problems that he himself has created.

9:15 pm

The tax relief granted to stimulate enterprise was restricted by increasing the complexity of the tax code, and then scrapped to reduce the complexity of the tax system, with little by way of compensation to stimulate small businesses. It is therefore not surprising that many business groups have been hostile to the change. The Financial Secretary prayed in aid the Federation of Small Businesses. At the time of the pre-Budget report, the Confederation of British Industry stated:

"While the CBI support simplification of the corporation tax structure, this measure will mean that companies with profits of less than £50,000 per year could face a tax increase".

Bill Midgley, president of the British Chambers of Commerce, commented that "we have concerns that the removal of the 0 per cent. starting rate of corporation tax will harm the growth of some of the smallest firms."

Let us remember what the Paymaster General said in 2002:

"The measure is a targeted reduction in tax to help small and new companies thrive and grow."—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, 16 May 2002; c. 114.]

Four years later, the Government are introducing measures that the president of the British Chambers of Commerce believed would harm the growth of some of the smallest firms.

After the Budget, Nick Goulding, chief executive of the Forum of Private Business, commented:

"Small businesses operating on tight profit margins will have found this tax break extremely useful. Business that incorporated to take advantage of this tax break now find they have all the bureaucracy and costs of incorporation and no financial advantage. How can businesses plan effectively when the Chancellor keeps changing his mind?"

Why did the Chancellor start to unpick that valuable tax relief, on which small businesses relied? The Red Book tells the whole story. The measure is planned to raise £870 million for the Exchequer in only three years. The small businesses that depend on such tax breaks are confronted with an increasing burden of regulation and will stump up an extra £870 million for the Treasury.

It is worth remembering, in the context of the measures announced in either the 2005 pre-Budget report or this year's Budget that, in the first full year in which the provision takes effect, in 2008–09, the tax increase is the second highest in raking in revenue for the Treasury. It is second only to the huge hike in tax revenues from the oil industry. So much for the rhetoric of helping small businesses. They are bailing out the Government and trying to plug the Government's black hole.

Small companies will end up paying an extra £1,900 tax, discouraging them from further growth and from expanding. In 1999, the Chancellor said:

"I want to do more. I want to create an even lower rate, which will give incentives for men and women to start their own businesses and work their way up."—[Official Report, 9 March 1999; Vol. 327, c. 177.]

In 2002, the Paymaster General said:

"We believe that cutting corporation tax is an effective way of targeting support at small and growing businesses. It also encourages would-be entrepreneurs to set up new companies."—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, 16 May 2002; c. 114.]

The decision to scrap that lower rate, which was designed to promote enterprise and small business, tells the business community everything that it needs to know about the Chancellor. When the chips are down, he raises taxes from them. They are no more immune from the Chancellor's grab to increase tax revenues than any other sector of the economy.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): I agree with most of what the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) said. We all agree that small businesses are our genuine potential for the future. The Government and perhaps previous Governments have gone wrong in not genuinely enabling small businesses to grow in the way we all want them to. Plenty of new businesses have started up but plenty have regrettably failed relatively early. Tax plays a significant part in that.

Governments in recent times have attempted to change tax rates and the way in which they support small business. We have all largely tried to support the Government's intentions. However, although we are creating small businesses, we do not sustain them for a reasonable period so that they can grow into medium-sized businesses. Far too many fail and far too many are swallowed up by larger competitors. The nurture and support that small business needs to provide the strong economy that we want has not happened. Perhaps it is indicative that tax regimes have changed and we have not got the stability for people to plan properly. Anyone who has started a small business will recognise that the first three to five years are the toughest time. The stability of the taxes that they have to pay is extremely important if they are to plan for the growth that they need. While we applaud the simplicity, we must implore the Treasury to provide stability as well.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman makes a good point about the importance of stability supporting the growth of small businesses. Does he agree that the instability in the macro-economy, the rise in interest rates and the recession of the late 1980s did far more to damage small businesses than any changes in taxation that have taken place in the past 10 or 20 years?

Mr. Breed: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely correct. I was engaged in banking at that time, and it was one of the most difficult periods for any bank to support small businesses—let alone large ones—because of the huge effect of high interest rates. This was not only because of the amount of interest that the businesses were paying to the banks, but because of the effect that that had on underlying security. We therefore had the double whammy of a decrease in security and an increase in borrowing. That was the main contributor to the way in which the economy died. I agree that stability in the economy and stability in the ability to plan are essential.

Whatever we now have in this regime, the loss of the zero rate will certainly increase the tax bill of many small businesses. If that is countered by the increase in the first year's capital allowances, that will make a difference to the growth of those businesses, but they need to be able to rely on that. When they make an investment in plant, machinery or business premises, they need to be able to guarantee that the tax regime will be stable and predictable for the next three to five years. While the Government's motives were correct, the way in which they implemented the measures have perhaps been found not to be. The change in the VAT regime will also be helpful to many small businesses. Increasing the threshold will help their cash flows.

If we really want small businesses to be the engine room of the economy, we must provide a stable tax regime and appropriate planning, as well as more clarification on research and development grants. We must also ensure that not so many businesses fail. Banks play an important part in helping businesses to get over the inevitable difficulties that they face. I regret that far too many banks do not provide adequate support over the longer term, and we see far too many businesses failing. We want to see businesses being set up, and continuing. That requires support and planning not only from the Government but from other bodies.

I want to consider the use of the term "fair and appropriate". I do not know what a fair and appropriate contribution to tax is for a business, but it will certainly change over a business's lifetime. Many businesses will find it easier to sustain a fair and appropriate contribution once they have strength and stability. If we try to tax them too early in their lives or submit them to too high a burden of regulation, they will fail and we will get no revenue from them. We need an appropriate tax regime that recognises the difficulties faced by a small business at different stages of its cycle. That would be fair and appropriate, but I am not certain that this particular small business tax regime will achieve it. However, that is what we must aim for, otherwise we will not get a fair and appropriate tax contribution from businesses. There would be far too many businesses starting and failing.

Stewart Hosie: I considered this matter at the time of the Bill's Second Reading, and spoke to representatives of the Federation of Small Businesses about it. They advised me that, when the zero per cent. rate was introduced, the number of FSB members that incorporated moved from 27 to 37 per cent., and that it has stayed broadly constant at 38 per cent. since then. Yet in the Red Book, and throughout these debates, this measure has been described as one that tackles tax-motivated incorporation. However, there does not appear to have been a significant shift in the number of FSB members that have incorporated in the past few years.

I also note that, in 2007–08 and 2008–09, that will bring the Government a yield of some £920 million—£530 million in 2008–09 alone. Can the Treasury team tell the House how many businesses making a profit of less than £10,000 will be affected and start paying tax at 19 per cent., and how many larger ones will do so? As the provisions are described as tackling tax-motivated incorporation, how many of those businesses, which will now pay but did not do so previously, does the Treasury believe incorporated in the first place to avoid paying tax?

9.30 pm

Mr. Newmark: Saying that the Chancellor has executed a U-turn on the nil rate band of corporation tax is not entirely accurate; it is more like a three-point turn. I am heartened that the Chief Secretary has had a damascene conversion and has come to believe in the value of simplicity, but that progress is bought at a price.

[Mr. Newmark]

Despite being told at every stage that the nil rate band was open to exploitation, the Government pressed ahead with it in 2002. In 2004, there was wide recognition that the fear of exploitation had been realised. The Government had the opportunity at that point to choose the path of simplicity or the path of greater complexity. There are no prizes for guessing which choice prevailed. However, with the choice having been made to introduce the non-corporate distribution rate, small businesses should not be subjected to yet another change in the corporation tax rules. Stability and predictability sit alongside simplicity as the cardinal virtues of the tax code.

Our suggested amendment had a very modest objective—to guarantee that the interests of those businesses that were lured into incorporation in 2002 were not further prejudiced by yet another change in the rules. It would have prevented the "gift horse" of 2002 from being remembered instead as the Trojan horse of 2002. In 2002, the then shadow Chief Secretary said:

"I cannot believe that the Government want every small, sole trader business to incorporate itself. If nothing else, there would be the potential loss of revenue"

That sensible warning provoked a little reflection before the Paymaster General concluded:

"I hope that I am right."—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, 16 May 2002; c. 102,116.]

Ed Balls: If we took the hon. Gentleman's advice and did not make the Government's proposed change, and instead stuck with the status quo, would that mean that the tax system was more or less complex?

Mr. Ivan Lewis: What does it say there?

Mr. Newmark: It says nothing here, actually. [Laughter.] What individual businesses, particularly small businesses, want is consistency and simplicity. Your question relates to the complexity of the tax code, and no doubt your proposed system would be more complex—

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am proposing nothing.

Mr. Newmark: You are absolutely correct, Sir Alan. It is the hon. Member for Normanton (Ed Balls) who has an idiotic proposal.

In 2004, the Paymaster General was a little more certain when she said:

"The deliberate and cumulative aim is to underpin all the measures that the Government have taken to encourage businesses to grow and to be more enterprising and productive in the medium and long term and not to operate year by year by playing around with the tax system."—[Official Report, 27 April 2004; Vol. 420, c. 846.]

What is deliberate and cumulative about clause 26? The Paymaster General had an opportunity in 2004 to admit that the zero rate of corporation tax was not viable. Instead, the regulatory impact assessment to which she put her name insisted that the abolition of the nil rate band

"would be the most straightforward option. However, it would run counter to the Government's aim of maintaining low rates of corporation tax to encourage growth and enterprise."

On Report, she reiterated that sentiment for those few Members of the House who neglect to read regulatory impact assessments by affirming:

"I fail to understand how removing the zero rate, yet keeping the 19 per cent. rate, would assist such small companies."—[Official Report, 7 July 2004; Vol. 423, c. 863.]

I hope that that answers the hon. Gentleman's question.

It seems that enlightenment is contagious among Treasury Ministers this year, as the Paymaster General now seems to have reached a better understanding of how the removal of the nil-rate band will help small businesses after all. That is what this proposal is about—helping small businesses, not hindering them.

In his submission to the Treasury Committee in December, Mr. John Whiting, a partner at PricewaterhouseCoopers, said of the current proposals

"Now we are to go back to the beginning with small business probably feeling they would rather have been left alone from the start."

In other words, small businesses like needless interference from Government even less—again, I hope that this answers the hon. Gentleman's question—than they like corporation tax.

Once again, the Government's unhealthy fascination with anti-avoidance legislation precluded sensible consultation. Once again, papering over the cracks has not kept the water out. Once again, the lofty intention of aiding small businesses has ended in a farce. The guiding principle should now be to let well enough alone. If the non-corporate distribution rate was an appropriate solution to a self-inflicted problem in 2004, what has changed since then to justify its removal? I hope that the Minister will answer that question.

John Healey: We introduced the starting rate of corporation tax at 10 per cent. in 2000 to provide the means for small companies to reinvest their profits in their businesses. The hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) quoted my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General at length. I remind him that she said at the time of the introduction of the zero rate that we considered that we had the balance between the incentives to incorporate and the incentives to remain unincorporated correct, but she made clear in the Standing Committee that the Government did not have a closed mind.

It became plain that the starting rate enabled business to escape tax by retaining profits, but did not reward reinvestment specifically. As we have seen, it left the way open for some to incorporate just to reduce their tax and national insurance contributions burden, and not to take a step towards the growth that we wanted to encourage. In those circumstances, business urged simplicity on us and specialists urged us to deal with the starting rate and with the non-corporate distribution rate. The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales said in its response to our discussion paper in 2005

"The easiest solution in this case would be to remove the nil rate starting band for corporation tax and repeal the 19 per cent. charge . . .

We would argue that the cost of abolition of the nil rate band to small companies outweighs the added compliance burden of the new legislation."

I am glad that the hon. Member for Fareham acknowledged that clause 26 would indeed increase simplicity for small firms.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie) asked a couple of questions. He asked how many businesses with profits of less than £10,000 a year would be affected by the changes. I can tell him that about 370,000 companies with profits of less than £10,000 will be affected by the clause. The median tax increase for all companies affected will be £475 a year.

The hon. Gentleman obviously has not looked at the regulatory impact assessment that we published alongside the pre-Budget announcement in December, but if he looks at that and the update that we provided at the time of the Budget in March, he will find not only an answer to his question about how many companies would be affected, but a published breakdown of the number of companies, sector by sector.

Ed Balls: Does my hon. Friend agree that in making tax policy, one is always balancing tackling avoidance with providing the right incentives? It would be simpler if we abolished the 20p rate for small companies and had instead just one rate for all businesses, but that would be bad for small companies, just as it would be wrong to abolish the 10p starting rate for capital gains tax and to go back to the single 40p rate that applied in 1997. In the end, it is about striking a balance between avoidance and providing the right incentives.

John Healey: My hon. Friend cuts to the very heart of the policy challenges that any Government face, and which we have been trying to tackle since we took office in 1997. As he said, it is a question of getting the right balance between creating incentives for small businesses to start up and grow, and preventing the abuse and avoidance that we tend to see promoted and taken advantage of. In dealing with the situation that we faced, we had to decide whether to box around with further legislation—and thereby prevent—the marketed schemes and practices that we wanted to discourage, or whether to take instead the step urged on us by businesses, their representative organisations and tax specialist organisations: to create a simpler regime. Clause 26 does that by getting rid of the non-corporate distribution rate and the starting rate.

The hon. Member for Fareham described the clause as simply a tax-raising measure, but it is about fairness, not raising taxes. I refer him to the pre-Budget report, in which we announced the measure.

Mr. Newmark: Will the Financial Secretary give way?

John Healey: I will gladly give way when I have finished making this point. We said in the pre-Budget report:

"Alongside the revenue raised by this measure, projected receipts have been further reduced as a result of an increase in the number of those incorporating simply to reduce their tax and national insurance liability."

Mr. Newmark: In addressing the important issue of fairness, I would like the Financial Secretary to deal with the point made by the Paymaster General on 7 July 2004. She said:

"I fail to understand how removing the zero rate, yet keeping the 19 per cent. rate, would assist such small companies."—[Official Report, 7 July 2004; Vol. 423, c. 863.]

What is fair about that?

John Healey: The unfairness at the heart of the system and the challenge that we face is that many companies are incorporating simply to reduce their tax liability, not because their business demands suggest that that is the proper legal form for them. Companies that do not incorporate are clearly tax-disadvantaged, compared with their competitors.

I want to pursue the fairness point because it is important and at the heart of our argument. The hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) made some key broad points about the importance of small firms in a modern economy, and of Governments being able to implement measures to support their start-up and growth. He said that he was not sure what a fair tax system is. We should remember that as things stand—clause 26 is designed to change this—a self-employed person with profits of £20,000 a year pays some £1,800 more in tax and national insurance than they would pay if they were a company paying corporation tax and taking profits as dividends. That cannot be right, which is why we will continue to keep this issue under review, and why we have taken steps through clause 26.

As I said, these provisions were announced in the pre-Budget report, and clause 26 implements them. They will encourage reinvestment by increasing first-year capital allowances to 50 per cent. for the year starting this April. Some 4.2 million small businesses—not just those that are incorporated—are eligible to benefit from this increase in first-year capital allowances.

Mr. Hoban: Does the Financial Secretary accept that the Red Book puts the cost of the measure, and therefore the benefit to all business, at £60 million? However, the fact that it is a one-off measure prevents small businesses from planning for a stable future and making long-term investment decisions.

John Healey: As I have tried to explain, the purpose of clause 26 is to refocus the support that we give to small firms on measures likely to increase their incentives to invest, to reinvest profits, and to grow.

Clause 26 will also help by introducing the simpler accounting system for all small businesses that we promised in the pre-Budget report. It will double the annual threshold for the VAT annual accounting scheme so that 1.08 million firms will become eligible. If we are successful in getting the state aids clearance that we require for the cash accounting scheme, the 733,000 small companies currently eligible to benefit under that scheme will rise to 790,000.

Helen Goodman: It may help the Committee if my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary were to put this matter in a wider context. In my constituency of Bishop Auckland the number of new small businesses is at an all-time high. To what extent does he feel that these measures are the cause of such a high rate of small business creation, and is the pattern repeated across the country?

John Healey: I am grateful for that question, but a range of factors make up the business and economic environment that allows small firms to start up and prosper. My hon. Friend mentions the number of new firms in her constituency of Bishop Auckland, but there are now 570,000 more businesses in the British economy than there were in 1997. The business start-up rate is faster than for many years, and that is based on our stable and steadily growing economy, but the operation of the tax system can aid or hinder the formation and growth of small firms. The provisions of clause 26 will introduce a simpler corporation tax structure, and in a modest way will assist the process. All firms will benefit, including those in Bishop Auckland.

Of course, we can do more to support business, and my hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) is one of those who constantly urges the Government to do so. In the Budget 2006, we have made clear our desire to join business and its representative organisations in looking at doing more. I look forward to the continuing discussions in that regard.

The measures in clause 26 were welcomed by business representatives as a constructive way forward. I urge the Committee to support its standing part of the Bill.

Question put, That the clause stand part of the Bill:—

That Mr David Heath and Andrew Stunell be discharged from the Committee on the Modernisation of the House of Commons and that Mr Paul Burstow and Mr Adrian Sanders be added.—[Mr. Watts.]

COMMITTEES

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With the leave of the House, I shall put together motions 5 and 6.

Ordered,

Regulatory Reform

That Bob Russell be discharged from the Regulatory Reform Committee and Lorely Burt be added.

Procedure

That Annette Brooke be discharged from the Procedure Committee and John Hemming be added.—[Rosemary McKenna, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

PETITION

Road Junction (Humberstone)

10.6 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I wish to present a petition that has been signed by residents of Humberstone in Leicester concerning the layout of the junction of Scraptoft lane and Hungarton boulevard, which is dangerous, according to my constituents. As a result of the current layout, a fatal accident recently occurred.

The petition states:

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to take action to encourage Leicester City Council to create a protected right-hand turn at the junction, reduce the speed of traffic through the junction, and improve the flow of traffic down Hungarton Boulevard.

To lie upon the Table.

Energy Review (Human Rights)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watts.]

10.7 pm

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): As the gas price spiralled ever upwards last winter and spring, the disadvantages of our future dependence on that fuel became increasingly obvious. They were clear to the ordinary domestic consumer paying a highly inflated bill, obvious to the point of depression in the Government-supported anti-fuel-poverty sector, and painfully transparent to energy-intensive users, such as the petrochemical businesses in my Redcar constituency. Several of the petrochemical firms, which, together, provide a big slice of the north-east's gross domestic product, had to idle plant and limit output in favour of non-UK locations, and, in one case, temporarily close. The huge hike in those energy costs is likely to have longer-term effects, such as the delay, or even abandonment, of industrial investment in the chemical sector, all of which will be made much worse in the absence of speedy action to guard against a recurrence of the price hike next winter.

The cause of the problem is at least partly the impact of the early liberalisation of the UK energy market ahead of that of the rest of Europe. Additionally, we are moving more quickly than anyone could have predicted from supplying our own energy, which we have done for the past 100 years, first from coal and then from North sea oil and gas, to potentially becoming dependent on Russia, Algeria and the middle east for gas.

The problem of relying on Russia, which was previously regarded by the west as a reliable energy source, became especially clear to Ukrainians on new year's day when the Russians cut their supplies. However, the ripple effects were felt thousands of miles away. Not only did France lose a third of its gas, but the whole of Europe, which relies on Russia for a quarter of its supply, was forced to realise that there are serious limits to the length of the spoon that can be used when supping with President Putin. Clearly he will readily use his abundance of hydrocarbons for political purposes, in this instance to punish the western-leaning Ukraines for considering joining NATO and the EU and to force them back into Russian hegemony

Our dependence on Russian gas looks set to grow. Russia has 28 per cent.—the largest share—of the world's natural gas resources. Given that, should we ask what sort of a country is President Putin's Russia? According to Amnesty International, Russia has an abysmal human rights record. According to Freedom House, another human rights non-governmental organisation that assesses countries across a range of rights and issues as free, partly free or not free, Russia has declined from partly free to not free in the past two years. It says that Russians cannot change the Government democratically because the state's far-reaching control of the broadcast media and the growing harassment of Opposition parties make that impossible. There was strong evidence of an undercount in the vote for Opposition parties in the last election that kept them from attaining the 5 per cent. threshold required for parliamentary representation. Corruption is pervasive and libel laws are used to intimidate the independent media. Putin has just taken power to appoint the judges.

According to the annual human rights report from the US State Department, Parliament in Russia

"has been virtually stripped of power."

There is

"selectivity in the enforcement of the law and ... there is harassment of some non-government organisations."

It is a statement of the obvious that the history of Saudi Arabia and the rest of the middle east shows how difficult Governments find it to be other than indulgent to countries that are rich in energy. Middle eastern countries are, of course, significant gas suppliers. Levels of dependency on a country for energy supplies tend to make purchaser Governments significantly less prepared to challenge the supplier Government's democracy and human rights record, even though we and other western European countries assert that these values are key ones to be supported in foreign policy.

Europe's only really viable alternative source of gas is Algeria, which is fourth in the world as a gas exporter. However, Algeria, too, has serious human rights problems with Freedom house reporting that the right "of Algerians to choose their government freely is restricted".

Although the recent presidential elections were an improvement it is still reported that "the president wields minimum leverage with the small group of generals who retain ultimate power."

Demonstrations are banned in Algiers while in other areas, peaceful demonstrations have been broken up, sometimes violently. The Algerian alternative source of gas does not seem to hold a better promise of contracting with a clear human rights conscience.

President Putin has recently engaged in a fruitful piece of diplomacy in this direction. He signed a contract for Russia to supply missiles and fighter aircraft to Algeria. Payment for these is so arranged that Russian influence is now woven deeply into the Algerian energy sector. At the same time, President Putin has tightened his monopoly of the gas transit route from the Caspian and central Asian regions, building up, therefore, a double or a triple potential stranglehold on European gas supplies.

It is noteworthy that it was Russia that was free to supply enriched uranium to Iran to limit concerns about nuclear weapons proliferation in that country. Iran has the second highest natural gas reserves in the world, behind only Russia, and there are emerging concords in the energy sector between these two countries.

Recently, the Kremlin controlled Gazprom indicated a wish to bid for Centrica, the UK's largest domestic supplier, which sells gas to 40 per cent. of British homes. Success would secure UK demand as well as supply for the Russians, who are not yet big players in the UK. It would be a surprising outcome if, as the UK energy market is liberalised primarily to create competition, it became dominated by a state-owned corporation, and not even a British one.

Is it any coincidence that as Russian democracy and human rights are forced downwards and Putin simultaneously extends both his own tentacles of energy supply and his influence over other countries with large gas reserves, that the largest investment currently being made in nuclear power is at Olkiluoto in Finland, which as a country famously shares a common border with Russia and whose domination by the Soviets during the cold war gave rise to the description of oppressive hegemony as Finlandisation?

The fact that we are timid about energy suppliers' human rights obligations should not be a surprise when one considers the temptations. Energy is vital to modern economies, and problems with supply have been the basis of some of the most important events in recent history, including the global recession in the early 1970s after the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries cut supplies and, in the UK, the miners' strike of 1974 that brought down a Tory Government and the strike in the 1980s that did not do so. Ultimately, the 10-year war between Iran and Iraq, and the two more recent wars in Iraq were strongly linked to, if not determined by, reliable energy supplies.

In addition, energy-rich countries have a great deal of buying power, and can offer lucrative contracts for western know-how effectively to extract resources from the ground or the seabed. Gazprom is keen to secure western technical help further to develop Russian resources. Those countries are often ready to purchase sophisticated arms from the west, which are necessary to shore up their security and protect the status quo. As chair of the all-party group on Burma, I know the power that hydrocarbons can give despotic Governments. European efforts to isolate the despicable Rangoon junta are constantly foiled by the French, whose oil company, Total, is the regime's largest corporate funder. Incidentally, that has led to the unacceptable belief that the Bush White House operates a more effective sanctions programme against Burma than the EU. The Burmese Yadana gas project, in which Total and the junta are partners, earns the regime up to $450 million a year, which it spends on boosting the military suppression of its citizens and which it uses as an aid to laundering drugs money for the purchase of foreign arms.

Although we do not buy hydrocarbons from Burma, that country's history teaches us another truth. Countries with immense natural resources may have lop-sided economies. A sudden inflow of dollars as prices rise can lead to an appreciation in domestic currencies, making non-energy sectors uncompetitive in the world and removing incentives to develop other industries, thus confirming the domination of oil and gas. The resource is concentrated so that cash passes through few hands and can easily be misdirected. The inherent instability of commodity prices impacts mostly on the poor, who do not have any way of hedging the risk. Such countries rarely have stabilisation policies to set aside surpluses to cushion the blow when prices fall. Indeed, there are few internal pressures in such countries to govern well at all, because those money flows mean that there is little need to raise revenue through taxes, so there is little need to secure the consent or support of their people, who have little leverage to call their rulers to account.

Oil and gas extraction do not require large teams of highly skilled indigenous workers, so the individuals in charge see little point in investing strongly in education, welfare or health. Indeed, they do not require huge numbers of unskilled workers. Many such countries grow slowly and do badly on the UN's human development index. Countries with strong institutions can benefit from the wealth that great natural resources bring, including Norway, which has about 1 per cent. of world gas reserves, and, historically, Britain. Both countries had a strongly entrenched representative democracy, freedom of speech and association, as well as the rule of law, long before they realised that they had hydrocarbons. None of the countries in the top five for gas reserves is classified by Freedom House as free.

Clearly, relying on such countries for our gas supplies can bolster unacceptable regimes and ensure that their citizens pay a high human rights and democracy price even as we pay a high financial one. Ultimately, the dangers and instability to the world from human rights abuses mean that the price that everyone pays is extremely high. Happily, that understanding appears to be compatible with the direction of Government policy. The energy review was partly initiated as a result of the UK becoming a net gas importer sooner than expected and the newly appreciated risks of an unreliable supply.

There are genuine gains to be made from renewable technologies using wind, wave and solar power. Clean-coal technology and carbon sequestration for coal and North sea oil have a future, while efficiency measures to reduce demand for energy are vital too. Campaigners protest that a fully committed Government should push through much stronger action on renewables and energy efficiency, but such measures often involve major changes to people's lifestyles and are hard to deliver. For example, wind farms are widely opposed because of their impact on the local environment. A proposed offshore wind farm in Redcar is deeply unpopular, because it is less than a mile from the shoreline of our main tourist bay. The proposed onshore wind farm at the steelworks is acceptable to everyone, however, because it is part of the industrial landscape. In a similar way many people resist microgeneration windmills on houses, recently exposed as dangerous and difficult. Wave power may have environmental problems, and the technology for carbon sequestration is only in its early stages.

The technology that should not be overlooked in establishing what is likely to be a mix of energy supply is nuclear power. At present it contributes about 19 per cent. of our electricity needs, but that could fall to 7 per cent. by 2020. Meanwhile, the Government's target for renewables, which many consider to be optimistic, is for an increase in renewable power from 3.4 per cent. to 20 per cent. by the same date, 2020. These figures show how the majority of the effort that we put into reducing CO_2 emissions through renewable energy is in danger of being wasted if old nuclear power stations are not replaced.

Importantly for human rights concerns, nuclear fuel can be bought in ways that do not endanger human rights in the same way as gas. It mostly comes from Canada and Australia. Clearly, nuclear power has problems, particularly its waste, though a recent draft statement from CoRWM, the Committee on Radioactive Waste Management, envisages a deep underground repository which it describes as safe and "a fair burden to pass to future generations".

Its chair added:

"We have looked at whether the options on our shortlist could accommodate new-build wastes and concluded that they could".

Early indications are that the petrochemical industry, as represented by businesses in Redcar, might be willing to support capital investment in nuclear power generation in return for very important stability of supply in the long term.

We should hope that the energy review can find workable solutions so that we can continue to benefit from a relatively affordable carbon-free energy source and so that, by expanding our gas purchasing from unacceptable Governments, we do not simultaneously make the world a worse place both for climate change and for human rights.

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): I thank my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) for the opportunity to discuss the important issues of human rights and the current energy review. It seems that only recently she and I were discussing equally important questions about women and pensions.

The Government take human rights very seriously and I am proud of the work that we undertake. As a developed country, with a well-established representative democracy, we have a duty to promote good human rights in all interactions that the UK has with other countries.

Energy policy is a truly international issue, as events every week demonstrate. Even though the UK has a large natural resource in oil and gas reserves in the North sea, imports remain an important element of our energy mix. In the future, our imported energy will come from a wide range of sources—oil from Denmark and Venezuela, and gas from Norway, Qatar and Algeria, for example. Furthermore, some of the world's leading extraction companies, such as BP, BG Group and Shell, are based in the UK. As such, they share the responsibility for protecting human rights wherever they are operating.

As my hon. and learned Friend made clear, the way in which countries use their energy resource is an important issue for the whole international community. It was for this reason that in 2000 the UK and US Governments established a set of international voluntary principles on security and human rights. These are designed to help companies to meet the requirements of their international operations, while respecting the human rights and fundamental freedoms of those in the host country.

We have continued to work with British companies to promote and expand the work of the voluntary principles initiative. I am pleased to see that those principles have formed the cornerstone of those companies' approach to security and human rights in the countries in which they operate. The initiative is also backed by a number of non-governmental organisations, such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch.

We are also committed to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development guidelines for multinational enterprises. These set out guidelines on responsible business conduct for all companies based in the UK. The guidelines cover areas such as combating bribery, environmental protection and public health and safety. Stable and successful producer countries are crucial for the international community's long-term energy security. The best way to ensure such long-term security is to ensure that the revenues raised from oil are transparently accounted for and used to benefit the people of those countries.

Through the extractive industries transparency initiative, we are working with Governments in resource-rich countries to improve such governance through the publication and verification of company payments and Government revenues from oil, gas and mining. Some 20 countries—for example, Azerbaijan and Nigeria, which are significant players in the global liquefied natural gas market—have either endorsed or are now actively implementing that initiative, and other countries that are global suppliers of uranium, such as Niger, have also endorsed the initiative. We are encouraging emerging markets—for example, China, India and Brazil—to support the initiative's implementation in resource-rich countries and by their companies, whether state owned or otherwise. Russia could play a leadership role with those economies.

Our indigenous supplies of energy have declined sooner than expected. We are already a net importer of gas and expect to be a net importer of oil by 2010. There is no doubt that whatever is decided by the energy review, to which my hon. and learned Friend has referred, the UK will be importing significantly more oil and gas in coming years from a range of countries around the world, but heightened concern about global energy issues are affecting perceptions of the security of supply from major exporter countries. Reliance on imports is not per se a threat to security of supplies. Indeed, all other G7 countries, with the single exception of Canada, have been in this position for many years.

Securing our energy supplies from a diversity of countries by a number of different routes is an important factor in our energy policy. We are not putting our eggs all in one basket, because diversity helps us to maintain reliable supplies and mitigates the risks of any interruptions. Oil and gas come to the UK from a variety of countries, but a significant proportion of our current oil and gas imports come from Norway—for example, 72 per cent. of oil imports and 80 per cent. of gas imports. Countries such as Germany, the Netherlands and Belgium are also suppliers.

The market for liquefied natural gas, which can be shipped like oil, is expanding significantly. The UK expects to receive the first supplies of LNG from Qatar by the end of 2007. As the LNG market becomes more global, it is possible that the UK will receive shipments from other producers such as Nigeria and Egypt. That diversity will help to continue our strong record for the continued physical supply of gas and electricity to end users. We have had fewer unplanned interruptions to electricity than any European country except the Netherlands. The expansion of renewables, to which we still remain committed, is further adding to our diverse generating mix.

We have also been working with the energy intensive users group, which includes the Chemical Industries Association, during the past winter. Our efforts have been focused on maximising gas and electricity supplies, encouraging demand-side response and pursuing fair access to markets across Europe. We are also working with Ofgem, national grid and industry over the summer to ensure that we are in the best possible position ahead of next winter. However, we need to ask ourselves whether we are doing enough to manage the risks of this new situation into the future. That is one of the reasons why the Prime Minister asked me to lead a review of UK energy policy.

We must ensure that the right framework is in place to help the market to deliver our medium and long-term energy policy goals. The review is therefore looking at the overall framework and within that ensuring reduced carbon emissions, attaining reliable energy supplies, examining the role of nuclear and assessing the potential of carbon abatement and low carbon technologies. In addition, the scope for improving energy efficiency is subject to the review, including achieving affordable and adequately heated homes for the most vulnerable.

There are no foregone conclusions in the review, but there is one thing that I am sure of—there is no single solution and no do-nothing option. We have just finished the formal consultation as part of the review, and the scale of the debate has been impressive. We have received many more than 2,000 responses to our consultation and I have met more than 500 different stakeholders through our extensive programme of seminars, round tables and other activities, from which three key messages have emerged. First, the objectives of the 2003 White Paper are the right ones, and a review for the long term is the right decision. Secondly, there is a need for greater long-term clarity about the direction of UK energy policy. Thirdly, there is a need for action on both energy demand and energy supply.

Everyone, whether in Government, in industry or as an individual, has an important role to play in taking action to meet our energy policy goals. We are analysing the evidence that we see from the consultation and further considering the policy options that the review might recommend. We must continue to provide a framework in which the UK market can supply UK energy requirements while at the same time, of course, having regard to human rights considerations, including through our support of the voluntary principles.

I thank my hon. and learned Friend for the opportunity to discuss these important global issues in the House tonight.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Ten o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

The Secretary of State was asked—

Child Poverty

1. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): How many children in Wales have been lifted out of poverty since 1997. [66180]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): I am sure that the House will join me in extending our condolences and sympathy to the family of Peter Law and his many friends in Blaenau Gwent and Wales. He served his community with distinction for 36 years and will be greatly missed.

The Government are committed to eradicating child poverty. Since 1997, an estimated 50,000 children have been lifted out of poverty in Wales. Further significant steps to tackle child poverty were announced in the Budget, including increases in child trust fund payments and the child tax credit.

Julie Morgan: Does my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary agree that child poverty has fallen further and faster in Wales than in the rest of the United Kingdom, according to the independent Joseph Rowntree Foundation? Does he agree that that is a major achievement, although there is obviously a long way to go? Does he further agree that that is due to the progressive policies that the Government in Cardiff and the Government in Westminster have introduced, such as the minimum wage, the huge rise in employment, the big increase in benefits—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is too long for a supplementary.

Nick Ainger: I agree with my hon. Friend. Child poverty has fallen faster in Britain—a 22 per cent. reduction—than in any other European country since 1996–97. In Wales, 242,000 families and almost 400,000 children receive child tax credits. That compares well with the family credit system that the Conservative party operated when it was in power, under which only 42,000 families received family credit. The Chancellor announced that tax credits would increase by 14 per cent. in the next three years. We are making work pay—the national minimum wage has contributed significantly to reducing child poverty in Wales and the UK.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): Childhood deprivation and poverty is often measured by the take-up of free school schools, which is triggered by the benefits that families receive. In rural areas, take-up of benefits is insufficient, partly because many self-employed people find it difficult to fill in the forms. Is the Under-Secretary convinced that his figures on childhood poverty are true and reflect the position on the ground?

Nick Ainger: Yes, I am. The independent Joseph Rowntree Foundation confirmed the figures. It is important that those who are in work—and are perhaps self-employed—claim the child tax credits because significant sums are involved. I assure the hon. Gentleman that, if people make those claims, they will be amply rewarded. The credits are generous, lift significant numbers of children out of poverty and make work pay.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I associate myself and Conservative Members with the tribute that the Under-Secretary paid to the former Member for Blaenau Gwent. Our thoughts are with his family at this time.

Notwithstanding the welcome reduction in child poverty in Wales, the Government have, once again, missed their targets. Around 28 per cent. of our children still live below the poverty line. In addition, local authorities in Wales take an increasing number—now well over 4,000—into care, and 58 per cent. leave care with no qualifications. What is behind the increase, and what can be done to halt the trend among some of our most disadvantaged children?

Nick Ainger: Under the Conservative Government, in which the hon. Lady served, child poverty tripled in 18 years. Although we need to look forward, it is worth remembering that before any criticism is levelled at the Government, who have presided over the biggest fall in child poverty in any country in Europe.

The hon. Lady made a specific point. Yes, genuine problems have to be tackled and we need to deal with them. However, we cannot do that if we adopt the Conservative party's current economic policy, which would mean reductions in public expenditure.

Affordable Housing

2. Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): What discussions he has had with the First Minister of the Welsh Assembly Government on affordable housing in Wales, with particular reference to cash allocated to assist first-time buyers. [66181]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): Regular ones. Both we and the Welsh Assembly Government are committed to increasing the supply of affordable housing and offering choices to people seeking their own home.

Mr. Llwyd: Before I ask my question, may I also associate myself and my party fully with the sincere condolences being sent to the family of the late Member for Blaenau Gwent?

The Secretary of State will recall that we touched on the subject of affordable housing during the Welsh Grand Committee debate. The Under-Secretary has now written to me to say that it is a devolved matter. May I suggest four things that Westminster could be doing? The first would be to look again at stamp duty, and at the variable rates for second homes. The second would be to relax the planning system to release land specifically for affordable housing. The third would be to allow local authorities to borrow at public sector rates, backed by Government guarantee. The fourth would be to scrap VAT on renovations. Those four things could be done very easily by Westminster, working with our friends in the National Assembly.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman makes some practical proposals that we shall want to look at. We are constantly looking at these issues. Like him, I am concerned about the problem of affordability, especially for first-time buyers. In rural areas such as his, that is a particular problem. House prices have increased massively in Wales, catching up with those in the rest of the UK and reflecting Wales's growing prosperity. At the same time, I know that he will acknowledge that, since 2000, more than 1,200 homes have been provided under the homebuy scheme, that more and more money in social housing grant is going in through the Welsh Assembly Government, rising to £96.4 million, and that there are more homeowners in Wales than ever before in our history. All of that is good news.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): In areas of economic prosperity such as Wrexham, there is great pressure on the housing market. Does my right hon. Friend agree that we need to take a balanced approach to housing that looks not only at the private sector but at much greater development of the public and social housing sectors?

Mr. Hain: Yes, I do, and the Government are now tackling the problem with a three-pronged strategy. We are increasing opportunities for home buyers. There are more than 1 million extra home owners in Britain since we came to power, with a substantial number of new home owners—I am not sure of the figure, but it is probably well over 50,000—in Wales alone. The low mortgage rates that have made that possible are part of our economic success, but my hon. Friend is right to say that we need more social housing—the Welsh Assembly Government are working on that—along with more shared equity schemes, which the Government are promoting, including in Wales.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): May I also send my condolences and those of my party to the friends and family of Peter Law? He was a man of true conviction and personal integrity, and the House is the poorer for his passing.

The Secretary of State mentioned house prices. Is he aware that Welsh house prices have risen by 120 per cent. in five years, and by 157 per cent. in rural areas such as Montgomeryshire, where rural households earn only about £23,000? For that reason, will the Government consider introducing a strategy actively to promote community land trusts—such as the one that has been successfully piloted in Castle Ceireinion—shared ownership schemes and new council housing stock, to help to resolve the acute and worsening housing crisis in Wales?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman will know that there is a community land trust demonstration project in Powys, which has been supported by the Welsh Assembly Government. That is all to the good. I sympathise with his point about first-time buyers. Why have house prices risen so tremendously in Wales? It is because Wales is now healthier and more prosperous than it has ever been. My constituency has had rock-bottom house prices over the years, but some have now gone up by three or four times. That reflects the increasing wealth among home owners, which is good, but it also means that we have to do more for first-time buyers, which we are.

Community Support Officers

3. Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): How many additional community support officers will be recruited in Wales following the 2006 Budget. [66182]

8. Jessica Morden (Newport, East) (Lab): How many additional community support officers will be recruited in Wales following the 2006 Budget. [66189]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): In September 2005, there were 282 community support officers on patrol in Wales. I expect the figure to rise to around 750 by this time next year.

Albert Owen: I thank my right hon. Friend for that response. He will know that the Government are really delivering on community policing. In north Wales in particular, the extra resources from central Government and from the local government precept have produced tangible results. He will also be aware, however, of the concerns expressed by North Wales police authority and local communities that the proposed larger police forces will take resources from local policing. Will he assure the House that any proposed larger force will allow community policing to continue and to be properly funded?

Mr. Hain: I agree that there has been a big increase in neighbourhood policing, and north Wales has led the way in that regard. I want to give my hon. Friend an emphatic guarantee that the proposal for an all-Wales force—if it goes through—will protect neighbourhood policing because the new force will have the capability to tackle new, difficult crimes such as serious organised crime, drug dealing and terrorism that small forces such as the North Wales police force do not have. He should not take my word for that; he should take the advice of Her Majesty's inspector of constabulary. I am confident that the policies being put in place by the Home Secretary will deliver protective policing for those big, serious new threats as well as protect neighbourhood policing, in north Wales in particular.

Jessica Morden: I, too, welcome the new community support officers for Gwent. Does my right hon. Friend agree that CSOs have been a big success in constituencies such as mine? They work alongside the police, provide a uniformed presence and spend up to 90 per cent. of their time out on the beat, which has had a big impact on tackling antisocial behaviour. Does he also welcome the further powers proposed for them in the Police and Justice Bill?

Mr. Hain: Yes, I agree with the point made by my hon. Friend. We should remember that when we first proposed community support officers they were not universally popular, and we were criticised, as we often have been when we have introduced new reforms. They are a huge success, and they are not a substitute for police officers, as Wales has also had 1,000 more police officers, which includes Gwent. As a result, crime is decreasing on almost every measure and local communities are feeling much more secure.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that his crowing about the increase in community support officers making our streets safer is pointless when the Home Secretary is letting people out of prison early—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That was out of order.

Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): I shall try to stick to the question that was asked, Mr. Speaker.

Is my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State aware of the excellent crime detection figures in the North Wales police area, especially in the western and central divisions covering my constituency? Will he join me in congratulating North Wales police on such excellent results? Does he agree that they are a direct result of the investment that North Wales police has received from the Government?

Mr. Hain: I do. North Wales police has had an excellent record in tackling crime on almost every measure, especially in community support for policing and community support schemes. I give her the same assurance as I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Albert Owen). Any changes or reorganisation—especially with the protection for regional accountability, a deputy chief constable now being provided by the Home Secretary, and the costs being dealt with—will be a big boost to policing across Wales, including her constituency.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): Recruitment of additional community support officers might suffer unless problems with the restructuring process and its funding are clarified. Early in February, Home Office officials told police authorities in Wales that they would produce detailed information in response to concern about the extra cost to the taxpayer and the impact on precept equalisation. By the end of April, however, that had not been done. Does the Secretary of State know when police authorities will receive the urgently required details from the Home Office?

Mr. Hain: May I start off on a point of agreement? Policing in Wales, and many other services, would suffer if the Conservatives' plans for public spending cuts were visited on Wales. In respect of the costs of reorganisation, start-up costs, the costs of extra protective services for which the whole reform is designed and the equalisation of the police precept are all important issues. Home Office officials, together with Ministers, are working on that now with police authorities, and I am sure that a satisfactory outcome can be achieved.

Mrs. Gillan: In other words, those details have not been forthcoming from the Home Office. I further understand that the four chief constables have written to Sir Ronnie Flanagan, head of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, expressing grave concern about the Home Office's 75 per cent. cut in its estimates for the budget required to deliver the protective policing that the Secretary of State mentioned. They ask whether a fundamental change has been made in the national standards. As this is an operational issue, which strikes at the heart of the reason behind the mergers, how can our police forces in Wales deliver protective policing and have confidence in a Home Office that slashes police estimates with no apparent explanation?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Lady must know that all four chief constables support the principle of a single all-Wales force. They, like Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary, know that whatever the Conservative and other Opposition parties say, Wales will not have the capabilities to fight serious organised crime, drug dealing and terrorism unless the reorganisation is implemented. She is right, however, to say that they have written that letter, and I share their concerns. I support them in getting those concerns resolved with the Home Office, and I am confident that we can achieve that.

John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): I welcome the news about the CSOs in Wales. Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating Superintendent Sue Hayes and her team in the Vale of Glamorgan division of South Wales police on another record-breaking year in tackling crime, with a 4.3 per cent. reduction? Does he, however, share my fear that high-achieving police divisions will find it increasingly hard to hit and exceed their targets when they are doing so well already? Will that be taken in consideration in the drawing up of future targets?

Mr. Hain: I am sure that it will, and I agree that we have many outstanding police officers in Wales. With the extra 1,000 officers recruited under this Government, compared with the Tory Government's record of cuts, we now have a proud record and a proud police force, designed and with the capability to tackle crime through Wales.

Tourist Medical Facilities

4. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What discussions he has had concerning the provision of facilities for the treatment of minor injuries suffered by English tourists while visiting Wales. [66183]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): I have regular discussions with the Assembly Minister for Health and Social Services on a range of health issues.

English tourists, like anyone in Wales, have access to the 15 major accident and emergency departments and nearly 40 minor A and E departments and minor injury units.

Michael Fabricant: The Minister will know that during July, August and part of September, the caravan sites, bed-and-breakfast places and hotels start filling up, as do cottages and small hospitals. The Tywyn cottage memorial hospital, for instance, experiences a demand five times as great as it normally experiences during the rest of the year. Will the Minister assure me, and the many people in my constituency who use such hospitals, that the hospitals will continue to be maintained and the minor injuries units will not be closed?

Nick Ainger: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he has said, and particularly for what he said about Tywyn community hospital. He may not know that it has just been the subject of a review, and that improvements are guaranteed for the future.

The National Assembly recognises the important role that community hospitals play in delivering local services to patients, and there is an investment programme throughout Wales to improve those services. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the Assembly values its community hospitals.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): I am sure my hon. Friend is aware that literally thousands of English tourists will visit Cardiff for the forthcoming cup final. No doubt they will receive a warm welcome from the people of Wales, but will my hon. Friend welcome the same English tourists back to Wales after England has won the World cup?

Nick Ainger: Yes, indeed. In view of the Millennium stadium's proud record in providing facilities for the FA cup final and many other major sporting facilities, I trust that the participants will not have to make use of any of the A and E units in Cardiff.

Agricultural and Environmental Research

5. Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): If he will make a statement on the funding of agricultural and environmental research in Wales. [66184]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): Research and development in the sector is not devolved, and the budget is managed on behalf of England and Wales by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. DEFRA has already committed more than £6 million of R and D funding to contractors based in Wales for the current financial year, and more contracts will be awarded during the year.

Mark Williams: The Minister will be aware of widespread concern about the loss of 29 jobs at the Institute of Grassland and Environmental Research in my constituency, and deeper concern about the uncertain future in the longer term. There is a suggestion that closer governance is on the agenda for the Rothamsted institute in Hertfordshire, which could leave IGER in a highly vulnerable position in the future. On that basis, will the Minister support another option whereby IGER would become an enhanced agri-research institute for Wales? That would allow it to retain its independence, and would enable the National Assembly to undertake its sustainable development agenda more directly.

Nick Ainger: I am aware of the concerns raised by the hon. Gentleman, who has met me and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to discuss these and other issues. I am aware also of the discussions taking place about a single funding stream for IGER and the Rothamsted institute, which together are in consultation with the Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council. I shall discuss the matter with Carwyn Jones on Monday, and write to the hon. Gentleman afterwards.

Microgeneration

6. Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): What estimate he has made of the environmental and economic impact on Wales of the Budget announcements on microgeneration and the National Institute for Energy Technologies. [66185]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): The Budget represents a good deal for Wales and for clean energy. Homes and businesses in Wales will benefit from the extra £50 million boost for microgeneration in the UK.

Mrs. Moon: Wales is superbly placed to become a leader in renewable energy and the emerging energy technologies. Does the Secretary of State agree that Technium, which is based just across the border from my Bridgend constituency and the area represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies), would be an invaluable target for investment as a site for research in that growing market? It would also provide high-value jobs for workers from both constituencies.

Mr. Hain: Yes, I agree. Renewable energy technology, including for microgeneration, is the key to the future. It can also provide many jobs, and take advantage of the excellent potential in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Sport Finance

7. Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): What assessment he has made of the impact of the London Olympics on Wales's share of sport-related lottery funding. [66188]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I am confident that the overall impact of the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic Games will be beneficial to Wales.

Adam Price: Wales receives just 4.5 per cent. of sport-related lottery funding. That is less than our population share and the lowest figure of all the lottery distributors. Will the Secretary of State guarantee that our share will not fall even further as a result of the £1.5 billion of lottery funding to be used to pay for the London Olympics? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the House come to order?

Mr. Hain: Obviously, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport will want to reflect on the points that the hon. Gentleman makes, but lottery funding has made a huge impact on Wales. When the Olympics come to London, they will also provide opportunities to take advantage of various sites in Wales.

NHS Dentistry

9. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): What discussions he has had with the Health Minister in the National Assembly for Wales on cross-border issues relating to NHS dentistry in Wales. [66190]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): I met the Assembly Minister for Health and Social Services only last week to discuss a range of issues related to NHS dentistry in Wales, and was pleased to hear that the Assembly Government's increased investment means that more than 230,000 additional NHS places have been created.

Mr. Bone: In 1997, the people of Wales had access to an NHS dentist. Today, many people have to travel considerable distances, including across national borders, to find one. Would the Minister like to apologise for that appalling state of affairs?

Nick Ainger: No, I would not. The Welsh Assembly Government are planning to invest an additional £30 million in NHS dentistry in the coming year. That will bring total spending on NHS dentistry in Wales from £81,000 in the last year to over £210 million in the coming year. As I have said, that will create an additional 230,000 places, so that people will have access to an NHS dentist.

Severn Estuary Barrage

10. Jenny Willott (Cardiff, Central) (LD): If he will make a statement on the recent proposals for a barrage in the Severn estuary. [66191]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): Tidal energy has huge potential to supply a significant proportion of the country's future energy needs and in turn make a significant contribution to our emissions reduction targets. I therefore welcome and support the renewed interest by private investors in the Severn barrage proposal.

Jenny Willott: In a future feasibility study for a Severn barrage, will the Minister commit to including all potential ways to exploit the estuary's tidal power, including tidal lagoons and fences, and marine current turbines? Will he ensure that the full financial and ecological costs are taken into account?

Mr. Hain: Yes. That will be a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, and for my hon. Friend the Energy Minister. The Welsh Assembly Government have strongly backed that exciting project, and I support them. It is the biggest renewable energy project in the UK and the world as a whole, and could account for up to 5 per cent. of UK electricity production. Its output would be the equivalent of what is produced by at least two nuclear power stations, and would help us meet the shortfall in our generating capacity that will open up after 15 years.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that the Severn barrage is at least 20 years from completion and that we would, therefore, be crazy to rule out existing technologies such as nuclear, which could plug our energy gap without increasing carbon emissions?

Mr. Hain: The energy review is looking at nuclear for precisely that reason. The Prime Minister set up the review because a big gap will open up in our generating capacity in 15 years' time. All options therefore have to be looked at, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support the Severn barrage scheme. If he and his leader are serious about going green, they ought to back renewable energy, offshore wind farms and projects such as the Severn barrage, which make it viable to have clean, green energy in the future.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [67221] Willie Rennie (Dunfermline and West Fife) (LD): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 3 May.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Willie Rennie: Just what does it take for the Prime Minister to accept the Home Secretary's resignation?

The Prime Minister: I believe it is important that a system that has not worked properly for decades is sorted out. The Home Secretary is sorting it out and it is right that he continues to do that.

Q2. [67222] Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): With educational standards constantly rising in our schools, will my right hon. Friend join me in encouraging head teachers to sign up eligible pupils to the Government's national academy for gifted and talented youth, so that many more young people receive the education that is best suited to their individual needs?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to draw attention to the success of the academy, which is working with about 85,000 very able young people across the country. We want to extend the programme so that those who are especially gifted and talented in our schools, who have often not had opportunities in the state system, can access those opportunities irrespective of their wealth and get the very best education, tailored to their personal needs.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): The Home Secretary was told last July about the scandal of dangerous prisoners released on to our streets instead of being considered for deportation. The Prime Minister has now had a week to find out what is actually going on in the Home Office. Can he explain why the rate at which prisoners were released and not deported actually accelerated after the Home Secretary found out about it?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I can explain that. Back in August 2005, before any parliamentary questions were raised about the issue, the practice of the immigration department changed so that instead of relying on the prisons to notify it of the release dates of prisoners, it sent immigration officers directly into prisons. That, therefore, meant that many more cases were identified and I can give the right hon. Gentleman the figures. After that point, there were 1,000 actual removals and deportations and 3,000 cases considered, so the rate at which cases came to the immigration and nationality department increased dramatically. However, from 30 March, every case is considered before release and that, let me tell the House, is the first time that has happened for decades.

Mr. Cameron: That is absolutely no explanation why the rate accelerated. Is not the reason why the number accelerated made clear by a senior immigration officer? He said:

"There was an unwritten rule that immigration officers could not go to prisons because senior officials knew that most of the prisoners up for deportation would automatically claim asylum. This was one of several 'creative' solutions thought up by senior officials to please ministers", so that the official asylum numbers would come down. Can the Prime Minister give us an absolute assurance that that was not the case?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I can, for the reason that I have just given. The whole number of cases being considered increased. The right hon. Gentleman's suggestion that somehow the system was changed and weakened by the Home Secretary is wrong. About 1,500 prisoners are being deported a year. If we go back, not just over the period of this Government, but over the past couple of decades—[Interruption.] I say this not in excuse or mitigation but to show that the system has had faults from the beginning. If, for example, we take the time when the right hon. Gentleman was a special adviser at the Home Office—[Interruption.] I am not expecting him to take responsibility; I am simply saying that whereas the system now deports 1,500 a year, at that time, the number of people removed on court recommendation, or as not conducive to the public good, was 370. At that time, only one in five failed asylum seekers were removed; now, we remove more than the number of unfounded asylum claims every month. The backlog of cases was 60,000; it is now a few thousand.

If the right hon. Gentleman would like to know how many cases were not considered then, I cannot tell him and neither can he tell me, because there were no such records. Incidentally, at that time, according to Government figures at that time from Earl Ferrers, there were at least 6,000 prisoners at any one time who were in our prisons whose nationality we did not know.

All I say to the right hon. Gentleman is this: this system has not worked properly for decades, and it is actually working now. We have to work through the backlog of cases, which we will do, but it is completely wrong to say that this problem was created or began under this Home Secretary.

Mr. Cameron: People listening to that answer will, frankly, think it pathetic. This scandal has happened on the Prime Minister's watch and he cannot run away from responsibility for it. His assurances are worth so little, when last week at the Dispatch Box, he admitted that he did not even have the figures.

I have a letter from another immigration officer who has worked in the service for 30 years. He says that we "are under instruction not to get involved in assisting the police with offenders ... because these offenders are likely to claim asylum and tip the scales the wrong way. Thus are the figures massaged."

Should we not believe the people who have been working on the front line for nine years rather than a Prime Minister who did not know about this nine days ago?

The Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman talks to people on the front line, they will tell him that there have been problems with this system for a very long time. The important thing is how we now overhaul not just the way the system works, but the system itself, and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will deal with that in a few moments. The fact is that we have not deported all those convicted of imprisonable offences from the very beginning of this system. I think that it is now time that anybody who is convicted of an imprisonable offence and who is a foreign national is deported.

I just remind the right hon. Gentleman that, when this Government introduced a provision in the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002 to say that anybody convicted of any offence carrying more than two years' imprisonment should not be eligible for asylum and therefore could be deported, his party opposed that amendment. In addition—[Interruption.] I am sorry, but if we want to take the measures, let us take the measures. Let me also point out that, when we introduced the Criminal Justice Act 2003 that allowed us to carry out the early removal of these prisoners—in other words, instead of waiting to the end of their sentence, we could remove them early—his party also voted against that Act. So I suggest that we now take the measures necessary not just to improve the way the existing system works, which the Home Secretary has done, but to change it fundamentally for the future.

Mr. Cameron: I look forward to the Home Secretary's statement. I stuck around to listen to his statement last week when the Prime Minister scuttled out of the building.

In March this year, the Home Secretary was told that a significant number of the criminals released and not deported had committed the most serious offences, including murder and rape. It is now clear that he did not tell the Prime Minister for three weeks. Does the Prime Minister agree that this is the sort of information that a Prime Minister should be told at once?

The Prime Minister: The important thing was that, from 30 March onwards, the new system that was put in place meant that the cases were considered prior to release. That has now been done; the backlog is now being dealt with.

I return to the point that I have made. On any basis, for years we have not been deporting all those people convicted of a serious criminal offence. I say now, "Let us deport all those people", and I hope that we can get support for that right across the House. Up until now, every time we have taken these measures, they have been opposed by the Conservative party.

Mr. Cameron: Let us just be clear about what we have heard: murderers, rapists, paedophiles released from prison—and the Prime Minister does not want to know immediately. What sort of Government is that? At the weekend, the Prime Minister was asked whether the Home Secretary should resign. He said, "It depends." On what does it depend?

The Prime Minister: I do not believe that the Home Secretary has created the problems of this system. I believe that those problems have existed for a very long time, in the way in which I have described. I think that it is important that we take the measures necessary to sort out the existing system. That has been done and that is why, since 30 March, the cases have been considered prior to release. But I think that there is a far bigger question, which was raised by the shadow Home Secretary earlier. The fact is that even if all the cases are considered prior to release, we do not at the moment deport all those people convicted of a serious criminal offence. The truth is that even if we take those cases that have been considered, there are still a significant number that, having been considered under the existing system—which has, as I say, been in place for decades—do not result in deportation. Therefore, in my view, it is not just a question of the existing system; it is about making sure that that system is radically overhauled so that those who are convicted of a serious criminal offence are deported automatically. If we do not do that, we may consider all the cases in time, but we will not deport all the people who should be deported.

Mr. Cameron: The fact is that 1,000 people were released from prison and their deportation was not even considered. This Home Secretary will for ever be associated with the scandal of releasing foreign prisoners on to our streets. While the Prime Minister keeps him in office, his claims to be tough on crime will be completely hollow. Are not people now paying the price for the arrogant attachment to office of a leader who has completely lost control?

The Prime Minister: That was the right hon. Gentleman's pre-arranged soundbite. Let me just tell him that, as I have just pointed out to him—I notice that he did not come back on any of the facts that I gave—this is a system that has not considered all those cases prior to release at any point. Even if those cases were considered, significant numbers have always not been deported. As I said to him a moment or two ago, at the time when he was working in the Home Office, it had to admit that about 6,000 prisoners in the system at any one time did not even have their nationality identified. All that I am saying, very simply, is this: there are faults with the present system in its implementation, which have been corrected since 30 March, but the real issue, which we have to face in this House if we want to deal with the public concern, is to change the system itself.

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the decision handed down from the House of Lords relating to mesothelioma sufferers who were injured at work through being illegally exposed to asbestos? Is he also aware of the devastating impact that that will have on thousands of workers and their families, and can he give them some comfort today?

The Prime Minister: I understand the problem that my hon. Friend raises about injury through asbestos. Perhaps the best thing is for me to find out from the Department of Trade and Industry what the up-to-date position is and write to him about it.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): Is the Home Office fit for purpose?

The Prime Minister: That might be a question better asked of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I do not believe that the answer to this problem lies in reorganising the Home Office. I think that the fit between prisons, immigration and asylum, and crime is the right one. The issue is the way in which the system works. I make the same point to him as I do to the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron): if we really want to deal with this issue, we have to be prepared to say that we are going to deport people back to their countries if they are convicted of serious criminal offences, because the majority of people that the public are concerned about are people whose cases have been considered, but who have not been deported under the existing system.

Sir Menzies Campbell: Let me make it clear that when the Prime Minister produces his proposals, we will obviously consider them in detail, but in the past nine years we have had dozens of pieces of law and order legislation—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Allow the right hon. and learned Gentleman to be heard.

Sir Menzies Campbell: In the past nine years, we have had dozens of pieces of law and order legislation and hundreds of new offences have been created. Is not what we need less legislation, better government and a new Home Secretary?

The Prime Minister: No, I think we need better legislation, and I am delighted that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has said that he will examine our proposals carefully. Let me just point out, however, that he has voted against every single one of the 12 or so measures that we have taken to tighten up the law on asylum and illegal immigration, and he voted against the criminal justice legislation and the antisocial behaviour legislation. So, there are people I will take lessons from on law and order, but not Liberal Democrats.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): Apart from the minimum wage, statutory holidays, Sure Start, low unemployment, low mortgages, free eye tests, prescriptions, TV licences and bus travel, and the £200 winter fuel allowance for pensioners, 2 million children taken out of poverty, 2 million pensioners taken out of poverty, more teachers, nurses, doctors and police, and lower crime, hospital waiting lists and class sizes, what have the Labour Government done for us?

The Prime Minister: As the People's Liberation Front would say, there is doubled maternity pay and doubled maternity leave. There is extra child benefit as well. There is, of course, the case that we have spent more on pensioners than we would have done if we had relinked the basic state pension with earnings, and many other things. I can recommend to my hon. Friend the excellent booklet published by the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers on 300 Labour achievements.

Q3. [67223] Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Under the Prime Minister's new theory of ministerial responsibility, the Home Secretary is staying on to sort out this shambles. Will the Prime Minister tell us how long the Home Secretary has got to do that and whether he will be standing down afterwards?

The Prime Minister: First, for the reasons that I have already explained, since 30 March, for the first time in decades, cases have been considered before the release of foreign nationals from prison. I come back to the point that I made a moment or two ago. One part of dealing with this is taking measures now to legislate so that everyone who is a foreign national who serves a prison sentence is automatically deported.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): I recently visited Bishop Barrington school in my constituency, which has got a new science lab and sports hall. The Labour county council, working together with the Government, has spent £38 million on refurbishing and redeveloping 64 schools in my constituency. Is Bishop Auckland unique, or is the pattern repeated throughout the country?

The Prime Minister: It is repeated in the next-door constituency to my hon. Friend's—I can tell her that—and also in constituencies up and down the country. The fact is that about £1,500 more per pupil is being spent by this Government. Anyone who goes to their constituencies can see, whether it is in primary or secondary schools, new buildings—often a new school—new computer equipment and extra teachers and classroom assistants. That is of course why larger and larger numbers of our children are passing their exams at 11, 16 and 18, and why the education system is improving all the time.

Q4. [67224] Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): When will the Prime Minister rewrite the ministerial code to reflect the new doctrine that the bigger the shambles, the more essential it is that the responsible Minister remains in office?

The Prime Minister: For the very reason that I have just given to the Leader of the Opposition and others, this is not a problem created by this Home Secretary—[Interruption.] It is perfectly obvious when one looks at the facts—I know that the hon. Gentleman does not want to hear them—that this is a problem that for the first time is being resolved.

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab): The Home Office is a huge Department covering crime, antisocial behaviour, drugs, prisons, international terrorism and people trafficking—all sorts of issues. It is mission impossible for almost any Home Secretary—[HON. MEMBERS: "Especially this one."] No, I think that this Home Secretary will sort the problems out and should remain in his job. Does the Prime Minister agree that the Home Office should be split up at some stage so that there are two Cabinet Ministers with responsibility for each of the new Departments?

The Prime Minister: I totally understand why my hon. Friend says that. In my view, the fit between immigration, asylum, crime and prisons, on the other hand, is a proper fit. The issue, which is important when we go back over the history, is that part of the problem is the rules that apply to people when they are eligible for deportation. For example, there was the case by the immigration appeal tribunal in the Chindamo case back in 2001, when the Home Office was prevented from considering deportation early in the prison sentence of the foreign national.

If we do not change the rules—it does not matter what structure we have—it will be difficult to do what I am sure the public want, which is to say, "If you come to our country and you are a foreign national, and you commit a crime, you should go back to your own country." That is the real part of the issue. It is absolutely understandable why people raise the issues that they do, but if we look back over the history of this issue, we find that this is a system that has never worked, not for reasons to do with structure in the Home Office but for reasons to do with the system itself.

Q5. [67225] Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Has the Prime Minister recently read paragraphs 2.7 to 2.10 of the ministerial code of conduct? When a Parliamentary Private Secretary at the Department for International Development publicly calls for the Prime Minister to retire and when a PPS in the Home Office, no less, suggests that the Deputy Prime Minister should reconsider his position, does that not suggest that collective responsibility has broken down, or that the Government are in meltdown?

The Prime Minister: The question of my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) about the achievements of the Government gave the answer to the hon. Gentleman. I appreciate why he wants to go through the details of the ministerial code. I think that the strength of the economy, the investment in schools and hospitals, issues like the minimum wage and 2 million pensioners lifted out of hardship and 700,000 children lifted out of poverty—the hon. Gentleman can shake his head, but many people are grateful for the progress that has been made.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): Just for the record, neither of the Parliamentary Private Secretaries at DFID, of whom I am one, called for my right hon. Friend to stand down. Further to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland), does my right hon. Friend agree that anyone who has been in receipt of tax credit or pension credit, or all the other wonderful things that he mentioned, has a vested interest in judging on which side their bread is buttered? If they want their jam today to continue, should they not vote Labour tomorrow?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely right in drawing attention to the combination of tax credits, which give enormous support to families, particularly those with young children, and the extra increases in child benefit—child benefit was frozen under the Conservative Government—which has risen by 25 per cent. in real terms, along with the minimum wage. We did not merely introduce the minimum wage in the teeth of the opposition that was mounted by the Conservatives, but increased it. The combination of tax credits and the minimum wage is making work pay for people. That is one of the reasons why we have 2 million extra people in work. My hon. Friend is absolutely right that there are families that benefit from tax credits, as do pensioners. Without them, they would still be living in the poverty that they experienced under the Conservatives.

Q6. [67226] Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): The Prime Minister is probably not aware of the English cultural cleansing caused by Arts Council England's failure to promote England's traditional folk dance and song, nor that the council has spent £5.5 million for an arts facility that will promote contemporary Latin American art. Will he find out what is going on at the Arts Council?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is right about one thing: I was not aware of it. I was hoping that he might give us a demonstration of English folklore dancing. I will certainly look into the matter and correspond with the hon. Gentleman. Personally, I think that there is a place for both.

Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): May I bring my right hon. Friend's attention to an article that appeared in The Times on Monday, in which the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) said that his party risked being "tilted too much in any one direction, that makes us politically less stable and that makes us less attractive"?

Does my right hon. Friend agree that that thinly veiled attack—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for the Prime Minister. The hon. Gentleman should have a word with the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox).

Q8. [67228] Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): Motorists who drive dangerously are regularly escaping prosecution through address scams that put them beyond the law. With the Road Safety Bill before Parliament, the Prime Minister could solve the problem now by telling Home Office Ministers to get a grip, protect the public and save lives. Will he do so?

The Prime Minister: I will certainly look into the matter that the hon. Gentleman has raised. In principle, I would be deeply in sympathy with him, but I need to find out exactly why that has happened.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that everyone should do their bit to help reduce greenhouse gas emissions? In that context, what advice would he offer to those planning to buy a new car or contemplating a 2,000-mile private jet round trip to publicise the dangers of global warming?

The Prime Minister: Everyone makes their contribution in their own way. The point that my hon. Friend makes is right in this sense: if we are to tackle climate change, it is essential that we get international agreement. It is worth pointing out to the House that, as a result of the growth being experienced by China, we estimate that even if we shut down all the emissions in this country, it would take the Chinese economy about 12 months to make up the difference. Of course, we must continue our leadership role on the issue. That is why we will more than meet—indeed, we will double—our Kyoto targets. It is important that we take measures in the United Kingdom, but there is no serious answer to climate change except at an international level.

Q9. [67229] Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): The community health White Paper published in January this year, at paragraph 6.42, correctly states:

"community facilities should not be lost in response to short-term budgetary pressures", yet all four community hospitals in my constituency, plus a 26-bed elderly mentally infirm unit in Trowbridge and our midwife-led midwifery unit are all scheduled for the axe to sort out deficits. Given that the Secretary of State for Health today declined me an audience to discuss the impending disaster facing my constituents in West Wiltshire, will the Prime Minister at least attempt to reconcile the rhetoric in her White Paper with the bitter reality facing my constituents on the ground?

The Prime Minister: I cannot comment in detail on the issues in relation to the hon. Gentleman's health care system, though I am happy to correspond with him about that. After all, the West Wiltshire primary care trust funding has increased by 32 per cent. and will increase by 25 per cent. over the next two years. That is an increase of £31 million. I hope the hon. Gentleman understands that, whatever amount of money we put into the health service, PCTs and hospital trusts must live within their means. We need to sort the system out precisely so that the benefits in the White Paper can be achieved for patients. I point out to him, as it would be fair to give the other side of the picture for a little balance, that, in respect of those waiting more than six months for an operation in his area, in 1997 there were almost 12,000, and now the answer is three. That is at least some significant improvement.

Q10. [67230] Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): I raise with the Prime Minister a legacy issue—the Olympics legacy. The Olympics has huge potential to benefit communities in London, especially in east London, where my constituency is. Will he commit the Olympic Delivery Authority to hold talks with local councillors so that projects to boost employment, sports and better lifestyle, skills training and sustainable development for the benefit of communities in London are taken forward?

The Prime Minister: I pay tribute to the work that is being done in my hon. Friend's area in respect of the Olympics. He is right to say that there are enormous potential benefits, and I am sure the Olympic Development Authority will be happy to meet local representatives. Two things will happen, beyond doubt. First, thousands of jobs will be created in the area. Secondly, after the games, the athletes' village will be converted into more than 3,500 apartments which will be a mix of social and other housing, particularly for key workers such as teachers and nurses. The London Olympic institute will be sited there as well, so it will be a huge development that brings lasting benefit to the people in my hon. Friend's area and in the whole of London.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): How can the Prime Minister say that every foreign criminal who serves a sentence of imprisonment should be automatically deported, when he knows perfectly well that his own Human Rights Act makes that impossible?

The Prime Minister: That is wrong. That is not the reason. Over the time—[Interruption.] I am very glad that the right hon. and learned Gentleman got to his feet, because I will remind him of what actually happened when he was Home Secretary. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Do not shout the Prime Minister down.

The Prime Minister: The fact is that before the Human Rights Act—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Andrew Turner, you keep doing it, but you should not defy the Chair.

The Prime Minister: Before the Human Rights Act, the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not deport all foreign prisoners, did he? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] No, exactly, which is my point. This system did not work while he was Home Secretary and has not worked whilst others were Home Secretary, and it is time to change it. But since the right hon. and learned Gentleman got to his feet, let me remind him what we inherited from him. The asylum backlog was 60,000, decisions took 22 months, and the number of removals was one in five. He has about as good a record as a Liberal Democrat would have had.

Deportation and Removals

12.31 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke) rose—

Hon. Members: Resign!

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will take points of order after the statement.

Mr. Clarke: With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement on the deportation and removal of foreign national prisoners. I will update the House on our progress in considering the cases that I reported last week had been released without proper consideration, and I will set out the facts in relation to the reports on foreign national prisoners and the removal of failed asylum seekers, which my Department received over a period of time. I will also set out the action taken by my Department in response to those reports, including the robust procedures put in place to deal with the very specific issue of consideration of deportation pre-release. Finally I will set out, as promised a week ago at this Dispatch Box, the conclusions I have come to on reforms necessary to the policy framework in which deportations are considered and dealt with.

Let me begin by confirming, as I set out to the House last week, that as a result of a series of decisions taken earlier this year, including improved management structures, more resources and tightened procedures, we have for the past month had a system to ensure that further cases cannot be missed. That situation will continue to improve as we move over time as a matter of routine to consider for deportation all potential cases a year before they leave prison, or at the beginning of the sentence if that is less.

Last Friday I wrote to you, Mr. Speaker, to set out our progress in dealing with those cases released without prior consideration of deportation, and I would now like to update the House on the figures that I published then. As of yesterday evening, consideration of all the most serious 79 cases had been completed, with deportation action having been commenced in respect of 70. The remaining nine are cases where deportation action is not being pursued, in accordance with current policy criteria. Of those 70, 32 are now accounted for and either deported or within our control. The immigration service and the police are continuing priority operations to bring the remainder under control. I will not give further details at this stage, as the House will appreciate that my first priority is the efficacy of those operations.

As I made clear in last Friday's letter, Mr. Speaker, our second priority for consideration is the 103 cases in which, as we stated to the Public Accounts Committee, the type of offence was unknown. Data on these cases is now complete, and I can say that there are 11 of these cases where the original offence was within our category of "more serious offences". Consideration for deportation of all but one of these cases has now been completed and deportation action has commenced in respect of seven of them. Since their release, none of these individuals has committed any of the more serious further offences.

That deals with all the cases where individuals were originally convicted of more serious offences. Of the 1,023 cases in total, consideration has commenced in 574 cases, of which 554 have been completed, with deportation action being pursued in 446 cases. Perhaps I should add that almost all the cases that have so far been given prominence in the media in recent days are not among those upon which I have been reporting to the House, although some do indeed raise important issues of policy.

Whatever the historic failings, I want to thank all those engaged in the very intensive work that has continued throughout the bank holiday weekend. That has included a major police incident room in Portsmouth, a casework operation in the immigration and nationality directorate in Croydon, work by prison and probation staff, and joint police and IND operations to detain offenders decided for deportation. There is a very high operational commitment to this work, for which I want to express my appreciation.

From the outset I have acknowledged that there has been a systemic failure within the Home Office, which I regret and for which I have apologised. For example, it was only in 1999 that records on this subject began to be kept at all. However, there have been a number of allegations of inaction by the Home Office in a range of areas over a period of time that have portrayed what I believe to be a false position. I want now to set the record straight.

There are three distinct issues. The first is the broad issue of the rising number of foreign nationals in our prisons—rising from 5,587 in 2000 to almost 10,000 in 2005— and the policy framework for their deportation. The second is the removal of failed asylum seekers and our action to reach the so-called "tipping point". The third is the specific operational question of the backlog of cases.

The first issue—the overall approach to foreign national prisoners and their deportation—was the one raised over a period of time by respective chief inspectors of prisons. In summary, they have mainly made the argument that the Government were not paying sufficient attention to foreign national prisoners or their human rights, particularly in relation to detention after the end of their sentences. The Home Office has sought to deal with those concerns by a variety of means, which, among other things, led to the deportation of about 3,000 foreign national prisoners in the years 2004 and 2005—a figure to compare with a total foreign national prisoner population of 9,690 prisoners in 2005. Anne Owers, the chief inspector of prisons, acknowledged some progress on that broad issue in her report of 2004–05.

The second issue—the removal of failed asylum seekers—was the main focus of the National Audit Office report of July 2005, to which much reference has been made, entitled "Returning Failed Asylum Seekers". The overall conclusion of the report was that the prompt departure or removal of unsuccessful asylum applicants should be prioritised—a conclusion that squared exactly with the Home Office prioritisation of asylum in general and, in particular, action to reach the point where more asylum seekers were leaving the country than there were unfounded new applications. That was indeed achieved in February this year and was widely welcomed.

The NAO report also noted that action on criminal cases was not being initiated early enough to allow preparations for removal to be made pre-release from prison, although the report acknowledged the increase in resources already directed to dealing with such cases. The Home Office immediately responded to the NAO comment. Additional staffing of 90 caseworkers to come on stream from January 2006 was identified, as were a further £2.7 million of resources to come on line from 1 April 2006. Immigration service staff were placed in four London prisons and surgeries were held in 60 prisons, a weekly report on the foreign national prisoner population was initiated, and new arrangements were made to move foreign nationals who had completed their sentence from prison to immigration detention facilities at the rate of about 300 a month. In addition, management arrangements were strengthened.

The NAO report was the basis for the Public Accounts Committee evidence session on 26 October 2005, which also focused on the issue of the removal of failed asylum seekers. I have already acknowledged the important role played by the Public Accounts Committee in focusing attention on these matters. I also very much welcome the announcement that the Home Affairs Committee will extend its inquiry to cover this matter. The House may recall that I first raised publicly my concern over the broad policy issues raised by the rise in the number of foreign national prisoners in evidence to the Home Affairs Committee on 25 October last year.

Following the PAC hearing, the Home Office set about collecting and cleansing the data in order that we could report properly to the Committee and take appropriate action on the true size and nature of the backlog. The first report was made to the PAC in November, but closer analysis revealed that the size of the backlog was larger than previously thought and, crucially, that serious offenders were among the backlog. That was reported to me at the end of March 2006, together with plans to recheck the information before it was put into the public domain, to begin casework on the backlog and to work with prisons and probation on the serious cases. The PAC itself published its report on 14 March. It addressed the issue of foreign national prisoners in the body of its report, but it was not in a position to draw firm conclusions or make firm recommendations.

The rise in the number of foreign nationals in our prisons and the overall policy framework for dealing with issues of their deportation is a long-standing concern about which detailed work has been proceeding for some months in the Home Office. I would now like to report my preliminary conclusions to the House. These are complex and difficult issues, so I will shortly publish—before the end of May—a consultation paper with specific and detailed proposals from the beginning to the end of the process. The guiding principle will be that foreign nationals guilty of criminality should expect to be deported.

To achieve that, I will consult in the following areas. First, the data which identify an individual as a foreign national must be captured at the beginning of the criminal justice system, including at the point of arrest and as the case proceeds through the courts. At each stage, there should be sanctions against individuals who give false information on nationality, or indeed no information at all.

Secondly, it is important to ensure that the issue of deportation is raised throughout the sentencing process. Following recommendations from the sentencing advisory panel, the Sentencing Guidelines Council will shortly be publishing draft guidelines to set clear criteria according to which judges should make deportation recommendations when sentencing.

Thirdly, we need to deport prisoners at an earlier stage in their sentence. Ideally, prisoners should serve their sentence in full in their home country. The UK currently has prisoner transfer agreements with more than 90 countries, and we have recently ratified an agreement with India and other such agreements are awaiting ratification. Within the European Union, we are strongly supporting the efforts of the Austrian presidency to secure a directive which will enable the repatriation of prisoners within the EU without requiring the consent of the prisoner. In addition, the Criminal Justice Act 2003 introduced arrangements to consider whether prisoners should be deported before the end of the sentence, and we will consult upon proposals to enable this to happen earlier in a prisoner's sentence.

Fourthly, I want to make it clear that the Government not only intend to ensure that the current system operates effectively, but seek after consultation to extend the categories of offenders who are considered for deportation. We will therefore publish proposals to consider for deportation a wider range of offenders.

I want to state clearly that where deportation can properly be considered, the clear presumption should be that deportation will follow unless there are special circumstances why it cannot. We will consult on whether that presumption should be made statutory through primary legislation. Such a presumption would include all criminals sentenced to imprisonment, all those convicted for an offence listed in an order under section 72 of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002, all those on the sex offenders register, repeat offenders and, of course, all those recommended for deportation by the sentencing judge. We believe that there is a strong case for extending those proposals to any individual who is convicted of an imprisonable offence, whether or not a sentence of imprisonment was actually given, and we will consult on that too.

Those proposals would replace the current practice of considering for deportation only non-European economic area nationals with a sentence of 12 months or more; EEA nationals with a sentence of 24 months or more; cases in which the individual has three lesser convictions in a five-year period; and all cases in which the sentencing judge has recommended deportation.

Finally, in relation to our policy framework, I have already said that we are now ensuring that all deportation decisions are being taken before an individual is released. That will continue, but I will also consult on the following steps to ensure effective implementation of deportation and removal decisions: the full use of the less burdensome process of administrative removal rather than deportation in eligible cases where individuals have no or limited leave to remain; more effective procedures in relation to psychiatric hospitals; a new power in primary legislation to enable us to detain an individual pending consideration whether they should be deported or removed as a result of their criminal conviction; amending primary legislation so that deportation appeals, save for those raising asylum or human rights issues that are not clearly unfounded, are heard after the individual has been deported from the UK; and the introduction of an automatic bar on return for all those who are subject to administrative removal due to criminality, which is already the case with those who are deported.

I should add that I will also consult on proposals to achieve a more coherent approach to taking criminality into account in decisions on who is allowed into the country, who is allowed to stay, who is granted settlement and who can acquire British citizenship. These are significant proposals which, as I said earlier, we have been preparing for some months—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] We have. They will, I am sure, also be controversial, but I hope that, unlike with some previous legislation in this area, we can rely on the full-hearted support of both the main Opposition parties in ensuring that foreign nationals who commit crimes are deported rapidly to the countries from which they come.

This has been an unedifying episode for all of us in the Home Office who are charged with the protection of the public—[Interruption.] Yes, it has. But I said that I would stay and put the situation right. I have set out the results of the intensive work that is being done by the agencies to deal with the outstanding cases. I have set out the steps taken to improve our systems on foreign national prisoners, including robust procedures that now mean that the appropriate processes are in place, and I have set out my proposals to deport more offenders, more quickly. I commend the statement to the House.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): The first duty of Government is to protect the public, and the Government have failed in that duty in a most appalling fashion. They have done so, not by failing to identify suspected criminals—although they have done that—and not by failing to catch criminals, but by releasing over 1,000 criminals from their own prisons without consideration. Ministers have lost control of their Departments and they have introduced a new doctrine of ministerial responsibility—the bigger one's mistake, the more one deserves to stay in one's job. The Home Secretary has tried to make a virtue of the fact that he has told us the facts—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Ronnie Campbell, I know it is difficult for you, but perhaps you could be quiet for a while.

David Davis: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The Home Secretary tried to make a virtue of the fact that he has told us the facts. In truth, however, he was forced by the Public Accounts Committee to admit to his failure and he was dragged to the House to answer for it, both last week and today. We now know that he did not even tell the Prime Minister—who, I see, is giving his usual support. Last week I asked the Home Secretary four questions; he answered none of them.

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale) (Lab): My right hon. Friend answered them all.

David Davis: The Home Secretary answered none. He said that he would answer them by the end of the week, but he still had not answered any of them by then. This week I shall ask him eight questions, and the House, and the public, will expect eight answers. Before I do so, however, let me say that of course I applaud any action that will address the problem, although much of it amounts to bolting the prison door after the prisoners have fled.

I understand that the Home Secretary intends to introduce new powers to create a presumption of deportation for foreign criminals. I applaud that intention, but—[Interruption.] In answer to the Government Chief Whip's sub-vocal heckle, may I remind her of the powers that the Home Secretary already has? The Immigration Act 1971 gives him explicit powers to deport any non-British citizen under section 3(5) if he "deems . . . deportation to be conducive to the public good".

Laws are fine, but the public require competent action.

Let me turn to my questions. First, there is the length of time that it took the Home Secretary to alert the police to the problem. He and his predecessors were warned several times, as he has now admitted, by Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons and by some police forces, of the growing magnitude of the problem of foreign criminals being released rather than deported. The Home Secretary was warned again by the National Audit Office on 14 July last year. Can he tell the House precisely why he did not take action 10 months ago? Why did he not do 10 months ago what he did last week? At least 400 criminals identified in the Home Office's first submission to the Public Accounts Committee could have been arrested and deported. If, for some inexplicable reason, he was unable to act 10 months ago, why did he not act one month ago, when he had a full list available? Why did he tell the press about the problem before he told the police, giving more than 1,000 criminals the chance to disappear before the police could catch them?

We are told that from last July, procedures were implemented to increase the number of staff and the resourcing of the unit concerned, and that there is now a "proper case management system"—I think that I quote exactly. So can the Home Secretary explain why we hear persistent reports that that department is understaffed, undertrained, and largely manned by temporaries? Is not the truth that whatever he did it was ineffective, as the rate of release of foreign prisoners into the community went up after July? Is that acceleration in the release of potentially dangerous criminals into the community not a clear demonstration of his own failure?

The Home Secretary cannot even give us what he promised last week—the full number of crimes committed by the 1,000-plus criminals since their release. Civitas, the respected Home Affairs think-tank, whose director is a member of the Home Secretary's own Statistics Commission, estimates the likely number of convictions—not crimes—for the 1,000 criminals at about 700. That is 700 crimes as a result of this failure. And the Home Secretary did not tell us how many crimes were committed by the 288 criminals released after he was explicitly told about the problem—the criminals who are absolutely and inescapably his own responsibility. Civitas estimates that they would have been convicted for 100 crimes committed within six months of release.

On Friday, the Home Secretary told us that of the 79 foreign criminals he considered to have committed serious offences, deportation action had been started on 70. But only 32 of those 70 have been located. That means that 38 are not in his control, presumably because he warned them through the press three days before. So, even on his own figures he is failing in more than half the cases.

The Home Secretary should not forget that 1,023 foreign criminals are at issue here. He has just told us that deportation is being pursued in 446 cases. Will he tell us how many of those are within police control? When the Home Office completes the deportation exercise, how many of these 1,000 foreign criminals will remain at large in the United Kingdom?

I am concerned that those 1,000 are just the beginning of the problem. With almost every day that passes, we hear of a new failure. This morning's papers are full of the story of the suspect in the tragic murder of WPC Sharon Beshenivsky. I do not expect the Home Secretary to comment on that case, and I will be very careful. As I understand it, the suspect was given indefinite leave to remain in 2000. In the subsequent five years he was convicted of three offences and sentenced to three separate prison terms. Yet in March 2005 the Home Office decided not to deport him to Somalia, even though, a year earlier, the Home Office's operational guidance note on Somalia said:

"there is no longer any policy that precludes the return to any region of Somalia".

In the past two years, the Home Secretary's office has made more than 2,000 decisions against deportation. I have to ask him, in the light of this and many other examples: is he comfortable that those decisions were made with sufficient regard for the safety of the British public?

Last week, a whole new category of cases was raised by Lord Ramsbotham, the previous chief inspector of prisons—that of 1,500 prisoners who have no nationality record, or a false record. How many people in that category have been released into the community without consideration for deportation in the past seven years? Again, is the Home Secretary persuaded that this oversight has not unnecessarily jeopardised the safety of the British public?

Finally—[Hon. Members: "Hooray!"] Labour Members will not be happy about this either, because it is not amusing. Last week one of the murderers of Mary-Ann Leneghan was sentenced to more than 20 years in prison. He had been recommended for deportation on his 18th birthday, but was not deported and was involved in this hideous crime just a few months later. This raises a whole new category of people who are recommended for deportation but who are not, for one reason or another, imprisoned. Can the Home Secretary give us an indication of the size of that category and whether he has considered policy with regard to such people, as clearly some represent an unnecessary risk to the public.

Together, those groups represent several thousand people who are a potential risk to the public and should be considered for deportation. It may therefore be that the 1,000 whom the Home Secretary says he has already considered are just the tip of the iceberg. Has he considered these categories in detail and what he might do to minimise the risk to the public? Whatever his answer, I would like to know why he has not done anything to deal with these potentially serious risks to public safety. There are two possibilities: either the Home Secretary did not know about these problems, and was therefore negligent, or he did know but did nothing effective about them, and was therefore incompetent. The answer is not simply more laws, and it is certainly not just more headlines. The answer is a more competent Home Secretary—and that is the very least the British public deserves.

Mr. Clarke: The right hon. Gentleman raised several points—

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): Twenty-nine.

Mr. Clarke: I do not think that it was 29, but I am interested to hear that that is the number that my hon. Friend was able to identify.

First, I paid tribute last Wednesday, and I will again, to the role of the Public Accounts Committee in this process. It has been a positive process, and that is what the PAC should do. Secondly, in answer to the right hon. Gentleman's question about what I did about the National Audit Office report last July, I have already clearly set out the whole series of measures that I took to deal with its recommendations and to improve our performance in that area. Moving on to his third point, I am the first to concede that there remain issues about implementing that in the most effective way. I do not accept his stricture that the IND, or the Home Office in general, is understaffed, undertrained and so on, but I do think that there is a serious point about way in which we organise ourselves in those areas. We are changing that as a result of the NAO report and other things, precisely in order to address those issues.

On what the right hon. Gentleman calls the accelerating procedure of failure, the reason for those figures, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said a moment ago at Prime Minister's questions, is that as a result of the NAO proposals we sent immigration officers into prisons, tightened the procedure, identified more problems to take up, and solved more problems. The problem is—I have to be straight about this—that if one tries to sort out these problems, one turns up more problems. That is the situation that must be candidly addressed.

As for the right hon. Gentleman's friend from Civitas, perhaps I could remind him that, as he knows very well, in an attempt to get all-party agreement about the way in which crime statistics are dealt with, I invited him to nominate individuals to a panel to review that matter. The gentleman concerned was duly nominated by the right hon. Gentleman, and I appointed him because I wanted some consensus, so of course I am interested in his views on all these matters.

On the question of the people whom the police and the immigration service are still pursuing, I am not, as I said in my statement, going to give a moment-by-moment update on that, but I believe that they are making extremely good progress as a result of the situation that I set out.

Finally, I come to the list of cases that the right hon. Gentleman raised, including the person allegedly involved in the murder of Sharon Beshenivsky, the cases raised by Lord Ramsbotham, and the case involving the killers of Mary-Ann Leneghan. Those are very serious cases. As the right hon. Gentleman acknowledges, they are not among the 1,000 that we are talking about, but as he also acknowledges, they raise precisely the questions that it is right for us to address in deciding how we deport more effectively people who are guilty of criminality. It is no good the right hon. Gentleman saying that we do not need more laws or more procedures, that it is all hunky-dory and the problems are simply down to poor administration. We need more laws so that we carry matters through properly and I hope that, this time, he will support the proposals.

Mr. Nick Clegg (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): The Home Secretary predictably showered the House with a volley of new figures and statistics. We will scrutinise those new figures with the attention that they deserve. We already know from the figures released at the end of last Friday that they pose as many questions as they provide answers.

For example, why has the Home Secretary not explained to us how he compiled the figures and what definition he used to conclude that only 79 cases related to serious offences? He claims today that, of those 79, deportation action has commenced for 70, but he went on to say that 38 of the 70 have not been accounted for. How can one proceed with deportation action for the 70 most grave offenders if one does not know—or appear to know—where 38 of them are? We need answers to those questions for the statistics that he provided today to have any credibility.

The Home Secretary has announced new primary legislation. Let us be clear: the current fiasco did not arise because of an absence of legislation or a lack of rules. Yesterday, we found an 86-page document from the Prison Service that provides forensic guidance on how to consider the deportation of non-British offenders. The fiasco did not arise because of a lack of powers enjoyed by the Home Secretary; he already enjoys wide discretion to remove anyone who is deemed not be conducive to the public good. Since 1997, the Government have introduced up to 36 new laws and hundreds and hundreds of new offences. Surely he acknowledges that placing yet more pressure on an overburdened criminal justice system through new rules and laws devised in the panic of the current fiasco might prove little more than a cosmetic solution.

We will consider positively any measures necessary to deport those who should and can be deported more quickly than at present, and especially the measures that the Home Secretary outlined to encourage offenders to serve their sentences in their home countries once convicted here. However, we will not welcome the measures if they prove, on further reflection and analysis, to be a knee-jerk reaction, designed to grab headlines rather than offenders and to help the Government out of a self-inflicted fiasco.

Our prisons are grotesquely overcrowded. The probation service is demoralised and under-resourced. The Government are at permanent loggerheads with the judiciary and reoffending rates, which have a direct bearing on what we are considering, are among the highest in the western world, with up to 70 per cent. of young offenders offending again within two years of release from prison. The Government have presided over lamentably low conviction rates for some of the most serious crimes imaginable, such as rape.

Surely the Home Secretary should start getting a grip on the Government's woeful mismanagement of the criminal justice system rather than indulging in rushed, new legislation in response to recent events. Our focus will remain on the serial incompetence of a system in which the basic rules to examine every case for deportation simply did not operate. The Home Secretary should take political responsibility for that incompetence. He has said nothing today to suggest that Ministers were anything other than neglectful in failing to tackle such grave issues until they were shamed into doing so in recent days. He should do the decent thing—we know that he has done it before—and ask the Prime Minister to release him from his predicament and allow him to resign today.

Mr. Clarke: First, when I stated that 70 people had been approved for deportation and procedures were going ahead in those cases, that is true and the police are working on it, as I reported to the House. Secondly, I have not sought in any way to hide the fact that the Home Office made serious mistakes. I said that last week, I say it this week and I continue to assert it. As I said in the statement, I believe that several positive things have happened side by side with that mistake and it not right for the hon. Gentleman to say that I did not set them out. We have made significant progress on several matters.

The hon. Gentleman needs to grasp a key point when he speaks about considering the legislative position. In every deportation case, a battle goes on between the individual to be deported and the state that seeks to deport. The battle takes place in the courts, with a series of judgments appealed through a long procedure. That is the law of the land, as it is entitled to be. However—I stress this in the strongest terms—the battle about case after case, occasionally with important judgments, such as the Chindamo judgment, going against the Government, is a key factor in any Government's ability to act decisively. That is why I say that our response must be to go back to the basics, and make a presumption that non-British criminals should be deported. That is what we will set out. The challenge for the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues in the House and the other place is whether they are prepared to sign up to that principle.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): Following my right hon. Friend's comments, does he agree that one of the most unsatisfactory parts of the current law that has been revealed in the past few days is the way in which it requires Home Office officials to judge not only what is in the public interest, but the chance of defending a particular case against a subsequent court challenge? Does not that produce a deeply unsatisfactory and inexplicable position for our constituents, whereby it appears that Home Office officials have simply decided not to deport somebody who then commits a serious offence? Is not the great advantage of a presumption in favour of deportation not simply that we will not have future backlogs but that the House can say what it wants to happen on behalf of our constituents, and it will be clear when the courts decide in an individual case that such action should not follow?

Mr. Clarke: My right hon. Friend is correct. I pay tribute to him and the Select Committee that he chairs because it decided a good while back—partly, I am sure, in response to the NAO report, but also for other reasons—to go through the detailed workings of the immigration and asylum system. It did not simply take evidence in the House but considered the current procedures, and so it should because our approach should be scrutinised, precisely for the reason that my right hon. Friend gave. That is why I welcome the Select Committee's decision to widen its terms of reference to include the management of foreign national prisoners. That is important. My right hon. Friend is correct and I hope that the Select Committee will make recommendations to that effect and that the House will listen to them.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): Listening to the Home Secretary, I am sure that I am not alone in smelling a rat. Again, when a problem arises, a member of the Government comes to the House, denies responsibility and says, "Here's another tonne of legislation, which we will lay on the problem to resolve it." The courts have made it clear that the Home Secretary retains the absolute right to make the decision to deport somebody and they will not gainsay him on that. The idea that the proposed presumption will suddenly change that practice is nonsense.

The Home Secretary misses another point, too. What will he do about those whom he cannot deport? Will they simply wander the country because he could not deport them simply because they could not get a flight?

Mr. Clarke: I have done the opposite of denying responsibility for the matter. From the beginning, I acknowledged my responsibility for the mistakes that have been made. It is fair to say that I have also sought credit for the positive changes that we have made side by side with the mistakes, but I accept responsibility completely and categorically, and I do not believe that the right hon. Gentleman has the right to say that I have not done so.

On the right hon. Gentleman's fundamental point about how we deal with deportations, he knows from his extensive experience how difficult such issues are. It is not simply a matter of being unable to find a plane. There are access and logistical problems but, as he well knows, there is also a range of other different issues to consider.

I dealt with that specific question in the statement. I said that, in cases in which we cannot deport, we should consider primary legislation to extend our powers. That possibility will be tackled in the consultation paper.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Like control orders.

Mr. Clarke: No, not like control orders. The hon. Gentleman should face a fact: we have the power to keep in prison those who have committed offences until the end of their sentence; we have the power to keep under immigration detention those whom we have a realistic prospect of deporting, but we do not have the power, on my say-so or anybody else's, to keep people in prison because we feel like it because of the risk that they might pose. That is the dilemma and the problem. It is why we need to consider new legislation and ascertain how to deal with the matter.

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): My right hon. Friend referred in his statement to the removal of failed asylum seekers. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Clegg) referred in his question to the fact that there was already legislation on the statute book to deal with such cases. Why did my right hon. Friend, in responding to the hon. Gentleman, fail to refer to the case of the failed asylum seeker in Manchester who stood in the council elections as a Liberal Democrat candidate and was elected? He returned to the country from which he claimed he had been seeking asylum to attend a wedding, and remains in this country now only because he benefited from an amnesty granted by my right hon. Friend's predecessor.

Mr. Clarke: The short answer is that that is a result of my natural generosity of spirit, which I try to show at all times to the Liberal Democrats as I cannot give them any other support.

My right hon. Friend was the first Member of Parliament to visit me on the day I was appointed Home Secretary. He took me to his constituency office—just off the Lobby—to show me the filing cabinets full of constituents' cases that had not been properly dealt with by the system that was in place at the time, and about which he had made representations. He said to me, "You've got to get this sorted out", or words to that effect. He was right. The point that he made was that the problem went back over a long period, well into the term of the previous Conservative Administration. That is what we are trying to put right, and I am determined to achieve that.

Anne Main (St. Albans) (Con): Last week, I asked the Home Secretary whether the people who had committed serious sexual offences were put on the sex offenders register before they were released, as that was vital for maintaining confidence that the register could help our local police forces. His reply was:

> "I assure the hon. Lady that precisely the same procedures on the sex offenders register applied to the foreign nationals whom she has described as apply to anybody who commits a sex offence."—[Official Report, 26 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 588.]

If that is the case, how come senior police officers have said recently in the national press that there are serious offenders, including sex offenders, of whom they have no details whatever? Will the Secretary of State fill me in on whether he feels his statement last week reflected the true situation?

Mr. Clarke: I am not sure to which statement the hon. Lady is referring, but I do not believe that those views are right. The police have been intimately involved in this approach through their national command centre in Portsmouth, and they have dealt with a large number of issues through the police national computer. I do not think that the specific remarks that the hon. Lady reports are correct, but perhaps she could drop me a note with their particulars, and I will answer them in detail.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): Sharon Beshenivsky lived at Hainworth, in my constituency, until her murder. My colleagues from Bradford and I attended her funeral at Bradford cathedral. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the most precious of human rights is the right to life itself? I welcome his comments, and I am impressed that we seem to be moving in the right direction. The Prime Minister also commented just now on overhauling the system and changing the rules. If we are, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) mentioned, to have a presumption in favour of deportation, would Mustaf Jama—the prime suspect in Sharon's murder—be capable of being deported if he were to come before the people who discuss deportations? Given the changes that are to be introduced, would he now be capable of being deported? Will my right hon. Friend also comment on the letter that the Leader of the Opposition waved at us earlier when he was talking about prisoners switching to become asylum seekers before they were deported? I had understood that we had put an absolute stop to that switching.

Mr. Clarke: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for taking up the case of her former constituent. She and I discussed the matter yesterday after the press reporting of the situation. I cannot confirm that any legislation will have a particular impact on any individual case—I am not going to comment on specific circumstances—but I can say that the whole intent of the legislation is to change the balance of assumption in favour of the rights of people who want to avoid having crimes committed against them, rather than the rights of individual criminals. That is what we are proposing, and that is what I think should happen.

On my hon. Friend's final point, I will examine the case that she mentioned, and I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition will let me have a copy of the letter that he was brandishing in the House today. I will respond in detail to my hon. Friend on that point, but I believe that steps have already been taken to deal with those matters.

Dr. William McCrea (South Antrim) (DUP): Do the Home Secretary, the Home Office and the police know where all the dangerous foreign national criminals are? If they do not know where they are, how will they remove or deport them?

Mr. Clarke: As I have said, the police are pursuing all of them on the basis of the extensive intelligence and data that we have about all of those individuals.

Mr. Marsha Singh (Bradford, West) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend understand the anger of my constituents in Bradford, and of people in general, when they discovered that one of the people wanted in connection with the murder of Sharon Beshenivsky was a convicted criminal and a foreign national who had not been recommended, even in principle, for deportation? Why was he not recommended even in principle? Who are these people who cannot see right from wrong? Why was this man not tracked? I welcome much of my right hon. Friend's statement today, but he himself has talked about the systemic failures in the Home Office. How can we have any faith that the new measures will not end up in the same shambles as the previous ones?

Mr. Clarke: I certainly can understand the anger that my hon. Friend describes. He and I also discussed this matter yesterday. I hope that he will acknowledge that the case to which he refers was not one of the specific cases that we have been talking about. As I said yesterday, however, and I say to the House today, it does raise precisely the kind of general questions that my hon. Friend has raised. That is why we need the type of legislative change that I have described. However, my hon. Friend is right to suggest that, after the failures in the Home Office's handling of these matters, we have to win back people's confidence in our capacity to deal with them. I hope that, when he considers those failures, he will set them side by side with our successes, and acknowledge that both have to keep moving forward in a strongly positive direction.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): The Home Secretary will be aware that the language that he has used about the removal of these prisoners was very different from the language used by the Prime Minister just a few minutes earlier from the same Dispatch Box. The Prime Minister said that these criminals would "automatically" be deported. The Home Secretary says that they can expect to be deported unless there are circumstances that would make it inappropriate to do so. Will the Home Secretary now acknowledge that what the Prime Minister said was wrong, and that the Prime Minister was, as usual, using language that he thought would make an effective soundbite, but which was a considerable distance away from the truth?

Mr. Clarke: No, I will not. I do not believe that there was the distinction in language that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has made. If we are being candid about these matters, we should look back to the time during the previous Conservative Government, before he was Home Secretary, when the noble Lord Ferrers said in answer to a question that, of a total sentenced population of 34,000 in December 1991, about 2,600 were known to be foreign nationals, and that the nationality of a further 5,900—a fifth of the prison population—was not recorded. That was the state of affairs that we had to deal with, and it is what we are now putting right.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): On the subject of soundbites, will my right hon. Friend guard against the soundbites—the murmurings about meltdown—that I have heard from Opposition Members? Will he also guard against calls for action from a party that, while it was in power, took no action whatever, collected no figures and cut 2,000 Home Office jobs? I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his announcement today. When he is considering what the House should do next about this problem, will he balance the need to protect our constituents from those who wish them harm against ensuring that the people who come here to make a proper contribution to our economy and our culture still feel welcome to do so?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I am particularly glad that she made reference in the final part of her question to the need to strengthen the cohesion of communities in this country. That is an important and genuine requirement to consider as we balance the issues that are being debated today. I can assure her that the cohesion of communities up and down the country, including her constituency, will be a central consideration for me as we take forward the legislation.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): Following last week's statement, the Home Secretary was kind enough to write to tell me that one of the 79 most dangerous foreign nationals was resident in Scotland. Can he tell me how many of the 1,023 are currently in Scotland? What possible excuse can he give for not notifying the Scottish Executive, the Scottish Prison Service and Scottish police forces when he knew about the difficulties in his Department? Why did he not tell them in time so that something could have been done to ensure that Scottish communities were safer and more secure?

Mr. Clarke: As I said in my statement, I am not in a position to give full information about the 1,000 at this stage. I will do so when I can. On the hon. Gentleman's other question, I dealt with that in the answer that I sent to him, and I will continue to work closely with the Scottish Executive and others to ensure that we bring those matters under control.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has referred to WPC Sharon Beshenivsky. What checks are made by the Prison Service and the immigration and nationality directorate on prisoners' claimed nationality? Where removal is not possible, is administrative detention ever considered? What conditions, such as tagging, are applied on release to people who cannot be deported?

Mr. Clarke: On the hon. Gentleman's second point, yes, we deal with administrative detention. On his third point about tagging, we are looking to extend the ability to use that. As I said to the former Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith), there are serious issues about our legal powers in those circumstances, which is why I called for further consideration. On his first point, he puts his finger on a critical difficulty in this procedure. Many people come into this country having destroyed all their documents and make fraudulent and untrue claims about their nationality. In those cases, it is often extremely difficult to identify the genuine nationality of those concerned. If we do not know which country individuals come from, it is extremely difficult to know where to deport them to. That is a major issue in immigration, and we have done tremendous work in developing the e-borders regime, which tries to identify people more effectively before they enter this country. I will be candid with my hon. Friend, however, that that also raises serious questions, because there are people whose nationality cannot be identified at the outset, which is one of the serious problems that we have had in providing the data that the Public Accounts Committee and the House would wish for.

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): When the Home Secretary wrote to you last Friday, Mr. Speaker, he said that 79 of the prisoners were originally in prison for more serious offences and 13 had committed the most serious offences, by which he meant murder, manslaughter, rape and child sexual offences. If we look at his letter to the PAC last Tuesday, however, we see that three had been in prison for murder, two for manslaughter, nine for rape and five for sexual offences involving minors, making a total of 19, not 13. Can the Home Secretary clear that up? Was he being inaccurate on Tuesday or on Friday, or is there some other explanation? Can he explain—

Mr. Speaker: Order. One supplementary is fine.

Mr. Clarke: I will write to the hon. Gentleman and the PAC about his specific question about the relationship between the issues. As he says, however, it is true that the definitions in each of the cases have not always been entirely straightforward. That is why the situation has arisen with the numbers. The best way to deal with that is to write to him and the PAC.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that because Somalia has entirely disintegrated it has not been possible for many years, including when the Conservatives were in office, to deport anyone to that country, short of taking them up in an aeroplane over Mogadishu and dropping them out with a parachute? Does he therefore agree that it is entirely fanciful—indeed, hypocritical—for Conservative Members and their friends in the media to pretend otherwise?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is correct. That has been more of a difficulty with that country than with just about any other country in the world. It is possible to imagine voluntary return in certain circumstances, which has been achieved in a small number of cases. More generally, however, it has not been possible to proceed for precisely the reasons that he gives.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): Following the points raised by the hon. Members for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer), for Bradford, West (Mr. Singh) and for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney), will the Home Secretary take the opportunity to apologise to the family of WPC Beshenivsky and the people of Bradford for the fact that the main suspect in her murder was allowed to wander the streets when he should have been deported? Will he answer the question that many people in Bradford are asking at the moment: why do he and this Government give more credence to the human rights of foreign criminals than to those of police officers and the general public in this country?

Mr. Clarke: I do not have anything to add to what I have said previously to MPs from that locality.

Mr. Robert Flello (Stoke-on-Trent, South) (Lab): I also welcome the announcement from my right hon. Friend. Many constituents have asked me in recent weeks why foreign nationals who have committed offences and effectively outstayed their welcome by their actions have not been automatically deported. On the serious matter of the countries to which, for whatever reason, people cannot be deported, will he consider issuing a list making public the countries to which it is difficult to deport people? When people finish their sentences, what are we doing to make sure that they are detained? Finally—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I tell the hon. Gentleman and other Members that one supplementary is fine. I think that he managed two, but one is fine.

Mr. Clarke: I certainly will consider my hon. Friend's proposals. Let me highlight one problem: in the case of Zimbabwe, which has many difficulties, the Government are subject to consistent calls, including from the Opposition, not to deport anyone to that country in any circumstances. We are also under a duty to examine the circumstances of the individuals concerned and the threat that they face. My hon. Friend illustrates the serious issue at the core of how we deal with those questions. All that I ask for is consistency from Opposition parties in addressing those questions, rather than one day saying, "What about the rights of asylum seekers?" and the next day saying that they cannot be allowed into the country.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): Is it not the case that a foreign prisoner due to be deported still retains a right to make a claim to stay under the Human Rights Act 1998? If that is the case, what will happen to that foreign prisoner making a claim under that Act during the course of proceedings? Will he or she be on bail or in custody, and under which provision?

Mr. Clarke: Actually, that is the position with regard to such a prisoner's human rights under the European convention on human rights rather than specifically under the Human Rights Act. Any individual might or might not have a claim under the European convention on human rights, which I think, from memory, this country signed up to in 1951. That claim has to be duly considered by the courts, whether the person concerned is on bail or in prison, in whatever circumstances apply. The issue that I raise—I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman, with his great legal experience, will agree—is that we must be more ruthless about examining the actual circumstances of such people. That is why I say that we should have a presumption that someone who has committed a criminal act should be deported to the country from which they come.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's proposals to deal with the systemic failures that he has honestly put before the House today. Will he assure me, however, that he will take no strictures from the former Home Secretary, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), whose woeful personal misjudgment allowed two of the biggest drug dealers in the United Kingdom out of prison?

Mr. Clarke: I certainly will not take strictures from the former Home Secretary, whom I regard as the one person in the House who is not equipped to make comment on these issues. I will not comment on the allegations made by my hon. Friend, although I am aware of them and understand the force with which he makes them.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): Can the Home Secretary say how many of the 1,023 cases would have resulted in deportations had the new legislation that he proposes been in place?

Mr. Clarke: No, I cannot.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I thank my right hon. Friend for his statement and welcome his proposals. Given that this whole sorry outcome is the result of systemic failures in the Home Office going back to the 1990s, can he tell me how many foreign nationals who either have been deported or are being considered for deportation are repeat offenders whose original offences were carried out prior to this Government's introduction of measures to identify and record the number of foreign nationals in prison?

Mr. Clarke: I cannot give my hon. Friend the number to which he refers, but I can say that he is right: there are individuals who go back over a long period in precisely the way that he describes.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To his credit, the Home Secretary tried to deport several very dangerous suspected al-Qaeda organisers, only to run up against the human rights legislation that had been signed up to or enacted by his Government. It is clear from his statement today that the same would happen in relation to people claiming asylum from countries with repressive regimes. Did the Home Secretary discuss that issue with the Prime Minister before the Prime Minister came to the House today? If he did, how was it possible for the Prime Minister to say that these people would automatically be deported under the new rules, when he—the Home Secretary—has made it perfectly clear that they could not be?

Mr. Clarke: I have already dealt with the substance of the question, but let me make a specific point. Yes, I have frequently discussed with the Prime Minister the question of the operation of the European convention on human rights, and the fact that it impacts in a number of different ways. As far as I know, the Opposition still believe that we should be signed up to the convention, but if I am wrong about that, I should be interested to hear it.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Get on with it!

Mr. Clarke: I am getting on with it, and I am trying to do so in such a way that even the hon. Gentleman may be able to understand.

Michael Fabricant: Patronising!

Mr. Clarke: Yes, I am patronising.

The fact is that that issue remains a central one, at the core of the whole discussion. I appeal to the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) and the spokespeople for the other Opposition parties to address the matter honestly in that discussion, on the basis of the presumption that criminals should be deported.

Points of Order

1.31 pm

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As a new Member, may I ask for your guidance on whether the usual courtesies should have applied when the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) visited my constituency recently? I saw plenty of press coverage of her visit to Wales's premier seaside resort, but found no notification to my office, either here or in my constituency, that the visit was about to take place. Do such conventions still apply, and should they have applied in my case?

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me answer.

I do not want to become involved in any arguments between Members on these matters, but the convention does apply. What an hon. Member must do is notify the constituency Member. I stress the word "notify": the person concerned does not need permission to enter the constituency.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It may please you to know that there are standing orders in my office to inform hon. Members when I visit their constituencies. In this instance I made an inquiry, and found that both a letter and an e-mail had been sent to the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon). I apologise if neither reached her. I shall make inquiries of our locator system in the House, which is run by whereonearth.com—because I want to know where on earth my message went. I do apologise.

Mr. Speaker: There is an apology, then.

Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was surprised to read in column 835 of Hansard for 2 May that an hon. Lady—and she is a lady of honour: the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride)—had named me personally, and stated in the House that I was demanding the resignation of a senior Cabinet Minister. What corrective avenues, Mr. Speaker, are open to a Member who is able categorically and unequivocally to deny having made any such statement and would not make any such statement, before further damage to fraternal relations with senior colleagues and to my personal career prospects—which, admittedly, were fairly slim to start with?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has put the record straight, and perhaps next time he appears on Sky television he will be able to do so again.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I fear that Members may have been inadvertently misled about the Home Secretary's offer to resign. Speaking of an exchange with the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary said:

"I told him I was prepared to resign if he thought it was right. He said he didn't think it was right."

Subsequently, we have been told that the Home Secretary did not offer to resign. I wonder what avenue I can explore as a Member of Parliament to ensure that hon. Members are fully informed on this matter in what I think you will agree, Mr. Speaker, is a national crisis over prisoner releases.

Mr. Speaker: The best thing to do is not to draw the Speaker into such arguments.

Neighbourhood Policing

1.34 pm

Mr. Andrew Slaughter (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to require police services to include proposals to introduce and sustain neighbourhood policing as a provision of their policing plans; and for connected purposes.

Let me say immediately that if police services in England and Wales continue to respond positively to the Government's agenda on neighbourhood policing, my Bill will only gather dust. Most if not all forces have responded with professionalism and enthusiasm to the aims set out in a string of White Papers and Government Bills since 1997.

I shall largely confine my remarks to the Metropolitan area, which I believe has led the way in neighbourhood policing. Both the current commissioner and the Mayor deserve praise for not only supporting but implementing the provision of safer neighbourhood teams across London, which Sir Ian Blair has called "the greatest development in community policing in the last 40 years".

While both Sir Ian and Mr. Livingstone are uncontroversial characters who will no doubt stay in their respective posts for many years to come, should they for any reason move on, I would like to think that their legacy in community policing will be preserved. I also hope that the many local initiatives—not just in London—that are improving community safety can be introduced nationwide to continue the Government's exemplary record in cutting crime and antisocial behaviour. Those are the objects of my Bill.

The purpose of this speech is not to rehearse the details of the statutory framework that already exists or to recite a welter of statistics, but to show how neighbourhood policing is already working on the ground. That said, I feel it is worth reminding the House that without the consistent commitment shown by the Government since 1997, neither the powers nor the funding for neighbourhood policing would exist. The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 introduced crime and disorder reduction partnerships and formal co-operation between the police and local authorities to reduce crime. The Police Reform Act 2002 provided for community support officers, who are now an essential ingredient of safer neighbourhood teams and who will number 24,000 by 2008. The White Paper "Building Communities, Beating Crime", published in November 2004, promised to spread neighbourhood policing to every community, and to involve those communities in how they were policed. In January this year, the respect action plan further promoted the use of antisocial behaviour orders, dispersal orders and closure orders to attack antisocial behaviour. Many of those measures are being brought together and extended in the Police and Justice Bill, which is currently before the House.

Recorded crime, as measured by the British crime survey, has fallen consistently since 1997. Both London boroughs crossed by my constituency have experienced significant falls in crime, and Hammersmith and Fulham has experienced the sharpest fall in London. The Government's aim is to see a further reduction in recorded crime of 15 per cent. between 2004 and 2008—a higher percentage in London—and to reduce the fear of crime through the national reassurance policing programme. Neighbourhood policing is key to both those targets.

The decision of the Mayor of London and the Metropolitan Police Authority, chaired by Len Duvall, to accelerate by two years the introduction of safer neighbourhood teams in all 624 wards in London presents a major logistical task. The police service in London has risen to that challenge and ensured that every ward has at least a four-person team: a sergeant, a police constable and two police community support officers. A further police constable and community support officer will be added by the end of the year.

Safer neighbourhood teams are dedicated to the wards to which they are assigned. They provide residents with a continuous and familiar uniformed presence, and they get to know their patch intimately, not only deterring crime but accumulating intelligence about both the area and its inhabitants. That is hardly revolutionary—indeed, it is what my constituents have been requesting for many years—but it is something that previous Governments and police authorities have declined to provide.

I pay particular tribute to Ealing and Hammersmith and Fulham, where both the police commanders and the council leaderships have gone beyond what is required in introducing neighbourhood policing. In Hammersmith, the Labour council voted funds of £1 million a year to fast-track safer neighbourhood teams, introducing full-strength teams in most wards three years ahead of plans. In Ealing the borough commander, Colette Paul, was able to launch safer neighbourhood teams in all 23 wards on 3 April this year, having planned for their introduction in advance of any London roll-out.

But community policing in those boroughs goes far beyond the additional police resources. As leader of Hammersmith and Fulham council, I had the privilege of working with three outstanding police commanders: Dick Cullen, who went on to run Hendon, Anthony Wills, who has become a national champion in the fight against domestic violence, and the present incumbent, Heather Valentine. They have worked hand in glove with both the statutory sector and the community to build trust and reduce crime. For those who remember the atmosphere of mutual suspicion and hostility that afflicted many police and local authority relationships in the 1980s, that is a sea change. Nowhere was that more apparent than in the aftermath of the London bombings last July. The work done by both the Hammersmith and the Ealing police forces to reassure and enlist the support of the whole community, especially in the wake of the attempted bombing at Shepherds Bush, was exemplary.

Both boroughs have taken enthusiastically to partnership working. That often involves teams of police, community support officers and council staff descending on an area to deal with everything from crack houses and street robbery to graffiti, dog fouling and fly-tipping. They also plant trees, give advice to the homeless and, quite possibly, tell people the time. How different that is from the days of the special patrol group.

Both boroughs have introduced the community payback scheme, using offenders to make reparation and environmental improvements in their community. Earlier this year, I attended the launch of the Safer Neighbourhood Annual Challenge at Hurlingham and Chelsea school. Next Monday is the awards ceremony, when children from Hammersmith and Fulham schools will explain their schemes for improving safety in their neighbourhoods.

However, what my constituents most want to know is whether community policing actually cuts crime and the fear of crime. The first indications suggest that the answer is an emphatic yes. All crime, but specifically opportunist crime such as criminal damage, fell significantly more in wards where safer neighbourhood teams were operating last year. There, public confidence in the police rose by 12 per cent. more than was the case in non-SNT wards, complaints of antisocial behaviour fell by 7 per cent. more, sightings of police officers rose by 11 per cent. more, and the belief that the police were taking public concerns seriously by 8 per cent. more.

Those are significant achievements in a very short time. We are only at the start of a policing revolution, in which public trust and the engagement of the whole community are the keys to a safer society.

I appear to be talking myself out of my own Bill. The commitment of many councils and police services is such that I see neighbourhood policing going from strength to strength without the need for legislation, but there is always a cloud on the horizon. In this case, it is in the shape of the Tory and Liberal parties, whose assembly members in London turned their faces against the improvements in neighbourhood policing proposed by the Mayor and Labour group. Overwhelmingly, it is the Labour Government and Labour councils who have provided the resources and commitment to neighbourhood policing.

I commend my Bill as an insurance policy to protect neighbourhood policing for the future. Of course, if residents in Hammersmith and Fulham and in Ealing, as well as in the rest of London and beyond, wish to take out their own insurance that policing will continue to thrive and improve in the years to come, the remedy is in their hands—they have but to vote for their Labour candidates tomorrow.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Andrew Slaughter, Lyn Brown, Jon Cruddas, Ms Karen Buck, Stephen Pound, Mr. Andrew Love, Mike Gapes, Meg Hillier, Mr. Andrew Dismore, Dr. Rudi Vis, Harry Cohen and Ann Keen.

NEIGHBOURHOOD POLICING

Mr. Andrew Slaughter accordingly presented a Bill to require police services to include proposals to introduce and sustain neighbourhood policing as a provision of their policing plans; and for connected purposes.: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 16 June, and to be printed [Bill 177].

Orders of the Day

Finance (No. 2) Bill

(Clauses Nos. 13 to 15, 26, 61, 91 and 106, Schedule 14, and new Clauses relating to the effect of provisions of the Bill on section 18 of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984)

Considered in Committee [Progress, 2 May].

[SIR ALAN HASELHURST in the Chair]

Clause 91 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 14

INVESTMENT RELIEFS: VENTURE CAPITAL SCHEMES

1.44 pm

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): I beg to move amendment No. 6, in page 74 [Vol II], leave out lines 5 to 26.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 7, in page 74 [Vol II], leave out from beginning of line 27 to end of line 4 on page 75.

No. 8, in page 75 [Vol II], leave out lines 5 to 18.

No. 9, in page 75, line 18 [Vol II], at end insert—

PART 1A

DEFINITION OF GROSS ASSETS

3A In section 293 of The Taxes Act 1988 insert new subsection—

"(6CA) For the purposes of subsection (6B) above assets of any member of the company's group that consist of capitalised internal costs of the company relating to research and development expenditure shall be disregarded.".

3B In paragraph 8 of Schedule 28B to The Taxes Act 1988 insert new sub-paragraph—

"(3A) For the purposes of this paragraph assets of any member of the company's group that consist of capitalised internal costs of the company relating to research and development expenditure shall be disregarded.".

3C In paragraph 22(3) of Schedule 15 to FA 2000, at end add "and disregarding assets that consist of capitalised internal costs of the company relating to research and development expenditure".'.

No. 13, in schedule 14, page 77, line 3 [Vol II], at end add—

'(3) Sub-paragraph (1) shall not apply to protected money as defined in paragraph 2(4) of this Schedule.'.

1.45 pm

Mr. Hoban: The first four amendments in this group deal with issues to do with the gross assets of investee companies. Those matters come into sharp focus as a consequence of the proposed reduction in the gross assets limit for venture capital trust investments. The final amendment in the group deals with changes announced in the Budget to the treatment of the VCT's own assets.

One of the most significant changes to the rules applicable to VCTs and enterprise investment schemes is the Bill's proposed reduction in gross asset limits, and amendments Nos. 6, 7 and 8 would reinstate the limits that apply under the current legislation. The current rules state that gross assets should be equal to, or less than, £15 million prior to fundraising and £16 million after fundraising. That allows the very largest qualifying companies to raise £1 million.

The proposed changes will reduce the gross assets limit so that a company will have no more than £7 million in gross assets prior to fundraising and no more than £8 million afterwards. The effect will be to reduce the amount that certain companies are able to raise. At present, a company with gross assets of £6 million is able to raise an additional £10 million through fundraising, but in future it will be able to raise only about £2 million. I am concerned about the effect on the operation of VCTs, and about the nature of the companies in which they can invest.

If a VCT invests now in a company whose gross assets before investment comply with the new rules proposed in the Bill, its ability to make a follow-on investment will be restricted. Under the current rules, however, the VCT can make further investment in the company until the £15 million asset limit is reached.

My experience before I came to the House was that early investors can find that their holdings and interest are diluted by people who come in later. It is often in their interest to make follow-on investments to maintain the size of their interest in the company. Reducing the gross assets limit from £15 million will restrict VCTs' ability to do that if the company hits the proposed new £7 million limit.

Secondly, the proposed reduction in the gross assets limit is that it could change the asset base that VCTs and the Enterprise Investment Scheme can invest in. The focus will be on smaller, and therefore arguably more risky, companies.

The lower gross asset limit proposed by the Government will focus more finance on the companies in the funding gap identified in the Treasury publication entitled "Bridging the Gap", but there is a feeling that some slightly larger companies will still find it difficult to attract investment. The proposed reduction in the gross assets limit will exclude them from this source of investment, with the possible unintended consequence that the funding gap is moved further up—that is, that the needs of smaller companies will be met, but that slightly larger companies will lose out.

The reduction in the gross assets limit could also change the type of businesses that VCTs invest in. Simon Rogerson of Octopus Asset Management has said:

"Managers will steer clear of asset rich UK manufacturing companies, focusing on asset poor service companies."

When manufacturing is suffering from overseas competition and business investment is at a record low in real terms, is it right to exclude those businesses from the opportunities that VCTs present?

It is not just manufacturing businesses that are asset rich. Last week, I visited a firm in my constituency that acts as a data centre for businesses, housing the servers that they need to power and maintain their websites. It is a relatively small business with about 30 employees but the cost of its data centre, including plant, cooling and some security measures, is extremely high relative to its turnover and its employee numbers.

[Mr. Hoban]

We must recognise that even a relatively small service business can be asset intensive and fall outside the limits set out in the Bill. Is it right that asset-intensive businesses are squeezed out of such funding? The Minister will argue that the problem would exist at whatever level the gross assets limit is set, and that is true. In a way, it is a crude proxy for company size, but the reduction in the gross assets limit from £15 million to £7 million makes the problem all the more evident. As asset levels fall, it is likely that more businesses will find funding through VCTs difficult to access.

I should be grateful if the Minister would explain the basis on which the new lower gross assets figures were determined and say what steps he will take to monitor the flow of funds into VCTs and the EIS and the nature of the companies in which those funds are invested to ensure that the reduction does not adversely affect companies seeking funds. Will he also ensure that the measure does not simply lead to the funding gap moving up from companies with assets of less than £15 million to companies that previously would have benefited from funding through VCT schemes?

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): Does my hon. Friend recognise that moving to lower asset values and smaller companies will mean a much greater inherent risk to those investing in such companies?

Mr. Hoban: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. When companies have lower asset values there is an increase in the level of risk, which will prompt investors to consider the risk-return ratio and think about whether their likely returns from VCTs in the future are sufficient to warrant that investment being made. The Government need to monitor that carefully to ensure that having turned the tap on in VCT funding by increasing the tax relief, a matter to which I will return in later amendments, the consequential changes in the Bill of reducing that relief, increasing the holding period and reducing the gross assets limit, will make VCTs less attractive to investors, thus depriving smaller businesses of the funds that they need to expand and grow. My hon. Friend was quite right to highlight the importance of risk and its role in assessing these investments, and the relationship between small businesses and risk.

Amendment No. 9 relates to the definition of gross assets that is set out in the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. The amendment revisits that definition, taking into account changes in accounting practice that might have an adverse effect on companies' ability to access funds from VCTs in the future. It is, I regret, a highly technical amendment relating to the definition of gross assets of an investee company. Under UK generally accepted accounting practice, companies were given a choice with regard to the capitalisation of development expenditure: they could capitalise it or expense it. The rules setting out the basis on which that could take place were set out in the standard statement of accounting practice—SSAP 13—"Accounting for Research and Development".

The permissive nature of SSAP 13 in giving companies that choice, together with the wide application of the prudence concept, generally resulted in businesses writing off development expenditure in their profit-and-loss account. For companies seeking investment from VCTs, and through the EIS, that was good news, because there was no addition to their gross asset figures.

However, although UK accounting standards remain in place for unlisted companies, listed companies are adopting international financial reporting standards and one of the differences between UK and international standards is the treatment of development costs. Under international standards, development costs can be capitalised if they meet one of the following six criteria: the technical feasibility of the project; the intention to complete the intangible asset for use or sale; the ability to use or sell the intangible asset; how the intangible asset will generate probable future economic benefits; the adequacy of the resources for completion; and the ability to measure reliably the development expenditure.

The criteria are broadly similar to those used under SSAP 13 and are designed to ensure that only costs clearly identifiable as relating to a project that will be completed, which the company can afford to complete and which will yield financial benefits will be capitalised. In essence, they ensure that only costs that can lead to a realisable asset will be capitalised. If international financial standards matched SSAP 13 in their entirety, there would be no issue, as a company would be unlikely to capitalise those costs. However, there is a vital difference from SSAP 13: the relevant international standard states that where the six criteria are met, the costs should—I emphasise the word "should"—be capitalised.

So where is the issue for VCTs and investee companies? Capitalised development costs will count towards the gross assets test. That is increasingly important for two reasons: first, the lower gross assets test will bite, and secondly, although the Treasury might argue that IFRS apply only to listed companies and are thus unlikely to become an issue for unlisted companies, in reality I suspect that companies will increasingly adopt IFRS as a basis for reporting. That will be of particular interest to companies who may want an exit route through a listing in the future and may want to implement IFRS from the outset rather than restate their accounts at a later date. Having worked on such exercises in the past, I should prefer to start off with the basis on which I intend to report my results, rather than changing it partway through. If nothing else, it would save on the fees businesses pay to organisations such as my former firm.

In practice, the adoption of IFRS is likely to mean that more development expenditure will be capitalised than under UK GAAP. Coupled with the reduction in gross asset rules, that could lead to fewer companies in need of capital qualifying for investment under VCT rules. As my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) suggested, there could be a double effect: first, there will be a change in accounting standards and, secondly, the lower gross asset figure will bite at much smaller companies. The changes will have an impact, in particular, on the software and pharmaceutical industries, many of which seek VCT investment.

We believe that the decision to transfer to accounting under IFRS should not be hampered by the need to consider that potentially extremely significant adverse impact. I would be grateful for the Financial Secretary's thoughts on what is very much a probing amendment at this stage.

Amendment No. 13 covers the way in which VCTs manage their assets. Again, it is a technical amendment, which highlights the concerns of a number of VCT managers and their advisers. One of the challenges that faces a VCT is how to manage its investments and any cash balances, while ensuring that once the initial investment period is over it complies with the rule that 70 per cent. of its investments are in qualifying investments—that is, investments in unlisted companies. Changes under the Finance Bill have an impact on the way that VCT managers can manage the affairs of their trusts. Historically, a VCT could place cash in non-interest-bearing accounts as a short-term measure to try to meet the 70 per cent. rule.

Let me give an example to explain more clearly. A venture capital trust with investments of £10 million fully invested in unlisted companies would meet the criteria as 100 per cent. of its investments are in qualifying companies. A VCT could, for commercial reasons, decide to realise an investment of £4 million. If it put the cash in an interest-bearing account, it would have investments of £10 million but qualifying investments of only £6 million. Therefore, it would fail the 70 per cent. test. Under current rules, the VCT would be able to place the £4 million in a non-interest-bearing account and achieve the 70 per cent. rule by having £6 million in investments and £6 million in qualifying investments. It could then act to return that cash to its shareholders or make a further investment in another company without losing its qualifying status, because it would not be in breach of the 70 per cent. rule.

There are strong reasons why VCTs would seek to use the cash as soon as possible. Investors focus on returns and if one invests the realised proceeds in a non-interest-bearing account, that is not very good for the overall return of the VCT. There is an opportunity under the existing rules to manage the VCT more smoothly, but there is also commercial pressure to ensure that the assets are used as quickly as possible and in a way that does not disturb the orderly management of the VCT.

Under the rules in the Bill, that opportunity would no longer be available to VCTs and the concerns of managers have fallen into two categories. Those in the first group say that they would rather the rules were not changed at all. They would make it easier for all VCTs to handle non-interest-bearing deposits and to put cash into them to ensure that the 70 per cent. rule applies. Those in the other group suggest that the rule should not apply to VCTs that have already been set up. Managers might have taken different decisions if they had known that the relief was to be removed from the VCT. Under amendment No. 13, when a VCT has raised money before 6 April 2006, the money could still be placed in non-interest-bearing deposits and fall outside the definition of investments to ensure that it would be easier for VCTs to meet the 70 per cent. rule while bearing in mind that there will still be the commercial pressure to ensure that the money is returned to shareholders or reinvested as soon as possible.

. In conclusion, amendments No. 6, 7 and 8 seek to elicit from the Government their reasoning for reducing the gross asset test and to establish whether they have fully thought through the impact of that on the potential investments of VCTs. Amendment No. 9 seeks to change the definition of gross assets to reflect changing accounting treatment and to find a way in which the reduction of gross asset test could be mitigated to the benefit of certain companies that invest in, and spend a great deal of money on, development. Amendment No. 13 seeks to make it easier for VCTs to manage their own assets in an ordered way rather than having to act precipitately when a realisation is made.

Mr. Newmark: I begin by drawing attention to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests. Although I have never invested in a venture capital trust, I have, over the past 15 years, been both a venture capitalist and an angel investor. I hope that I can bring some of my practical experience to bear on this debate, especially in the context of amendments Nos. 6, 7 and 8. I will not address amendments Nos. 9 and 13, because my hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) thoroughly covered those issues.

Yesterday, we established that one of the themes of this year's Finance Bill is the Government's ongoing attempt to fix things that are not broken and to fudge those that are. The Bill's treatment of venture capital trusts is no exception to that trend. VCTs have clearly demonstrated that they are performing well in the market and seem to vindicate the Government's attempt to address the "equity gap" through targeted market intervention.

We need look only as far as the figures given on the website of Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs for the total investment in VCTs. After a peak in 2000–01 of £450 million, investment plummeted to only £70 million in each of the years 2002–03 and 2003–04. That was the situation facing VCTs at the time that the Finance Act 2004 implemented the new income tax relief scheme. In the following year, investment reached £520 million and has surpassed £700 million in the last financial year.

When the Treasury Committee conducted its inquiry into the success of the incentives it heard that "there is very clear evidence" that the incentives had reversed "a dramatic decline" in VCT investment, and had led to a "significant uplift in the amount of capital that VCTs have been able to raise."

The Government should be congratulated on that; it is beyond dispute. However, I do dispute that the reduction in the gross asset value of companies eligible for VCT investment is the appropriate way to refocus tax incentives on the equity gap.

Not only are the Government moving in the wrong direction on this issue, but they are moving in two directions at once. Part 1 of schedule 14 will alter the level of risk that VCT investors are exposed to by targeting VCT investment in smaller companies. That is the Government's stated aim. However, part 2 of schedule 14 cuts the incentives that investors will receive. The two parts must be considered together because if any of part 1 remains in the Bill, it will have a knock-on effect on the need for the incentives offered in part 2 of the schedule.

[Mr. Newmark]

As one industry analyst has said, the Government's proposal

"has changed the risk and reward profile of VCTs significantly".

Another comments that the change

"appreciably alters the risk-reward profile of private-equity investment by personal taxpayers."

Since bad news comes in threes, let me offer one further comment:

"The reduction to company size greatly increases the level of investment risk. Smaller companies are normally, by their nature, more risky."

That is the point that I made to my hon. Friend the Member for Fareham. That problem has long been foreseen.

In 2003, the Treasury conducted its own analysis of the likely consequences of tinkering with the balance between risks and return. It concluded:

"If there were clear evidence that this would reduce the attractiveness of investment in VCTs, there might be a case for enhancing tax reliefs at the same time as tightening the scheme's focus."

Reducing the gross asset value of eligible companies was always considered to be an alternative to altering the structure of incentives.

Three years later, the Treasury is determined to pursue contradictory objectives by increasing risks and cutting incentives at the same time. The position is simply not sustainable. Instead of fundamentally altering the balance between risk and return, the Government should be ensuring greater investor protection. Bearing in mind that there are already a healthy number of business angels available to provide seed capital for high-risk start-ups, I question whether it is appropriate to encourage individual investors into higher beta investments in companies with a gross asset value under the proposed new limit.

This concern is growing in currency. In November, the chief executive of the Financial Services Authority told the Treasury Committee that, despite having issued warnings to investors and VCT providers, the FSA

"need to be perhaps a little smarter on how we convert the data we put on our website into the information that goes into the hands of the population."

The Government have a responsibility to keep a grip on the balance between the risks and rewards offered by VCTs. Changing both sides of that equation at the same time is imprudent.

Nevertheless, I recognise that there has been some justified concern that VCTs are not operating in the way that was intended when they were set up 10 years ago. Foremost among those concerns is the one about the practice of parallel investment, in which two or more VCTs under the same management act together to invest beyond the £1 million investment limit imposed on each separate VCT. As Lucius Cary, the founder of Oxford Technology VCTs, has said, although that behaviour

"may be technically legal, it is pushing the boundaries and undermining the original objectives of the legislation."

Clearly, VCTs clubbing together to take part in larger management buy-outs is a problem, but it is a problem that was foreseen. The Treasury's report into the equity gap, which dated from before the changes included in the Finance Act 2004, examined the issue of regulating concert parties in order to assist early-stage investment. The report suggested that

"the scheme rules could place restrictions on VCTs forming part of an investment syndicate that collectively invests beyond the £1 million upper investment limit."

If the Government remain concerned by parallel investment, Ministers should confront the issue head-on and not seek to address it by the roundabout route of restricting the gross asset value of eligible companies.

I want to return to my substantive objections to the changes proposed in part 1 of schedule 14 and to my reasons for arguing that they should not stand part of the Bill. Based on my experience as a practitioner, I believe that restricting the gross asset value of eligible companies to £7 million before investment and £8 million immediately afterwards does not focus on the real equity gap. If anything, the limits have been moved in the wrong direction and the probing amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Fareham are modest in seeking to preserve them at the current level.

There are an abundance of business angels who are capable of providing seed capital—that is generally provided for companies with gross asset values of £1 million to £3 million—to kick-start small businesses. The real difficulty that businesses continue to face is in accessing second-round financing. That is the issue. Many individuals who came to me when I was in the business before I came into the House would complain that there was a lack of access to capital once companies got above roughly £5 million. We should address that gap between £5 million and £25 million.

Further restriction of the gross asset value of eligible companies would be retrograde. I appreciate that this is not part of the amendment, but we should be looking to raise the limit to £25 million instead of slashing it. Recently, in another place, Lord MacGregor of Pulham Market said of the existing gross asset value limit:

"There is clear evidence that it is companies above that level which need the venture capital investment. The limit has not . . . been indexed, and it needs to be looked at again."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 16 March 2006; Vol. 679, c. 1410–11.]

The Government have indeed looked at the matter again, and drawn the wrong conclusions again. That is a judgment based on my experience in the industry. The change in gross asset value in schedule 14 is too sudden and significant to be undertaken without greater industry consultation and I urge the Government to reconsider their decision.

Mr. Colin Breed (South-East Cornwall) (LD): The Liberal Democrats and the House as a whole have to recognise that the private equity market in the City has been one of the great successes in recent years. It now provides more than 50 per cent. of all private equity in Europe; perhaps it is second only to the US in the provision of that capital. The Government have played a part in that by providing the legislative and taxation framework and a business-friendly environment in which that could happen.

It therefore seems rather strange that we should be restraining that very success with the proposals in the schedule. I suspect that tax breaks have been the driving force. The hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) successfully pointed out that, only a few years ago when things were going into a decline, the change was made and more money was put in. Perhaps it is the very success—now building up to more than £700 million or £800 million—that is causing the Treasury to become rather frightened at the prospect of the amount of tax relief that it is going to allow.

2.15 pm

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): According to my understanding of the matter, the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) is making exactly the same mistake as the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark). The hon. Member for South-East Cornwall is talking about the capital limit, which is of course the subject of the amendments. But when he is talking about the restriction of relief, he seem to be overlooking that the relief for enterprise investment schemes will increase from £200,000 to £400,000 and that the reference by the hon. Member for Braintree to a rate of 30 per cent. involved a misunderstanding. The rate is currently 40 per cent. for a two-year period, which is expiring. If it expired and no provision were made in the Bill, the rate would go down to 20 per cent. In fact, under the Bill, the rate will go to 30 per cent., so tax reliefs are being increased.

Mr. Breed: I entirely accept that. We can look at those compensations and the way in which the provisions tinker about with the actual amount of tax relief and the allowable assets. That tinkering has been brought about to try to engineer a more focused approach to smaller companies and to try to address some of the issues in respect of the risks and rewards. The incentives in that respect have been drastically reduced and there will be a significant reduction in the amount of private equity that will be going into small businesses in relation either to start-up or to development capital.

That echoes what we were talking about yesterday afternoon in relation to small businesses. We are looking to try to provide a regime that gives businesses that have been started up the opportunity to move on, so that they become more successful, provide more opportunities in relation to the economy and employment and indeed provide corporation tax. We seem to have situations and regimes that are not connected to each other. The hon. Member for Braintree was talking about the gap between £5 million and £25 million, which may be termed development capital, rather than venture capital. There is certainly a gap there.

Mr. Newmark: One of the problems that we face is that the private equity industry, which was alluded to, is, in effect, moving further up the food chain and the elements involved are getting bigger and bigger. The funding gap is indeed at the lower level, which is where business angels are needed and are playing a role. The point made by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) was irrelevant to the amendments; it had to do with taxation. We are concerned with gross asset values. By shrinking where we give the incentives for investors to go in—by lowering that limit—we are going to make it far more risky and far less attractive for individuals to go into that part of the market.

Mr. Breed: I entirely agree with that. We will see that reduction in the figures next year if these proposals go through. The Government are trying to engineer a reduction because they are looking to try to save some money in relation to this scheme. That will be a false economy. Opportunities will be largely missed because private equity funds are not going to be as prevalent as they have been in the past few years. There is no suggestion that there is a shortage of businesses looking for such capital. Indeed, there is probably more demand than there is current supply. If it were the other way round, there could be an opportunity to say, "Well, we do not need so many incentives." However, significant numbers of businesses—even at that lower level; let alone the development level—are looking for the sort of private equity that they require to expand.

I also entirely agree that the 70 per cent. investment rule needs to be looked at, particularly in relation to those funds that regularly liquidate some of their investments and then hold them in some sort of interest-bearing account. It would make no sense whatsoever to force them into non-interest bearing ones. I am sure that there is an easier—or perhaps more elegant—way of dealing with that than is currently the case.

The alternative investment market has been a great success, but less money will go into it because the sort of companies that will qualify will not attract—

The Temporary Chairman (Sir John Butterfill): Order. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that this particular issue arises on a later group of amendments. I would be grateful if he confined his remarks to the present group of amendments.

Mr. Breed: I am grateful, Sir John, and sorry that I transgressed.

I have tried to find out what the savings resulting from the measure will be, but the estimates are rather wide. When the Minister gives us the benefit of his information, will he tell us what sort of savings there will be? I have seen figures ranging from between £15 million and £400 million, so I do not know what the exact savings are likely to be. However, if the savings are anywhere between those figures, such tinkering seems to be unnecessary. The measure addresses a success, rather than a problem, and that success needs reinforcing, not restraining. The opportunities that are available to private companies will necessarily be reduced and investment will become less attractive. Overall, the measure is unnecessary, given the sort of savings that it will make.

If a reduction is absolutely necessary, the methods that the Government are choosing represent using a sledgehammer to crack a not especially difficult nut. A more sensible approach might be to focus on certain sectors, rather than going across the board. If the Government want to define the scheme so that it is less expensive to the Treasury, I am sure that there would be ways in which they could focus on the sectors for which they want to produce more help. As the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) said, the proposals will probably lead to gravitation towards technology-based businesses with intangible assets, rather than businesses with tangible assets.

[Mr. Breed]

Stephen Hesford (Wirral, West) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman says that the Government could approach the matter differently by focusing on sectors. If there was limitation in the way in which he suggests, how would he guide us? Which sector would he focus on and how would he do that?

Mr. Breed: First, I would prefer to leave the scheme as it is. However, if we were to examine certain sectors, we would have to look at those that find capital especially difficult to obtain. The situation is not difficult for a management buy-out that will be going to the market in two or three years' time because most people would be scrabbling to try to invest in something that would produce a great return in a short time. However, there are businesses that require a longer gestation period—they are perhaps smaller and need to retain for a longer time—and they might be above the limit on eligible assets. Putting an arbitrary restriction on eligible assets, rather than considering each sector, is an across-the-board approach. A more elegant approach would be to introduce more targeted and focused support for the specific sectors and companies that we would like to support.

Rob Marris: I understood the hon. Gentleman to be saying that his preference would be to leave things the way that they are, which I assume to mean that he supports amendments Nos. 6 to 8. I understand that he has had difficulty getting the figures. However, in his methodology for approaching the question of encouraging investment, especially in some of the riskier areas, he is looking at only half the equation, as I suggested earlier. If he was to leave things as they are, the enterprise investment scheme tax relief would be capped at £200,000, not £400,000, and furthermore the tax relief would revert from the current rate of 40 per cent. to 20 per cent. If we could get the figures for the whole equation—the changes to both tax relief and the capital limits—he might find that he supported the Government.

Mr. Breed: I understand the hon. Gentleman's argument. He is right that a judgment can really be made only in retrospect. It is difficult to prejudge the exact outcomes. However, it is my judgment that for relatively little benefit, we are changing a successful scheme. Leaving aside the figures involved, the change sends the unhappy message to the industry as a whole that even when a scheme is successful and producing real benefits, the Government are prepared to tinker with it. For the sake of what I suspect will be a relatively modest saving, we could undermine some of the confidence that has been built up in recent years that the Government are behind the scheme. However, having seen the scheme's great success, they now seem to want to chop that away and retreat to the pre-2004 position, which would be a retrograde step.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I remind the Committee of my entry in the Register of Members' Interests. I am an investor in a venture capital trust: Baronsmead VCT 4. I am also honoured to chair its non-executive board.

I welcome the measures to improve access to capital, especially the increase in the EIS limits to which the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) referred. Of course, investments in that category are not for the faint-hearted because they do not provide the portfolio risk diversification that is the attraction of a VCT. I also welcome the retention of tax relief for VCTs, albeit at a lower level, which we will discuss under a later group of amendments.

The reduction in the gross assets of a company in which VCTs may invest from £15 million to £7 million immediately before an investment and from £16 million to £8 million immediately after an investment will significantly reduce the scope of eligible companies. As my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark), who is an expert on these matters, rightly said, that will raise the risk profile of investors in VCTs. The risk profile will be raised by definition because the portfolio effect of a mix of business sizes in a VCT helps both the underlying investors and the managers of the trust to have greater confidence because investment performance tends to be better when there is a greater spread of both risk and the size of investment in individual companies. The reason why the limits have been selected is unclear, so I urge the Minister to give an explanation to Opposition Members who are perplexed.

When VCTs were first introduced under the previous Government in 1995, the limit on the gross assets of eligible companies was £10 million. Over the following 10 years, that would, of course, have inflated to a much higher figure, but even £10 million is significantly more than the amount proposed. Many VCTs take advantage each year of the period prior to and immediately after the end of the tax year to undertake fundraising. Several VCTs pulled their fundraising following the Budget. I have read several of their websites and many have cited the halving of the maximum size of investee companies as the reason. I will name a couple of funds—not my own—because they are peer funds that perform well: Northern VCT 2 and First State AIM VCT, which was the best performing AIM VCT that was launched last year.

Those who are involved in marketing such funds have a good sense of investor appetite for VCTs. I refer especially to Henry Chaplin, the chief executive of Noble Fund Managers, the website of which points out that he anticipates that the VCT market, having raised £800 million in the last tax year, will decline to only £300 million by 2007–08. That gives some idea of the impact of the changes that the industry is expecting.

2.30 pm

That takes us to why are the Government so keen to introduce this change. As was said earlier, this may be purely a revenue limiting exercise. It may be to do with the gaping deficits in the public accounts. It appears that it has little to do with seeking to professionalise and encourage a stable VCT industry. One issue that it will give rise to for small companies has been touched on already. Those companies with gross assets of, for example, £6 million—just under the limit—can now raise only £2 million compared with a £10 million subscription that they could have raised under the previous regime. That will have a significant impact on small and medium-sized companies that have a requirement for significant amounts of capital, and this avenue of raising that capital is likely to be shut to them. That could have an effect on higher risk and potentially higher return or high risk and nil-return companies in the pharmaceutical sector and other areas that are great consumers of capital.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): The prognosis that my hon. Friend cited of a prospective reduction from £800 million to £300 million is both gloomy and alarming. For the avoidance of doubt, can he confirm that the person whom he has quoted, Mr. Chaplin, is suggesting that the reduction will be exclusively the consequence of the Budget and not in any way attributable to other unrelated factors? If that is so, it is a source of alarm.

Mr. Dunne: I have been quoting from Mr. Chaplin's website. I have not had a direct conversation with him. The implication is that venture capital trusts that were in the process of fundraising and have cancelled are doing so as a result of the specific Budget amendment that we are considering.

Mr. Newmark: It might be helpful to explain a little more the cause behind the statement to which my hon. Friend referred. It has to do with the fact that smaller investments are far more risky. Therefore, people are far less likely to invest in such companies. At the same time—this is the point that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) was making—if there are not the tax incentives that follow these investments, that will be another reason why people will not invest in the industry. There is a double whammy, which is what I was talking about earlier.

Mr. Dunne: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for supporting my contention that that will be a direct consequence of the Budget. Access to follow-on capital will therefore be severely restricted as a result of the proposed measure. It will be interesting to know whether that is part of the Government's intent.

The second issue that I want to raise is perhaps a slightly more detailed point, but it is a direct consequence of the proposals that are subject to the amendments. A number of VCTs, including the one that I chair, have a dividend reinvestment scheme under which investors are given the option to receive their dividends not in cash tax-free, but by reinvesting in new shares issued by the VCT. That has attractions for investors as they can increase their investment in a VCT with the accordant tax advantages. It is also attractive to managers of VCTs because they can raise modest capital on regularly without having to go through the costly exercise of marketing and producing a prospectus, for example.

The problem is that as a result of the proposed changes from 6 April any new shares raised by a VCT will have to be invested in companies that meet the new criteria. That means that an existing VCT, which has an established portfolio of investments in companies that exceed the current criteria, will have to start managing an entirely separate portfolio. I believe that that is the case. I think that the Minister is nodding.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey) indicated dissent.

Mr. Dunne: That applies to every new investment that a VCT seeks to make using new capital raised by issuing shares in respect of dividends under a reinvestment scheme. This will increase the complexity to a point where this sort of dividend reinvestment is highly unlikely to be worth while for the manager, notwithstanding the tax benefits that it provides to investors. If the Minister can say whether that is something that he intends to catch by the proposed measures, I shall be most grateful.

John Healey: We have had a broad-ranging debate on this set of amendments. In a sense, it sets the scene for a wider range of issues connected with the package of reforms that we propose in clause 91 and schedule 14, which go beyond the five amendments in the group. I shall seek to deal specifically with the five amendments and the points that have been raised during the debate.

I turn first to amendments Nos. 6, 7 and 8, which deal essentially with the growth of assets test, as the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) made clear. The amendments seek to remove from the Bill the provisions that are designed to refocus venture capital schemes on those small firms that are most in need of improved access to finance. After all, this is the principal purpose of the policy framework and the principal justification of investing a significant amount of public money in terms of the tax forgone.

It may help the Committee if I explain why we have brought forward these proposals that bear on the gross assets test. The amendments, if they are pressed, should be rejected. Venture capital schemes are an important range of interventions contributing to the Government's wider policy to improve access to finance for small companies with growth ambitions. It is important that we build on the success of the schemes so far. It is important also that we ensure that the support that the schemes provide is effectively targeted to where it is needed most. That is what the provisions in the Bill are designed to do. Refocusing the growth assets test in this way will ensure that investment under these schemes is directed to those companies that most need it and to where there is most clearly a market failure. It is interesting that this purpose is recognised clearly by the industry.

Comments after the proposals were published included those from Paul Mumford of Cavendish Fund managers. He said:

"the changes bring things back to the true spirit of venture capital, which means investing in young companies and sticking with them as an investor until they have grown enough to merit further investment from institutional investors."

[John Healey]

Julian Hickman, a partner of Longbow Capital, said:

"the Chancellor seems to be trying to guide venture capital schemes back to their original intended role; the support of small businesses in search of venture capital funding."

That is precisely the point and the purpose of the package set out in clause 91.

The change will ensure that money raised under the schemes does not drift towards lower-risk investment, where it would be less focused on driving growth and more devoted to simply maintaining value—the sort of investments that firms could and should be more capable of sourcing from other places.

Mr. Newmark: What analysis the Minister has undertaken to justify that comment and to show what size the market will become after the Bill is enacted? What analysis has he undertaken to show that there is not a funding gap above £7 million or £8 million? Why has he chosen £7 million or £8 million as opposed to £10 million? I am curious as to what analysis the Government have made to make the decision that they are about to make.

John Healey: The hon. Gentleman again poses the questions that he posed earlier. I have not yet come to the points that he and others made. I was about to turn to the specific points raised by the hon. Member for Fareham, then to those of the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) and then on to those of the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne).

The hon. Member for Fareham asked the same question, namely, what is the basis of the new gross assets test and the level at which we have set it. He, too, expressed concern that it will somehow lead to neglect of manufacturing industry, particularly relatively small business services companies. I will share with him some of the analysis that underpins the decision to set the new gross assets test at £8 million and £7 million. Analysis of the investments made in the VCT scheme and the enterprise investment scheme shows that investments in companies with total assets of less than £8 million are proportionately higher in technology, business services and manufacturing. All such companies are higher-risk sectors, which the Government therefore want to target. By way of contrast, VCT and EIS investment in companies with total assets of more than £8 million is proportionately higher in sectors that tend to be asset-backed and therefore less risky forms of investment, such as the hotel sector, bars and catering, wholesale and retail. Having assets clearly increases their ability to put up collateral against loans, so they are less likely to face the same problems that small firms in some other sectors face in accessing finance. The hon. Member for Fareham may be interested to know that the average size of a company invested in under a VCT is £3.8 million.

The hon. Gentleman also asked whether we will monitor the impact of these changes, and the short answer is that of course we will. We have done so since we took responsibility for the scheme and we will measure and monitor the impact on the funds raised, on the investments made, and on small and growing firms. We will also monitor evidence of change in terms of a finance gap.

The hon. Members for Braintree and for Ludlow spoke from their own personal experience. I was interested to hear about that, but it has led them to draw conclusions rather different from our own and from many experts and specialists in the field. I point out to the hon. Member for Braintree in particular that riskier investments that have difficulty raising other forms of growth capital are precisely where the market failures lie and where the case for Government intervention and support is strongest. Our proposed change in the gross assets test is designed to ensure that significant Government support is well justified and well targeted.

The package in schedule 14 to which the hon. Member for Braintree referred will increase, rather than reduce, the incentives to invest, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) said. I suspect that we will discuss this issue in more detail when we consider amendments Nos. 10 and 11, so I shall not stray there, except to point out to the hon. Member for Braintree—who mentioned the risk-reward balance—that the package includes setting the rate of income tax relief for investments in VCTs at a new and increased level of 30 per cent.

I appreciate the tribute that the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) paid to—

Mr. Newmark: Will the Financial Secretary give way?

John Healey: I suspect that the point that the hon. Gentleman is about to raise is one that he will have ample opportunity to discuss when we consider the next group of amendments; however, I give way.

Mr. Newmark: I am curious as to the Financial Secretary's logic. How can reducing the tax incentive from 40 per cent. to 30 per cent. and lowering the gross assets reduce risk? By definition, doing so tends to lead to riskier investments.

The Temporary Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows very well that that point will be dealt with in the next group of amendments; it is not particularly relevant to this one.

John Healey: My suspicions, Sir John, were precisely confirmed by the hon. Gentleman's intervention.

Perhaps I may turn, as I had started to do, to the contribution of the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall, whose tribute to the success of the economy under this Government—and particularly the ongoing success of the venture capital schemes—I appreciate. He was right to say that the UK is one of the leading economies; in fact, a recent US report described the UK as the best business environment for small firms to access investment finance in. On the particular set of arguments that he laboured, I should point out that the package of changes in clause 91 is not about reducing cost or reducing support for this form of business investment. It is about focusing such support first, where it is most needed; secondly, where the greatest value to the taxpayer lies; and thirdly, where it is likely to make the greatest contribution to the growth and productivity of the UK economy.

I stress that this package of reforms is not about looking for savings. If the hon. Gentleman consults the Red Book, he will see that the scorecard cost of these proposals, which were announced in the Budget, for the next financial year is minus £15 million. In other words, for that and the following year, the additional cost of the proposals to the Exchequer is £15 million. He may also be interested to know that the cost of such schemes this year is £220 million.

2.45 pm

Mr. Breed: I am grateful to the Financial Secretary for that information, which reinforces my view. Given that there will to be no visible change in the cost to the Treasury in forgone tax—if anything, the cost might even increase slightly—is the proposed across-the-board test on eligible assets the most elegant way of ensuring that the limited sums available are focused on the right area? As the Financial Secretary knows, certain sectors of the small business world are perhaps more demanding than others, and some are more deserving. Applying seemingly arbitrary figures across the board—he has yet to explain how he arrived at the figures of £8 million and £7 million, rather than, say, £10 million—will not enable us to focus on the companies and sectors that need support.

John Healey: We are looking for effectiveness, not elegance. The package of measures, including the reduction in the gross assets test, will help us to build on the success of the scheme and ensure that it is properly targeted and good value, therefore, for the substantial sums of taxpayers' money that such support entails. The hon. Gentleman expressed concern at our setting the gross assets test at £8 million and £7 million respectively, but I should point out that the average size of a company invested in under a VCT is £3.8 million. The test should not be a concern to him if he is genuinely interested, as we are, in achieving greater levels of investment and easier access to finance for firms that are riskier investments. Such firms tend to be smaller firms, and they always find it more difficult to access the investment and growth capital that they need from other sources.

John Bercow: Precisely in the light of what the hon. Gentleman just said about the net cost to public funds of his overall package, and of the widespread uncertainty about whether the effects of his scheme will be exactly as he envisages, does he think this a very good test case of the appropriateness of the Government's introducing a sunset clause? The provision would therefore automatically expire after a given period, whereupon we could judge who was right and what action did or did not need to be taken.

John Healey: I know that the hon. Gentleman is keen on sunset clauses, but in this instance the short answer to his question is no. I think that he was on the Finance Bill Committee, and he almost certainly participated in proceedings on the Finance Bill 2004, when we introduced the temporary two-year uplift of the rate of income tax relief available on VCTs from 20 per cent.—the ongoing rate—to 40 per cent. Although I did not refer to the concept of a sunset clause in moving that provision, it was time-limited, so I am sure that it meets with his approval at least in retrospect, even if he did not support it at the time.

Amendment No. 9 seeks to exclude any capitalised research and development expenditure from the calculation of a company's gross assets for the purposes of the qualifying test. The hon. Member for Fareham said that it is a probing amendment, and I hope that he will be convinced of my view that it is neither necessary nor desirable. Let me try and explain why.

The gross assets test, as I said, is designed to target smaller high-risk companies for investment under the schemes by focusing on the level of assets on the balance sheet. The legislation deliberately does not define the assets to be taken into account, but as is our approach in general, it follows accountancy practice. If the tests were to diverge from accepted commercial accounting rules, more complex legislation would be required, which neither the hon. Gentleman nor I generally advocate. It could lead to additional burdens on the conduct of VCT businesses. However, the international accounting standards, IAS 38, have introduced a requirement to capitalise research and development expenditure in certain circumstances, whereas the UK standard to which the hon. Gentleman referred, SSAP 13, states that that treatment is optional. In either case, the range of circumstances in which R and D must or can be capitalised remains limited to certain development costs, not research costs.

Expenditure, therefore, will be capitalised only where it is already established that the outcome will be a marketable product—in other words, cases where the company has a genuine asset that can be valued on the balance sheet. The effect of the amendment would be to open up the scheme to companies that have already developed valuable assets with a balance sheet value above the threshold of the scheme.

We have already introduced the research and development tax relief, which is widely recognised as an effective, generous and appropriate policy measure. We announced in the Budget that it would be extended to provide additional support for mid-sized companies with up to 500 employees. The Opposition are effectively asking us for another form of indirect support for research and development. The right mechanism for that support, I suggest, is the R and D tax credit. It targets R and D expenditure directly, and does so in a way that is widely accepted to be an effective form of incentive for research and development.

Finally, amendment No. 13 seeks to exempt money raised from venture capital trusts prior to the current tax year from the requirement that it is invested in line with the objectives of the scheme. The 70 per cent. rule for venture capital trust investments, as the hon. Gentleman explained, already allows flexibility on up to 30 per cent. of the value of a VCT's fund. That is generous enough to allow VCTs the flexibility that they need to operate, and the Government's proposed change simply closes a loophole that makes it possible to get round the test.

Let me dwell on the rule change and the accusation of retrospection, which I do not accept. What we are proposing will help to ensure that the scheme meets the policy purposes for which it was introduced, and makes a contribution to the growth and productivity of this country and our small firms, as intended. The 70 per cent. rule about the funds from the VCT being invested in qualifying investments was the original intention of the scheme. Rules were drawn up to achieve that, and it is the basis on which approvals have been sought by VCTs and given by the Government.

[John Healey]

It cannot be right that funds raised with a significant tax relief are not used for the purpose for which the tax support was intended. It cannot be right that fund managers have a get-out if they fail to make the level of qualifying investments that are often in their prospectus. It cannot be right also that investors' expectations that their money will be invested in small companies with high growth potential are thwarted by the funds instead being kept in cash or non-interest-bearing accounts.

I urge the hon. Gentleman to bear it in mind that the measure will not apply to funds raised before 6 April this year. It is not designed to catch inadvertent breaches. If there are inadvertent breaches of the 70 per cent. rule, they should be reported, together with a plan to correct them, to HMRC, which will not take the enforcement action that would otherwise be required. The measure is not a device that the majority of VCTs use or need to use in order to maintain their adherence to the 70 per cent. qualifying rule.

When those considerations are added to the fact that we are not removing the essential generous flexibility of the 30 per cent., it is clear that the amendment is not appropriate. The hon. Gentleman, the hon. Member for Braintree or the hon. Member for Ludlow may know that one of the leading VCT advisers advises all its clients that they should aim not for 70 per cent., but for 80 per cent., so that they have sufficient flexibility to deal with the peaks and troughs of the cycle.

Clause 91 ensures that the legislation operates effectively in requiring that the funds raised by VCTs are directed towards qualifying companies. I say to the hon. Member for Ludlow that we see no reason why the VCTs should have difficulty adapting to the change by next year, when it comes into force. The provisions of schedule 14 are designed to increase the effectiveness of the venture capital schemes—

Mr. Dunne rose—

John Healey: I was just winding up, but I will give way to the hon. Gentleman. He has assiduously attended the debates of the Committee of the whole House, and I welcome that.

Mr. Dunne: I am grateful to the Financial Secretary. The HMRC guidance on inadvertent breaches is welcome, as it may deal with the issue mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) concerning a realisation generating a substantial amount of cash at an inopportune point in the year, when a test might be about to be met, for example. It would be helpful to the Committee if the Minister would confirm whether that would be addressed by the guidance from HMRC. If it would not, ought there not be provision in the Bill?

John Healey: To put the matter in perspective, the cases of inadvertent breaches of the rule that have come to our attention number fewer than a dozen. It is a small-scale problem in a minority of VCTs. HMRC will shortly issue guidance that will help cover important aspects of inadvertent breaches. I shall make sure that the hon. Gentleman receives a copy directly.

The amendments would prevent us from improving the scheme as we intend. I hope the Opposition will see fit to withdraw them, having had this useful and extended debate. If not, I shall have to ask my hon. Friends to vote them down.

Mr. Hoban: I thank the Minister for the effectiveness of his reply. I shall comment first on amendments Nos. 6, 7 and 8. He makes a persuasive case for the reduction in the asset limits. I am grateful, as I am sure is the VCT industry, for his reassurances that the situation will be kept under review and action taken where necessary. The House would welcome regular updates on the monitoring of the nature of the investments undertaken by VCTs working under the new asset limits.

On amendment No. 9 on accounting practices and the differential treatment that there can be under UK and international standards for the capitalisation of development—the right hon. Gentleman was right to distinguish between research and development—the issue is not so much that one group of businesses would get a double benefit for R and D, as that a business that applied international financial reporting standards could go over the gross asset test, whereas the same business using generally accepted UK accounting practice could fall below the gross asset test.

Given the difference in accounting practice for the treatment of capitalised development costs under the UK and international financial reporting standards, a company could benefit from VCT investment while another does not. I hope that the Financial Secretary will reflect on that as we consider unlisted companies' take-up of international financial reporting standards, and whether that causes some businesses to lose out on VCT relief because they adopt one method of accounting rather than another.

On amendment No. 13, I also welcome the Financial Secretary's reassurance on inadvertent breaches of the 70 per cent. rule and his comments on the associated guidance that HMRC will issue. Although his remarks are absolutely right about the importance of such money being invested—that is what investors in VCTs would seek—it is important that the guidance on inadvertent breaches should consider situations where investments might well be realised and the trust might breach the 70 per cent. rule, pending a further investment or the return of cash to its shareholders.

3 pm

John Bercow: The Financial Secretary referred to the issue of guidance by the Inland Revenue. Although we are not discussing regulations that will be the subject of a statutory instrument, and therefore subject to either the negative or the affirmative procedure, does my hon. Friend agree nevertheless that it would be helpful to the House if we could have sight of that guidance, if only in draft form, before the final passage of the Bill? It would aid and support our deliberations to get that before rather after the event.

Mr. Hoban: As ever, my hon. Friend makes an important point about the parliamentary scrutiny of such issues and the way in which we can address them before consideration of the Bill has been completed, and I am sure that the Financial Secretary will take that point on board. I hope that the industry and its advisers are fully consulted on the guidance, to ensure that it tackles inadvertent breaches. With that, and the Financial Secretary's assurances, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Hoban: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 75, line 25 [Vol II], leave out '30' and insert '40'.

The Temporary Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 11, in page 75, line 30 [Vol II], leave out '30' and insert '40'.

These amendments have already been referred to en passant.

Mr. Hoban: I am sure, Sir John, that we will have a fuller airing in this debate of some of the issues that were raised in the debate on the previous group of amendments. Under the amendments now before us, we seek to make permanent the temporary increase in income tax relief that applies to VCTs and enterprise investment schemes. The Financial Secretary and I have different views of what a move to 30 per cent. means. He seems to think that it is an increase; I might suggest that it is a decrease—but I am sure that we will return to that topic in a minute.

It is worth remembering why the 40 per cent. rate was introduced in 2002. It was intended to stimulate the VCT market, and in the words of the British Venture Capital Association's pre-Budget submission,

"meet the Government's objective of creating funds for investment in entrepreneurial companies that stimulate growth and create employment and tax revenue."

Indeed, it has had the benefit of stimulating the VCT market and raising more funds for investment in unlisted companies. In 2004–05, VCTs raised more than £500 million in funds; press comment around the end of the financial year suggests that they had raised about £730 million. Of course it is worth bearing in mind the fact that in the year before the relief was increased from 20 to 40 per cent., the sales of VCTs were worth less than £100 million.

Stephen Hesford: In simple terms, as I understand the matter, before the change took place in 2004 the rate was 20 per cent. That rate was introduced as a temporary two-year measure to increase VCTs, which it has done. I understand that the hon. Gentleman is making that point. The Government are now regularising the situation consonant with that prior to 2004, to a higher rate—30 per cent. What is wrong with that?

Mr. Hoban: I will address the hon. Gentleman's question about why that might be wrong, but the point, which was touched on in the last debate, is that both the Financial Secretary and the hon. Gentleman talk about the rate increasing from 20 to 30 per cent. Some people would argue that there is really a decrease, from 40 to 30 per cent. It depends on one's starting point, in judging what the measure is trying to change. With amendments Nos. 10 and 11, I seek to retain the 40 per cent. tax relief rate, rather than to reduce it to 30 per cent.

Before the changes took place in 2004, VCTs were running out of steam—their sales were low—and the temporary increase in tax relief to 40 per cent. stimulated that market. There is concern in the VCT market about the impact that the reduction in tax relief to 30 per cent. might have on the sales of VCT funds, and I shall quote some of the press comment around the time of the Budget. Bestinvest suggested that sales of VCTs in 2006–07 might be about £100 million to £150 million—quite a significant decrease on the amount achieved in 2005–06. Martin Churchill of Tax Efficient Review forecast sales of £250 million to £300 million. My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) quoted the views of Henry Chaplin, suggesting that sales would be about £300 million. Clearly, we will not know the outcome until the end of the financial year, and there is uncertainty about the funds that VCTs will raise, and therefore the money that will be available to trusts to invest in small and growing businesses.

Stephen Hesford: The hon. Gentleman would not have intended to conflate two arguments, but I understand that when the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) gave us figures about the differential sales of VCTs, he was talking about the previous set of amendments, and the sales differential that resulted from what the Government were doing with those amendments. We are now talking about a different set of regimes, and the hon. Gentleman is conflating the previous figures with these. Which sales drop does he think results from these changes—or is he quoting another set of drops that was put before the House on a different set of amendments?

Mr. Hoban: The hon. Gentleman needs to remember that there is a series of three changes in schedule 14 that impact on the sales of VCTs, and it is very difficult to pull apart the impact that each one will have on sales. My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow referred to Henry Chaplin in the context of the impact of the reduction in gross asset values. Some people will point to a later amendment on the holding period as being the driver behind this; others will look at the change in tax relief. The complexity arises in part because of the way in which the amendments have been selected for debate, but also because of the complex interaction between holding periods, gross asset tests and tax relief.

Stephen Hesford: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is an element of double counting? The House needs to be sure which figures we are relying on—those for the specific amendments that we have under review, not those for the other amendments.

Mr. Hoban: The hon. Gentleman is about to make a mountain out of a molehill. There are differing effects, and it is difficult to unpick the precise effect that each one has. The point that I am making is that in 2004–05 and 2005–06 sales of VCTs were strong, and had increased significantly during 2003–04, during which time the income tax relief was 40 per cent. If the Government say that the 40 per cent. rate led to that increase in sales, the hon. Gentleman must conclude from that that the reduction in income tax relief could, as has been suggested by some in the industry, lead to a reduction in sales in 2006–07 and subsequent years.

[Mr. Hoban]

The concern in the sector about the change in the rate of relief boils down to a relatively simple but fundamental point that my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) referred to in his intervention on me during our debate on the previous group of amendments. There is a relationship between the level of risk that an investor will take on board and the return. The concern is that the overall effect of reducing the rate of relief, and allied to that the increase in the rate of investment that we dealt with in the previous group of amendments, will be a reduction in the return from VCTs, making them less attractive to investors. Will investors be prepared to accept the greater risk attached to smaller companies with fewer assets given the reduction in tax relief on their investments in VCT and EIS schemes?

Martin Churchill, to whom I referred earlier, from Tax Efficient Review, suggests that there might be a flight from higher-risk investments within VCTs to lower-risk investments. Robert Drummond, a former chairman of the British Venture Capital Association, has said:

"With the 30 per cent. income-tax relief rate the Chancellor has found a compromise between maintaining the current level and returning to 20 per cent., but this change, together with the increase in the minimum holding period from three to five years"—

we will deal with that in the next group of amendments—

"appreciably alters the risk-reward profile of private-equity investment by personal taxpayers."

I appreciate that many in the VCT sector were relieved when the Chancellor announced that the rate of relief was to be 30 per cent. A number were concerned that it would be reduced further to 20 per cent. But I think that even the hon. Member for Wirral, West (Stephen Hesford) will agree that it is clear that VCT investment levels are sensitive to changes in tax relief, as the sales figures over the course of the past three years show. It is difficult to build a viable VCT sector and facilitate investment in smaller companies if flows are volatile.

I want to pick up on a commitment made by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on Second Reading last week in relation to the change in the rate of tax relief. He said:

"To ensure that the industry has a solid foundation for stable fundraising and continued growth, the Bill guarantees the rate of income tax relief for investments in venture capital trusts at 30 per cent. for the rest of this Parliament."—[Official Report, 24 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 365–66.]

I should be grateful if the Financial Secretary would elaborate on that commitment. It is rare for a Treasury Minister to commit to fixing rates so long in advance. In election campaigns, despite the efforts of interviewers, the Chancellor and the Prime Minister have always been evasive about giving any long-term commitment to rates. Will the Financial Secretary explain why that commitment has been give to VCTs in this Budget?

When the Financial Secretary replies, will he answer three questions? Can he confirm that the Chief Secretary's statement to the House last Monday will hold? What steps can he take to ensure that that will be enshrined in legislation so that investors can plan with confidence for the rest of this Parliament? Is this a symmetrical commitment? That is, will the relief remain unchanged, either up or down, regardless of events? Those are important clarifications that the Financial Secretary should give today to provide the industry with some comfort about the Chief Secretary's commitment. Regardless of whether 30 per cent. is the right or the wrong rate, stability and consistency are vital to the sector if it is to build.

I end on this note of caution. As I said earlier, the rate of sales of VCTs has been sensitive to changes in the tax rate, and, following the Financial Secretary's reassurances on a previous group of amendments, I would not like to see the small businesses that are meant to be helped by such schemes lose out because investors turn off the flow of funds into VCTs.

3.15 pm

Mr. Newmark: The Government's desire to refocus VCT investment is a simple excuse for dealing with the unforeseen cost to the Exchequer of the tax relief currently offered to investors. The cost to the Exchequer of 40 per cent. income tax relief has risen from £220 million to £315 million, nothwithstanding the caveat that those figures are "particularly tentative and subject to a wide margin for error."

Treasury Ministers have perhaps got into the habit of not expecting their market interventions to be successful, and when they are, they are caught short. That is the real justification for part 2 of schedule 14.

The Treasury Committee had the benefit of a simple warning in March 2004 when it heard:

"I think that the Chancellor has to be careful that the history of an awful lot of tax reliefs is that they are set up with very tight restrictions, they have little effect, progressively Chancellors relax the effect, increase the benefits, and then the thing takes off in a completely unexpected direction and has to be stopped."

The Chancellor lectures that there should be no return to boom and bust—it is his favourite stick with which to beat the Opposition—but what is the result of all these changes if not boom and bust for the venture capital trusts and their investors?

The Chief Secretary has committed the Government to maintaining the 30 per cent. income tax relief for the life of this Parliament.

Stephen Hesford: Which part of "temporary" does the hon. Gentleman think that the industry did not understand in 2004?

Mr. Newmark: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right; the point was made that the relief was temporary. But, as we saw, the industry was flat on its back, at a size of £50 million or £70 million, and it is now successful and has grown. But that has been primarily because of the stimulus that the Government gave by increasing the tax relief from 20 per cent. to 40 per cent., and that is my argument here.

The fact remains that repetitive changes in the tax relief scheme and, concurrently, the risk profile of VCTs, will undermine investor confidence and prevent legitimate tax planning. Is that really the solid foundation to investment that the Chief Secretary would have us all believe it to be? The justification for the 40 per cent. income tax relief was always couched, as the hon. Gentleman said, in terms of a temporary stimulus that would be the subject of continued review. But it is questionable whether that approach is helpful to investors who are looking to plan their long-term financial affairs. It has denied them the reasonable level of certainty that should be their right.

My concern as a past practitioner is that there is a high probability that the market will begin to shrink back—the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne)—notwithstanding the preservation now of a proposed 30 per cent. income tax relief.

I also question the assumptions that underpin the figure of 30 per cent. Was it chosen simply because it is a midway point between the old 20 per cent. relief and the two-year period of uprating to 40 per cent., or is there a more substantial justification for the compromise? Venture capital trusts are working, and working well, because there is sufficient incentive to stimulate uptake by investors operating in an inherently risky market. We should not arbitrarily change incentives, even for the lifetime of the Parliament, without subjecting them to regular review.

Mr. Dunne: I should like to make a couple of brief observations. The industry has been almost silent on the issue since the Budget. The explanation is that it has breathed an enormous collective sigh of relief that the relief rate has gone from 20 per cent. up to 40 per cent., and now down to 30 per cent. rather than 20 per cent., which was the anticipated level after the announcement in the Budget two years ago to which the hon. Member for Wirral, West (Stephen Hesford) referred. As a result, it seems that the Treasury has listened to the industry's explanation that reverting back to the 20 per cent. level would risk cutting off the flow of capital to help bridge the vital equity gap.

As I said earlier, I am pleased that the Treasury team has not sought to restrict the rate to its original 20 per cent. level. I remain perplexed, however, why it has not kept it at 40 per cent., particularly if the policy objective, to which the Financial Secretary referred earlier, is to help companies gain access to capital that will allow them to grow, to compete to become larger businesses and to compete internationally in the increasingly global marketplace, on which the Chancellor is constantly lecturing us. It is well understood on these Benches that we are competing on a global scale. Why on earth introduce a measure with relatively little financial cost, as was made clear in the response to the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed), in this manner? It will have the undoubted consequence of reducing the capital available to such companies. Why not leave it alone at 40 per cent., where it is working so effectively?

Mr. Breed: I would like to reinforce what has already been said from the Opposition Benches. I am sure that the Minister is right in saying that the average investment to date has been £3.8 million, based on the 40 per cent. tax allowance. I suspect that it is more likely to have been the 40 per cent. rate than the eligible assets test that encouraged the greater investment. There is general agreement that the investments eligible under the new rules are likely to be—although they will not always be—more risky in profile than they were, so there may be more justification for maintaining the 40 per cent. rate. At least if it were temporary, it could be extended for one more year and we could see how much more effective the eligible assets test will be. I am concerned that we may face a stop-go problem, irrespective of how much money is invested in the market. Obviously, 30 per cent. is better than 20 per cent., but it seems rather arbitrary. I believe that we could have retained the 40 per cent. rate for one further year while we assessed the effect of the eligible assets test, which would have provided a stronger basis of information on which to judge the success of the scheme.

I therefore broadly support retention of the 40 per cent. rate, but I accept that the Government have made a judgment—that is what it is, a judgment—about whether changes to the rules will focus down on the particular companies that are investing. I accept what the Minister said about going back to the original aims of helping younger and growing companies, but because of the reduction in the incentive, it remains to be seen whether there will be enough money to do so. That remains to be proved.

John Healey: Amendments Nos. 10 and 11 would renew and make permanent the temporary rate of 40 per cent. income tax relief for investments in venture capital trusts. When the Government announced in the 2004 Budget a two-year temporary rate set at 40 per cent. to boost investments in venture capital trusts, it could not have been made clearer that it would expire on 5 April 2006. I made those points very clear in our Committee debates on the Finance Bill that year. It was intended as a stimulus to VCT investments and I am glad that the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) recognised how successful it has been over the past couple of years.

We have seen record investment in these two years with fundraising of £520 million in 2004–05 and more than £700 million in 2005–06. That record fundraising investment led to substantial growth in the VCT industry, in the number of venture capital trusts and in the number of fund managers. I am sure that the hon. Member for Fareham would accept that it is unreasonable to expect the industry to continue this exponential growth and record fundraising increases every year. What it requires now is stability and our proposals are intended to provide just that.

Mr. Newmark: I am sure that the Financial Secretary will go on to deal with some of the points that I made earlier, but I am concerned about his perverse logic. The Government should rightly be congratulated on providing a stimulus for the venture capital trust industry by increasing the tax relief from 20 to 40 per cent. That resulted in clear success, with growth in the sector increasing from £500 million to £700 million. I do not understand why changing the rules will mean the continuance of success, particularly when it was the tax stimulus that helped the industry become a success in the first place.

John Healey: It was just that. It was set at 40 per cent. for two years; it was due to revert at the beginning of April to 20 per cent.; and our judgment now, backed up with a proposal, is that a 30 per cent. rate of income tax relief for VCT investments is appropriate. It represents an increase of 10 percentage points on the original relief rate. As the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall

[John Healey]

(Mr. Breed) said, that is our judgment in the circumstances. We believe that it will help to ensure a sufficient and stable level of fundraising in the years to come and that it will therefore help to support a sustainable VCT sector in the years to come. It is designed, in response to the issues raised by the hon. Member for Fareham, to be a settled rate. As we discussed in the last group of amendments, it is also important carefully to monitor the application of the VCT schemes and the impact of the package of changes that we are introducing. It is right to keep under review, as we do with all taxes, the operation and impact of the scheme.

Mr. Hoban: I hope that I am not about to pre-empt the Minister's next comment, but will he reiterate the Chief Secretary's commitment last week on Second Reading that the rate is designed to last the life of this Parliament?

John Healey: I am explaining that it is designed to be a new, settled and more generous rate than existed in the scheme previously when it was set at 20 per cent. The hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) believes that that is not generous enough, but let me put it to him again that this package of reforms related to clause 91 is costing the Exchequer more, not less, in respect of the support it gives to venture capital schemes. It is an additional annual cost of £15 million, amounting to a total annual cost from this year of £220 million of support for venture capital schemes.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): Hon. Members of all parties agree on the importance and desirability of investment in venture companies. Clearly, the ultimate measure of success will be the return that the Exchequer gets on its own investment when the companies come to maturity and are able to pay back to the Treasury in tax. Has any estimate been made—I understand that it is early days—along those lines about what sort of return can be expected from the Government's investment when these companies mature?

3.30 pm

John Healey: The hon. Gentleman would not expect the Treasury to micro-monitor the performance of investments by VCTs at that level, but we assess the overall impact of such schemes. That is an important feature of Government accountability, to which I expect hon. Members to hold us.

The amendments would introduce a permanent 40 per cent. rate of income tax relief, which does not offer a sustainable position for VCTs or a cost-effective position for UK taxpayers. On that basis, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the amendment. If not, I must ask my hon. Friends to vote against it.

Mr. Hoban: I thank the Financial Secretary for his response to the debate. I am concerned whether the move from a 40 to a 30 per cent. rate will create a stop-go environment within the VCT sector. Other hon. Members have already referred to boom and bust, because the sector has gone from bust to boom, and we cannot know what will happen next until the end of this financial year.

I have taken on board the Financial Secretary's comments about keeping the matter under review. However, I do not think that his reassurances about the 30 per cent. rate were as copper-bottomed as those provided by the Chief Secretary on Second Reading, and it is important that reassurance is provided. I do not know whether there will be an opportunity on Report for the Financial Secretary to introduce amendments to make it clear in the Bill that the 30 per cent. rate will see us through until the end of this Parliament, because the sector expects the 30 per cent. rate to hold throughout this Parliament. However, given the Financial Secretary's comments, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Hoban: I beg to move amendment No. 12, in schedule 14, page 76 [Vol II], leave out lines 1 to 13.

The amendment probes the third element of the change to VCTs. Until the Finance Bill was introduced, investors in VCTs benefited from the full income tax relief, if they held their investments for at least three years. The Finance Bill lengthens that holding period to five years, which is one of three measures that could impact on the attractiveness of that form of investment in the VCT market and consequently the flow of funds into VCTs and therefore into small and growing businesses.

Again, I shall quote Mr. Robert Drummond, who is a former chairman of the British Venture Capital Association:

> "With the 30 per cent. income tax relief rate the Chancellor has found a compromise between maintaining the current level and returning to 20 per cent., but this change together with the increase in the minimum holding period from three to five years, appreciably alters the risk-reward profile of private equity investment by personal taxpayers."

In the context of the interlocking web of proposals, Mr. Drummond is arguing that the holding period may have the impact of discouraging investment in VCTs.

I can see the benefit for VCTs and companies that receive investment of increasing the holding period from three years to five years, which will give both the VCTs and the companies reassurance, stability and the ability to plan for the long term. However, it is difficult to strike a balance, because one might end up with a scheme that is perfect for the interests of the companies and VCTs but that is not sufficiently attractive to investors.

I seek an explanation from the Financial Secretary on why the five-year period was chosen—the next amendment proposes lengthening the holding period—before a VCT investor can gain the full benefit from the reduced tax relief.

Mr. Dunne: I want to support amendment No. 12 and make a couple of observations from my experience about the investor base in VCTs. Increasing the holding period for an investor from three years to five years will unquestionably reduce the attractiveness of the investment to private investors. Investors in VCTs are, by definition, individuals who have reached a certain stage of maturity in their investment life. I hesitate to say that the majority of those individuals are pensioners, but judging by those who turn up at the annual general meeting of my VCT, the majority who take an active interest are pensioners, although that may be because they have readily available leisure time in which to attend AGMs.

The manager of the VCT group with which I am involved has analysed the average age, investment expectation and holding period of investors in VCTs. People invest in VCTs for a number of different reasons: some are interested in capital appreciation in a tax-free environment; some are interested in income in a tax-free environment; and some are interested in a combination of the two. However, the notion that they would put at risk the tax relief available on their initial subscription if they were to seek to sell their holding within five years will undoubtedly lead a number of investors to move away from VCTs. Those investors will not necessarily include larger investors, who have further opportunities for portfolio diversification and may invest primarily for the tax reliefs, but a lot of small investors want exposure to smaller companies and feel that they are doing what the Government want by helping to finance young, energetic companies run by entrepreneurial people, which contributes to the growth and revival of the British economy. Indeed, some people choose to invest in VCTs for altruistic reasons. Increasing the holding period is the most significant measure among those proposed by the Government to change the VCTs regime, and it will restrict the attractions to investors and therefore limit the Government's policy objectives.

John Healey: We propose to lengthen the shareholding period for investments in VCTs following formal and informal representations from the VCT industry, which is the direct answer to the hon. Gentleman's question about the five-year period.

Mr. Andrew Holmes, chairman of Quester Capital Management Ltd, is not untypical. He wrote to the Chancellor in January, suggesting that we reinstate the original five-year holding period, which he described as one method of "making the whole scheme more clearly matched to the realities of building young companies over the longer term".

I point out to the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) that that is the principal purpose of those schemes. There was an interesting reaction from the industry on the holding period. Ben Yearsley of Hargreaves Lansdown said:

"It means there will be fewer short-term investors hoping to making a quick return—that is not a bad thing."

The announcement was widely welcomed. The Sunday Times reported:

"The increased holding time had been welcomed by advisers, many of whom believed that the three-year rule encouraged investors to think of VCTs as short-term investments when they really should be held for a longer time".

Unlike the application of the 70 per cent. rule, which, after April 2007, will apply to all funds, including funds raised before this financial year, the change to the holding period will apply to new funds, not to funds raised before 6 April 2006. There is broad consensus in the investment community that the change is positive: equity investments in small firms need to be longer term to provide stability for the firms in receipt of investment, and sufficient time is required to generate genuine gains for the investor. I hope that the House accepts those arguments and the fact that we are making the right changes in clause 91. I therefore hope that the hon. Member for Fareham will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Hoban: In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne), it is a relief to discover that there are similarities in the audiences who attend the AGMs of all sorts of organisations, whether they are VCTs or otherwise. It is reassuring to learn from the Financial Secretary that managers of VCTs have responded to the proposal, and have encouraged the extension of the holding period. As I explained, I understand why they sought that extension. As was said earlier, it is important that we ensure the stability of the VCT industry. On that note, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Hoban: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in schedule 14, page 77, line 3 [Vol II], at end add—

PART 6

INHERITANCE TAX

9 In section 104(1)(a) of IHTA 1984 for "(b) or (bb)" substitute "(b) (bb) or (bc)".

10 In section 105(1) of IHTA 1984 after subsection (bb) insert—

"(bc) eligible shares in a venture capital trust as defined by section 842AA(14) of the Taxes Act 1988;"

PART 7

LONGER HOLDING PERIODS

11(1) Schedule 15B to The Taxes Act 1988 is amended as follows.

(2) In paragraph 1, after subparagraph (2) insert—

"(2A) An individual shall also be eligible for relief in the 6th year after subscribing for eligible shares if those shares are held by him at the 6th anniversary of the subscription.

(2B) The amounts on which an individual shall be taken for the purposes of sub-paragraph (2A) above to be eligible for relief shall be the original subscription amount for such shares.

(3) In paragraph 3(1)(b) leave out "those shares were issued to that individual" and insert "the shares became eligible for relief under paragraph 1(2) or (2A) above. But relief claimed for a subscription of eligible shares more than five years before the date of disposal shall not be withdrawn."'.

Briefly, the amendment falls into two parts, and I shall deal first with proposed new paragraphs 9 and 10. The VCT sector faces a challenge, and we must encourage a secondary market in VCT shares. As we know, the initial subscriber benefits from tax relief, but subsequent purchasers do not. I am not suggesting that income tax relief should be made available to subsequent purchasers, but we should consider an inheritance tax treatment of shares in VCTs, as that could make them more attractive to purchasers in the secondary market by extending the IHT treatment to the underlying shares or the investments in unlisted companies. Shares in such companies qualify for relief from IHT business property relief, and the proposal would obviously increase their attractiveness to investors by encouraging them to hold on to them. I wish to encourage the secondary market and discourage initial investors from realising their investment by building on the stability that we discussed earlier.

[Mr. Hoban]

Holders should therefore be encouraged to retain those shares in their estate in the knowledge that the business property exemption rule applies to shares in VCTs.

Secondly, part 7 represents a return to the subject of amendment No. 12, which dealt with the extension of the holding period from three to five years, but it approaches it from the opposite direction. Is five years too short a period? Should we incentivise investors to hold shares for a longer period of up to 10 years and stagger relief, rather than providing it up front? This probing amendment is therefore the second part of my argument. I should be grateful if the Minister commented on the appropriateness of the IHT treatment of shares in VCTs, and highlighted the treatment of the underlying shares in which VCTs invest.

3.45 pm

John Healey: As the hon. Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) said, the amendment probes the notion of introducing inheritance tax business property relief for shares in venture capital trusts. It aims, too, to introduce a second tranche of income tax relief for investments in VCTs on the sixth anniversary of an individual holding that investment, but neither of those proposals would benefit the VCT scheme. A second tranche of income tax relief would not encourage any additional investment in small growth companies, and it would not contribute anything to the objectives of the VCT scheme. The hon. Gentleman will accept that his amendment involves a substantial deadweight cost, as it would provide an unnecessary incentive to investors in VCTs that were performing well. More worryingly, it would create an incentive for individuals to maintain their shareholdings in poor-performing VCTs, instead of exiting the investment for solid commercial reasons at the appropriate time. The amendment would not restrict relief to new shares, but it would enable existing investors to claim additional relief without contributing further funds—a cost that the Government cannot justify.

On the inheritance tax proposal, income tax relief is the best incentive for investments in VCTs, as it is available and attractive to the widest possible pool of investors—something that cannot be said of the inheritance tax relief proposed by the amendment. Finally, on inheritance tax, VCT shares are quoted shares listed on the main market of the London stock exchange. Quoted shares currently qualify for inheritance tax business property relief in the exceptional circumstance that the quoted company is still in family control. That is clearly not compatible with VCT schemes, so we do not accept that there is a case for an extension of business property relief to the VCT scheme. On that basis, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his amendment but, if he does not do so, I urge my hon. Friends to vote against it.

Mr. Hoban: Once again, I am grateful to the Financial Secretary for setting out the Government's case for not extending IHT relief by designating VCT shares as business property. I accept his argument, as well the argument about changing the structure of the income tax relief available to investors who held their shares beyond the sixth anniversary. Bearing in mind his explanation, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 14 agreed to.

Clause 106

CONDITIONS FOR COMPANY

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I beg to move amendment No. 24, in page 97, line 13 [Vol I], at end add—

'(1A) Not later than 31st March 2007, and annually thereafter, the Chancellor of the Exchequer shall lay before Parliament a report of the number and estimated market capitalisation of the companies that have given notice to register as Real Estate Investment Trusts under section 109.'.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 4, in page 97, line 23 [Vol I], at end insert

'or are permitted to be dealt in on the Alternative Investment Market of the Stock Exchange.'.

No. 23, in page 97, line 24 [Vol I], leave out subsection (6).

Mr. Francois: Clause 106 is arguably the key part of part 4, in that it defines some of the principal conditions that companies must meet in order to qualify for real estate investment trust—REIT—status. That is why we selected it for debate in a Committee of the whole House. I am sure, however, that we will have plenty of opportunity to explore the other 42 clauses relating to REITs in more detail upstairs in Committee. I look forward to debating the subject with the Economic Secretary in a few weeks' time—I genuinely hope that it will be him.

As I said on Second Reading, Her Majesty's Opposition welcome the introduction of REITs in principle, having pressed the Government to adopt such a structure for several years. However, we are generally concerned to get the detail right, and we will table amendments that are designed to ensure that, from the outset in January 2007, the concept operates in the positive interests of the United Kingdom economy. That also applies to the amendments that we are debating today.

My first question to the Minister concerns the detailed regulations that the Government have offered to provide, which are designed to fill out some of the detail of how the provisions in the Bill, including clause 106, will operate in practice. When are those regulations likely to be published? Specifically, are they likely to be available before the Bill goes into Standing Committee next week? It would obviously be beneficial to have sight of the regulations, and ideally some time to digest them and consult on them, in order to give context to many of the clauses that we will subsequently be expected to debate upstairs. I am not alleging any skulduggery on the part of the Government, but merely saying that it would be handy to have a definitive date for when the regulations are likely to be published. Perhaps the Minister can seek inspiration on that point and let the Committee know before we conclude our proceedings on REITs.

The concept of REITs has been around for some time, having been introduced in the United States as far back as the 1960s. Similar vehicles exist in several other countries, including Australia, Japan and European countries such as France. Germany is also in the process of considering the introduction of a REITs regime, although I understand that its preparations are not as far forward as our own.

In essence, a REIT is designed to facilitate collective investment in property, which by its very nature often requires large amounts of capital. REITs will enjoy key tax advantages that create a transparency between the ultimate investors and the underlying investments, and they will be exempted from corporation tax on property income and from capital gains. In return, REIT companies must meet certain key conditions, including that 75 per cent. or more of their assets must be investment property, that 75 per cent. or more of their income must be rental income, and that at least 90 per cent. of their profits must be distributed as a dividend to their investors, who will then be taxed on those dividends as property-related income. As the explanatory notes to clause 106 state:

"The company conditions are designed to restrict the scheme to publicly listed companies with their equity and debt finance arranged in such a way as to ensure that tax-exempt profits are paid out to shareholders as taxable profits under Schedule A."

However, the Government have laid down in clause 106 several additional conditions that a company must meet in order to qualify for REIT status and the attendant tax benefit that it confers. Those six key qualifying conditions can be summarised briefly as follows. First, the REIT company must be resident in the United Kingdom. Secondly, it must not be an open-ended investment company—an OEIC. Thirdly, it must be quoted on a recognised stock exchange. Fourthly, it must not be a close company. That is usually defined as being controlled by five or fewer people, but I give the Minister notice that there is a particular technical point on that, to which I want to return in a few minutes. Fifthly, it must have only one class of ordinary shares, plus potentially only non-voting fixed-rate preference shares. In other words, it must be confined to only those two types of share capital. Sixthly, its borrowing must effectively be limited to reasonable commercial terms.

There is an additional point about the specific importance of the clause 106 conditions. Some other conditions for which the Bill provides, such as the income acid test and the gearing restriction, if breached, do not necessarily result in the withdrawal of REIT status. However, the strictures of clause 106 conditions could be harsher in that a breach would result in a company being expelled from the REIT regime. To use a footballing analogy, a breach of some of the non-clause 106 conditions can result in a booking—a yellow card—but a breach of one of the clause 106 conditions is currently a sending-off offence. A company would be red-carded for such a breach.

Given the added importance of those conditions, our amendments are designed to elicit further information from the Government about how some of them would work in practice and whether any flexibility is envisaged for their operation. As we know from the consultation exercise, flexibility has been introduced for interpreting some of the other conditions in the Bill.

Amendment No. 4 would expand a third of the qualifying conditions in clause 106 to include property investment companies that are listed on the alternative investment market of the stock exchange, or AIM, as it is more popularly known. I understand that there was something of a problem for the property industry during the consultation process. We are therefore understandably keen to press the Government on their thinking on the matter. We have received some representations about expanding the concept even for unlisted companies. However, for the moment, we have decided to confine ourselves to pressing the matter in relation to AIM.

AIM-listed companies already provide a legitimate form of collective investment, so why have the Government decided to exclude them from the REIT regime from the start? On a practical level, property companies that are registered as REITs are likely to enjoy significant tax advantages over those—usually smaller—companies, that are denied the advantages that REIT status confers. There could therefore be considerable consolidation in the market as REITs take over other property companies, such as those on AIM, which cannot qualify for REIT status. That is potentially unfair and, over time, could mean that the UK property market was increasingly dominated by a relatively small number of large REIT companies. I presume that the Government did not intend that. We would move in the direction of an oligopolistic market and I am not sure that Ministers want that.

Moreover, AIM-listed companies might come under pressure to convert to a full stock exchange listing before they were ready for it, principally to qualify for REIT status, thus potentially causing a distortion in the orderly evolution of the market sector. Why not, therefore, expand the condition to cover at least AIM-listed companies, which meet all the other conditions that the Government have set, and thus facilitate greater diversity in the REITs market available to investors? There is a strong common-sense argument for doing that.

The British Property Federation has provided a note on the subject. It argues:

"The property industry in the UK believes the consequence of limiting REITs to listed companies will be to unnecessarily limit the development of REITs because it heightens the barrier for new entrants to the UK REIT regime and as a consequence makes it that much more difficult for new REIT companies to form. Clearly, this has consequences for those seeking to establish new investment vehicles in traditionally under-invested property markets, such as the residential private rented sector."

I am sure that the Government want to boost the residential private rented sector, not least to provide a supply of housing for those who find it difficult to obtain somewhere to live. It is worth bearing in mind that the BPF is intimating that, if the companies are not allowed to obtain REIT status when they are on AIM, that might hinder the objective that I outlined.

Furthermore, the BPF points out:

"The restriction is particularly difficult to understand when there are alternative markets that are an established feature of the UK collective investment market, including for example the Alternative Investment Market. AIM is specifically designed to help emerging companies that wish to be open to public investment yet would find it difficult to sustain themselves on a recognised stock exchange at an early stage in their development. The proposed Amendment"— that is, our amendment—

"seeks therefore to open up the current Clause 106 legislation to allow companies listed via AIM to convert to REIT status. This would enable the development of new or smaller companies into the REIT market and thus help to ensure REITs are a sustained successful investment vehicle across the property markets."

4 pm

The BPF summed up its position on this question in the following terms:

"In summary therefore, our main concern with Clause 106 as it is written is that while it is likely that a number of existing listed property companies will convert to the new REIT regime, the provisions do not cater for the growth and enhancement of this market which will in turn bring forward investment benefits and opportunities to improve the quantity and quality of property investment in underinvested markets. In short, by so restricting the rate regime to only 'recognised stock exchange' listed vehicles the government may inadvertently smother the ability of the market to develop."

I should say to the Minister that I do not think that that is in any way polemical or over the top. I genuinely believe that it is a perfectly reasonable point.

On 5 April 2006, the Financial Times published a special supplement entirely devoted to the subject of REITs, and it made very interesting reading. It gave a generally positive welcome to the concept. However, it also contained an article by Peter Damesick, the head of research at C.B. Richard Ellis, which was interestingly entitled:

"Distortions the Government needs to remove".

In it, Mr. Damesick argued the following:

"The rules further limit the pool of potential Reit creators by excluding companies listed on the Alternative Investment Market (AIM). An AIM listing could serve as an incubator for small Reit start-ups, potentially capable of growing into larger Reits with a full stock market listing. The hurdles put in the way of Reit creation stand in marked contrast to the provisions introduced in the US in the early 1990s to enable the easy transition of private property companies, trusts and partnerships into the listed Reits sector."

Importantly, he then adds:

"These proved fundamental to the US market's subsequent rapid growth."

The Financial Times estimates that more than $300 billion is now invested in US REITs, and notes that spreading the listing base for the concept was important in generating that substantial degree of investment. That is presumably something that the Government would eventually like to emulate, at least on a relative scale for the United Kingdom. I think that $300 billion worth of investment in UK REITs within the first couple of years might be a rather ambitious target. Nevertheless, I am sure that the Government want to encourage as much investment into UK REITs as is practically possible. I would therefore stress to the Minister that the US experience has shown that widening the listing base has been instrumental in encouraging additional investment and in getting the concept to take off. I am informed that it was in the 1990s that it really took off in the United States.

The alternative investment market is generally regarded as a success story and, if the Minister will allow me to say so, it was a Conservative Government who introduced it in 1995. We would like to make REITs a success story too. Therefore, we would genuinely like to know why the Government are reluctant to consider expanding the REITs concept to the alternative investment market. We would like to hear their explanation. If they will not concede this point this afternoon—I hope they will—will they at least make a commitment to keep the question under review once the REIT regime rolls out in practice next year, and to take another look at the matter once the regime is up and running? I look forward to hearing the Minister's response to this amendment with particular interest.

I turn now to the reasons behind our amendment No. 23, which relates to close companies. I should stress that this is a probing amendment, but it would, in principle, delete the fourth of the six qualifying conditions from clause 106. That condition is that a REIT must not be a close company, which is broadly defined as a company that is controlled by five or fewer people. If the other conditions remain in place and the company remains publicly quoted—either on the full stock exchange or AIM, as previously discussed—why, in principle, should a company be forced out of the REIT regime because it is controlled by five or fewer people? We would be interested to hear the Government's thinking. For instance, a company that breaches that condition would automatically be removed from the REIT regime. Companies might therefore be required to monitor their shareholdings continuously to ensure that the condition is not breached. Because the actions are to some extent outside the company's control, however, the management might not be able to anticipate or even prevent such a breach, even though, were it to occur, it might cost them their REIT status, and in some circumstances it might not be their fault.

During the consultation exercise, the Government conceded to some extent on a different condition whereby they originally intended to limit individual shareholdings in a REIT to 10 per cent. Some flexibility has been introduced into the Bill whereby regulations will restrict distributions to holders of more than 10 per cent of shares in a REIT but, interestingly, will apparently not remove REIT status if the 10 per cent. limit is breached, as the condition in clause 106 relating to close companies would.

The Government have therefore given way to some extent on the 10 per cent. limit, and we appreciate that they might be reluctant to allow a single shareholder to control a REIT. We understand that that was a particular concern of the Government's throughout the consultation process, and we are not challenging that point directly. There is a difference, however, between one and five. Can the Economic Secretary therefore explain why the close company condition is still such a necessary one, especially given that if a company fails to meet it just once during a year it might lose its REIT status automatically, which could cause uncertainty for both the company's directors and potential investors. Investors might be worried about putting money into a REIT company if they thought that they might inadvertently breach that condition and therefore lose the REIT status and some of the tax advantages conferred by it. That is a reasonably important point, and we genuinely want to probe the Government's thinking on it.

In addition, I want to raise a technical point in relation to amendment No. 23 and close companies, as I tried to intimate to the Economic Secretary when I began my remarks. A close company is defined in section 414 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. Broadly, such a company is controlled by five or fewer shareholders. There are exemptions to that rule of thumb, however, as I am sure the Economic Secretary is aware. For instance, a company that would otherwise be a close company is not so if it is controlled by another company that is not close. As the British Property Federation, which has asked me to raise this question, has pointed out:

"As currently drafted the provisions would seem to catch shares held by an exempt pension fund as well as a non-close company. This is because section 414(5) is extended to pension funds by section 414(7)".

of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. The BPF assumes that that is intended, as do I.

As one of the intentions of REITs is, I presume, to attract investment by institutional investors, not least pension funds, it would be helpful to clarify that question, either this afternoon or perhaps when the guidelines are published. I admit that the point is rather technical, but that is partly what this process is for, and it would be helpful for pension funds particularly to have any uncertainty removed. Perhaps the Economic Secretary will seek some inspiration and respond on that question this afternoon. If not, perhaps we will hear from him when the guidelines are published—in the near future, I hope.

Amendment No. 24 asks for the Chancellor to prepare a report to Parliament by March 2007, and annually thereafter, on the operation of the REIT regime. The report should include the number of companies that have applied for REIT status, under the auspices of clause 109, and should also record their market capitalisation. The purpose is to monitor the initial operation of the scheme, and to report to Parliament on its progress

The first report would be due within three months of REITs' coming into force in January next year. I realise that that is quite a tight time scale, but there is an intention behind it. It would provide an early indication of the popularity or otherwise of the concept: we would see an early snapshot of the degree to which REITs are catching on in the United Kingdom. I think that that would be helpful, given that a number of people—not least Members of Her Majesty's Opposition—have been pushing the Government to adopt the concept for a number of years.

Once the idea has bedded in, it would also be helpful to have annual updates on its progress, not least so that we can assess whether REITs are generating the income for the Treasury that it has estimated will be forthcoming—chiefly from the entry fee for property assets which are being placed in REITs, which I think is now set at about 2 per cent. I appreciate that that fee can be paid in instalments over a period of four years, and that when we look at the figures for the first few years, if a number of companies that elected to pay in instalments are doing so, the full amount of money may not be recorded because some may only have paid part of the fee; but I think we can all allow for that statistical caveat. It would still be helpful information for the House, and indeed the market.

The Red Book estimates that the income from REITs to the Exchequer is likely to be some £320 million by the end of 2008–09. In other words, the Treasury thinks that REITs will raise about a third of a billion pounds between January 2007 and then. It would be helpful to have a specific reporting mechanism enabling Ministers to tell the House whether the targets had been met, allowing for the caveat relating to the four-year spreading of the 2 per cent. entry charge.

As I said at the outset, we want the scheme to be launched successfully in January 2007, and we are prepared to work positively with the Government to that end. I hope that the Economic Secretary will accept that commitment in the spirit in which it is genuinely offered.

Clause 106 forms a key part of the REITs regime in defining some of the headline conditions that a company will have to meet to qualify for REIT status and the attendant tax advantages that it confers. We want to press the Government on why the concept should not be expanded to include companies listed on the alternative investment market, why they think that close companies should be barred from REIT status, and whether they would consider producing an annual report on the progress of the concept once it is up and running.

I look forward to hearing from other hon. Members and, I suspect, from right hon. Members, following the speeches on Second Reading. I particularly look forward to the Economic Secretary's reply, to which I shall listen with interest.

4.15 pm

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): We shall deal with the broader issues connected with REITs during the stand part debate and during debates on the remaining clauses in the Standing Committee, so I shall attempt to be brief.

We think that amendment No. 24 provides a welcome way of assessing the impact of the number of commercial companies that register with the scheme. It addresses concerns that were raised more generally on Second Reading, when it was pointed out that many existing commercial property companies appear keen to convert to REIT status. The fact that there are large numbers of those companies indicates that the incentives for businesses to convert may be greater than the initial revenue figures in the Red Book suggest.

The Red Book figures show that the introduction of REITs will bring in revenues of £35 million, £155 million and £135 million, respectively, in the three years from 2006–07. Those revenues include the 2 per cent. entry charge that will be imposed on companies opting for REIT status, so the early years will flatter the fiscal position. The amendment would help to monitor the number of companies entering the scheme each year, but will the Minister provide a longer-term projection of predicted revenue?

Ultimately, companies will choose to become REITs if they forecast that their entry charges eventually will be outweighed by future tax payments. What work have the Government undertaken to assess the net impact of the introduction of REITs, in terms of entry charges and changes to tax revenues? The amendment would help us understand a little more about how the scheme affects behaviour, but we need a clearer understanding of the wider fiscal impact.

[Julia Goldsworthy]

I turn now to amendment No. 4. We do not want REITs to be extended to the alternative investment market at this stage, because we understand that their whole point is to provide a low-risk, stock market avenue for investment in property. The AIM carries a higher risk and is less regulated, and therefore undermines that principle. The fact that it lists a rather oddball property investment company based in Bulgaria underlines the need for caution, and points to the higher unknown risk that AIM investments could present. Last year's fiasco with self-invested personal pensions shows that it is important to get first principles right before consideration is given to extending the scope of the REIT scheme.

In the future, it may be appropriate to consider ways to make the scheme more flexible. The alternative investment market might achieve that, but it is important now to make sure that the REIT scheme is achieving what was intended and that it is functioning properly.

Mr. Francois: The SIPPs problem was the fault of the Government, not of AIM or the stock exchange. The hon. Lady had a bit of a pop at AIM, which most people think has been quite a success. Do the Liberal Democrats consider investment in AIM-listed companies to be unsafe in principle?

Julia Goldsworthy: Absolutely not. My point is that such companies are a higher-risk investment, whereas the REIT scheme offers people a lower-risk opportunity to invest in property. That is why it is not appropriate to include AIM-listed companies in these provisions.

Amendment No. 23 deals with the definition of a close company, and would remove clause 106(6), which prohibits a close company from becoming a UK REIT. A close company is defined in section 414 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1998; broadly speaking, it is one that is controlled by five or fewer shareholders, as we have heard, but the definition in clause 106(6) is wider than was the case in the draft legislation, which contained a 10 per cent. shareholding restriction.

It is important that some form of restriction is retained, to ensure that no individual is able to invest in property for his or her personal benefit. That is why the close company restrictions have been included, but the reasonable concern has been raised that the Bill will require companies to monitor their shareholders continuously to ensure that the condition is not breached. Clearly, however, the actions of the shareholders are outside the REIT's control, and I would appreciate the Minister telling the House how a trust is supposed to anticipate or prevent such breaches.

We believe that deleting clause 106(6) altogether, as proposed in amendment No. 23, is too drastic and could make the scheme vulnerable to the abuse that is tax avoidance. However, if the clause is to be retained in its existing form, the Government will need to explain, perhaps in Standing Committee, how they expect REITs to monitor and enforce the regulations. They should also specify the penalties if the conditions are breached, because automatic exclusion of a trust could increase the risk associated with investment and serve to put investors off.

This matter would benefit from consideration in Standing Committee, where we could study the details more closely, in conjunction with the other clauses relating to REITs. We share some of the concerns behind the amendment, and look forward to the Minister's response.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): I begin by commending my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) on his thoughtful and well-informed speech. I refer, as I did on Second Reading, to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

I hope that the Minister will be able to respond to one matter raised by my hon. Friend; the elephantine gestation period for real estate investment trusts. We spent most of yesterday discussing some ill-considered proposals in the Finance Bill that were rushed through with the minimum of consultation, whereas today we are debating a relatively non-controversial proposal that has all-party support and has been around for about 10 or 12 years.

It would be helpful if on clause stand part, in response to the debate, or in Standing Committee the Minister responded to some of the matters that were raised on Second Reading but which, understandably, he did not have time to address. Will he say why we have had to wait so long for a proposal that is not particularly controversial, which replicates the investment trust regime and REITS, and which, as my hon. Friend said, exists elsewhere?

I shall make two points; the first is on dead-weight costs, which were mentioned in the Financial Secretary's winding-up speech in the previous debate. I do so in the context of amendment No. 24, which asks for an annual report. Do the Government believe that REITs will simply be a new vehicle for existing activity or a vehicle that encourages additional activity that would not otherwise take place?

My impression from reading the consultation papers and some of the debates on the subject is that most of the interest in REITs comes from existing, well-established companies that envisage reversing into REITs and carrying on doing roughly what they were going to do before. The original concept of REITs was somewhat different, however; it would be a new vehicle that promoted additional investment that would not otherwise take place.

I was interested to read what my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) said about the AIM market. My hon. Friend said that new supply and additional investment are more likely to come from smaller companies that want to grow than from well-established companies that may simply be holding companies for existing assets rather than developers. The argument about AIM is finely balanced but which side one comes down on depends to some extent on what one sees as the objective of that vehicle.

It would be helpful if the Minister explained either in the annual report that I hope we are about to impose on him or, more economically, in his response to the debate, to what extent the proposal is a new badge on something that is already happening or an opportunity for fresh investment that would otherwise not have taken place.

My second point is on the balance between commercial and residential investment. I touched on the matter on Second Reading and I hope that it will be raised in our debate on the proposed report in amendment No. 24. As I said on Second Reading, the original thought behind REITs was to promote residential investment, where there is more pressure on the demand side; one cannot directly invest in residential property, whereas there are several vehicles for investing in commercial property.

Although the original thrust of the debate about REITs was on the residential side, at some point it was diverted into a preoccupation with the commercial property side. I have nothing against that. I am in favour of the proposal, but the Barker report, in which the Treasury had an enormous interest, was very interested in promoting additional supply on the residential side. So far, we have not heard from the Government on the extent to which they hope that REITs will feature by generating fresh, respectable, long-term institutional investment in residential property for rent as opposed to being a vehicle for commercial properties.

In conclusion, I hope that we can tempt the Minister into philosophical mode and into raising his sights beyond the nitty-gritty of the amendments and that he will put the clauses into the context of where the Government are heading, what they hope to achieve, and the balance between residential and commercial property.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): There is a great deal of consensus on this issue. All parties want REITs to come in and they want the idea to succeed.

The Government have set out in their regulatory impact assessment some of the reasons for REITs and it specifically focused on the weaknesses within the property market and the areas where they could be improvement. In particular, it highlights the lack of choice for small investors, poor liquidity, the potential for more efficient use of commercial property, variable standards of provision in the private rented sector, high levels of debt financing and tax distortions. The Government's intention is to address those problems through the use of REITs. Paragraph 2.8 of the RIA states:

> "The Government believes that the proposed vehicle addresses all of the above points by introducing more choice for small investors, allowing more liquidity in the market, giving potential for more efficiently and professionally managed property, reducing dependency on debt for financing and removing tax distortions."

I do not think that anyone would particularly disagree with that.

We can also add the other factors that are favourable for REITs. There is a growing appetite for such products and their introduction should be good for the City of London and make it the leading REIT centre in Europe. We would all welcome that.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) pointed out, however, it has taken a great deal of time for us to get where we are. The idea of REITs has been around for a long time. In recent history, the industry made a great push to introduce them in 2000. That was unsuccessful, but the move was revived in 2003. Since then, there have been various discussion papers, culminating in this year's Budget with a view to the first REITs being available in January 2007. I used to work as a lawyer in a City firm and I know from personal experience that there was a great deal of expectation a couple of years ago that REITs were about to take off. Everyone was gearing up to prepare for that. However, the move slowed down and nothing very much happened.

There are one or two concerns about the delay. In that period, a lot of money has gone offshore. In particular, a number of Jersey property funds have been created that catered for something that perhaps could have been catered for by REITs. That is a concern for the City and a worry for us all. We are, to some extent, playing catch-up. In the past couple of years, Jersey has been able to develop as a market in this sector and it has gained reputational benefits perhaps at the expense of ourselves, because we are slightly behind the game.

It is important that we get the legislation absolutely right, because there is also the concern that the delay may in some way indicate the Government's half-heartedness. I hope that, by scrutinising the Government's position in this debate and upstairs, they will be able to make it absolutely clear that they are committed to REITs and see them as a long-term prospect.

Yesterday, we discussed issues such as the home computing initiative, in which something comes in with a tax incentive that is then taken away. That leads to a degree of uncertainty that is bad for investors and the industry. When there is uncertainty and changes, we do not attract the same level of investment. It is important for businesses to look long term and Governments—particularly this Government—move in a short-term fashion. I hope that we will in the debate obtain reassurance from the Government on their attitude to REITs.

It has to be said that there are positive aspects to the proposals. There is no doubt that the 2 per cent. conversion charge is what the British Property Federation was looking for. There is no criticism of the Government for introducing that. It is encouraging, and I hope that the Economic Secretary will continue in that vein later in the debate. It is important that we get this right and that we have close scrutiny of the proposals to ensure that there is a long-term commitment and that we do not have to change things in a couple of years. That would lead to the stability that would enable the REIT market to develop.

Turning to the amendments, I will address the issue of the alternative investment market. With a number of colleagues, I had a meeting with representatives of the London stock exchange just a week or so ago. The message is that AIM is a great success story. It has really taken off. The number of companies listed on AIM has expanded very rapidly in recent years and it has been a very useful attribute to the London stock exchange. We have, in the City institutions, something that we can be proud of and that is hugely important to the economy of this country. I hope that no hon. Member will suggest, in the course of the debate, that AIM is in some way dodgy or disreputable, or in any way something that we should be slightly embarrassed about. There may well be good arguments as to why REITs should not be listed on AIM, although, on the face of it, many REITs will be quite small entities and one would think that perhaps it might be appropriate to list them on AIM. I would be grateful to hear the views of the Economic Secretary on that point.

4.30 pm

John Thurso: I should declare my entry in the Register of Members' Interests. I own 2 per cent. of an AIM-listed company; it has not done very well. Surely the point is that although AIM is an excellent market that has fulfilled its remit extremely well and is therefore to be congratulated and supported, there are a number of important fund managers—particularly in the case of pension funds—who, for reasons of policy, decide not to invest on AIM and to confine their investment to the main market.

The point of REITs is, among other things, to give those fund managers an opportunity to invest in an investment vehicle for property without the risk of being in a property company with developments, or being directly involved in property. Therefore, is it not perfectly appropriate to commence the scheme on the main market first, see how it goes and then extend it at a later stage to AIM, if thought fit?

Mr. Gauke: The hon. Gentleman may have a fair point, but perhaps the decision as to whether it is in the interests of a particular company to list on AIM—he may well be right that in many cases it will not be because certain investment managers will not invest in AIM-listed companies—should be left to the company itself, rather than necessarily including that matter in the rules. However, as I said, I would be interested to hear the views of the Economic Secretary.

If we are considering REITs as a whole, one question that needs to be looked at in the longer term is whether we go further than listing on AIM and allow room for unlisted REITs. I know that the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors is looking at that as perhaps the next step. Again, I would be interested to know what the long-term views are.

Mr. Newmark: It may be instructive to look at the United States, which has a far more mature real estate investment trust market, where unlisted REITs outnumber listed REITs by a proportion of four to one.

Mr. Gauke: That is an invaluable point and I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for his knowledge and insight into all things financial and all things American.

On close companies, which my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) addressed so thoroughly, one can look at that issue in conjunction with the 10 per cent. ownership rule, which, to use his terminology, falls within the yellow card regime as opposed to the red card regime that applies to close companies. One of his points was that REITs are not a unique product in the sense that there are many international comparisons. We have just heard a comparison with the United States from my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark). It might be worth while to examine some of those international comparisons, because there are different regimes in different countries.

On the internet this morning, I spotted a document produced by Ernst and Young, which is a summary of the tax treatment of REITs internationally. I will quote from it, but I should issue a word of warning; this is by no means a criticism of Ernst and Young. In my previous career as a lawyer, I was involved in collating international advice from various jurisdictions and then trying to summarise it in one document.

That task is notoriously difficult to perform. We are dealing with a complex area, and it is often difficult to simplify information and obtain advice from jurisdictions in which there may be language difficulties and considerable differences that are not always appreciated when one person is collating information. However, it is interesting to note the different requirements on ownership, which relate directly to the question of close companies.

In Australia, there are no minimum or maximum shareholder requirements. However, other international regimes impose more limitation or control on the ownership structure of a REIT, or equivalent vehicle, than that proposed for the UK. For example, the document says that, under the Canadian system, real estate investment trusts

"must be qualified for distribution to the public and must have at least 150 unitholders", which is a considerably larger number. A rather different situation applies in Brazil. The document states:

"Construction companies may not hold a greater than 25 per cent. participation", but there otherwise does not appear to be any great qualification. If hon. Members are interested in Costa Rica, the document says that "25 or more investors" are required, as I am sure that the Economic Secretary is well aware.

In Israel, the document says:

"At least 50 per cent. of the company's voting rights should be held by more than five shareholders".

My hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh said that Japan already has a relatively mature REIT market. The document says that, in Japan, the "three largest investors must own less than 50 per cent. of the units" and that the

"10 largest investors must own less than 75 per cent. of the units in order to be listed on the Exchange".

In Korea, the document says:

"No single shareholder (including its related parties) is permitted to own more than 30 per cent. of shares".

The situation in the Netherlands is especially complex. The document says that for listed REITs, a

"Shareholder that is a Netherlands corporation must own less than 25 per cent. (directly or through related entities)".

It continues to say that a

"Shareholder that is an individual must own less than 25 per cent.".

With regard to unlisted REITs, it says:

"Shareholders that are taxable corporations (either Dutch resident or foreign) must own together less than 25 per cent.",

that a

"Shareholder that is a Netherlands corporation must own less than 25 per cent. (directly or through related entities)" and that a

"Shareholder that is an individual must own less than 5 per cent."

Different rules thus apply in various jurisdictions and the area is complex. There is evidence from overseas that one could pray in aid of the amendment on close companies but, equally, evidence of more restrictive overseas requirements on the ownership of a real estate investment vehicle.

It is important that we get some indication of where the Government intend to go with this. On ownership, I believe that the purpose of the 10 per cent. rule is to prevent double tax treaties being used to facilitate overseas investors acquiring more than 10 per cent. and thus enabling them to benefit from double tax treaty provisions that would reduce their tax liability. I would be interested to know whether the Government are considering expanding the proposal, especially for specific vehicles, such as pension funds, which I understand, as a matter of practice, do not to tend to pay tax on properties in the UK in any event. Are negotiations taking place with other countries on double tax treaties to try to expand the area so that REITs fall outside it, which might enable the 10 per cent. provision to be raised a higher level, such as 40 per cent.?

The Government have at last progressed this matter, and we all recognise that that is a good thing. The signs are that the Government have listened to industry, particularly on the conversion charge not causing difficulties. Effectively, they have given the industry what it wanted. During this afternoon and in future we require a firm commitment from the Government that they will not abandon REITs if they find in two years' time that REITs are costing a bit of money. We do not want REITs to be struck out like a home computer initiative of its day. The industry requires a long-term commitment. I hope that the Government will be able to demonstrate that they have that commitment during the debate.

Mr. Newmark: Real estate investment trusts, when they were originally conceived as property investment funds, were intended to stimulate investment in the residential market, as my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) said earlier. There has been some debate over whether that objective is still feasible or whether the Government think that it is still desirable. However, whatever the main focus of REITs is to be, it is clear that if they are to be successful in this country, as they have been abroad, they must be just as flexible as those elsewhere. I believe that that is a point that my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) has been making in tremendous detail. I congratulate him on his sense of detail in addressing the issue.

The need for flexibility is taken up in amendment No. 4, which my following remarks will solely address. The decision to impose a requirement that REITs should be listed on the stock exchange has been a controversial one. The issue was discussed at length during the consultation process. The Treasury discussion paper, which was published in 2005, acknowledged that respondents had expressed widely differing opinions. Nevertheless, the Government concluded that a transparent REIT market was best founded upon a listing requirement.

It was accepted, however, that some advantages lay in allowing unlisted companies. All these benefits relate to the original justification for introducing REITs. They include the need to increase flexibility in market access by smaller or more specialised funds, especially those in the residential sector. A comparison with the US is indicative of the problems that may be caused by imposing a listing requirement.

There are about 190 REITs registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission in the United States that trade on one of the major stock exchanges. In addition, about 20 REITs are registered with the SEC but are not publicly traded. This is in contrast to about 800 REITs that are not registered with the SEC and are not traded on any stock exchange whatsoever. Listed REITs are therefore outnumbered 4:1 in the United States, which is a more mature and experienced market. I hope that the Government take that fact into account.

Statistics help to explain why commentators remain critical of the Government's decision to impose a listing requirement on UK REITs. The Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors said:

"A successful REIT market should have both listed and unlisted vehicles in order both to allow maximum choice to investors of differing experience and size, and also to provide a pooling facility for smaller REITs to develop outside a listed market until such time as they are ready and able to go public—this should be particularly helpful for smaller players in the market."

The royal institution has simply identified the need for REITs to be able to operate in a transitional framework that helps to nurture small funds until they are ready for the increased compliance costs of a full listing. That is exactly what my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) has proposed with amendment No. 4—the use of the alternative investment market as a transitional framework. The amendment is a pragmatic compromise between the benefits of increased transparency, which are brought about by imposing a listing requirement, and the benefit of lower compliance costs that come with a less regulated market. The alternative investment market was established, as we have heard, to satisfy exactly that need for compromise in the equities market. The same need exists in the real estate market. Even if we accept the listing requirement for the moment, the Government's rationale for excluding AIM is unclear.

4.45 pm

In only 10 years, AIM has become firmly established as the world's leading market for smaller growing companies. More than 2,000 companies have benefited from public listing, which otherwise would have been out of their reach. AIM has succeeded because it relies on a "simplified" and "flexible" regulatory approach. Those are both watchwords for the Government's intention for the new REITs structure, yet REITs will not be able to benefit from AIM.

AIM is not unregulated, nor does it lack the transparency that the Government seek—for once—to encourage, but it does not stipulate minimum criteria for company size, track record or the number of shares required to be in public hands. By way of contrast, a company that wishes to list on the main market has to go through the long, time-consuming and expensive process of producing a prospectus, which is now regulated by the UK Listing Authority. Companies in that position must have £700,000 in equity capital and a minimum trading record of three years. However, AIM requires that all companies that wish to list and to remain list-trading have a nominated adviser—known as a NOMAD—to see them safely through the regulatory wilderness. The pragmatic approach allows AIM to minimise compliance costs while maximising investor protection.

The Government's omitting AIM from this Bill is curious, to say the least. In 2003, the then Chief Secretary to the Treasury gave a series of written answers on AIM's regulatory status. In one of them, she said:

"The London Stock Exchange (LSE) is a Recognised Investment Exchange (RIE) under the Financial Services and Markets Act (FSMA) and has to operate all its markets, including the Alternative Investment Market (AIM), in compliance with the recognition requirements for RIEs .... AIM is also a 'regulated market' under the EU's Investment Services Directive".

The Government seemed at the time to be satisfied with AIM from a regulatory standpoint. Indeed, the Chief Secretary was confident enough to conclude the following in her written answer:

"Because AIM is not going to become an unregulated market, the Treasury has not done any research about the impact of such a scenario on investors and issuers".—[Official Report, 4 November 2003; Vol. 412, c. 624–25W.]

I want to return briefly to a point that my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire made so forcefully on Second Reading. He said:

"We must always bear in mind the consequences to our tax system when we evaluate our relationship with the EU."—[Official Report, 24 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 446.]

He also said that being complimented by the Paymaster General might be hazardous to his career. I hope that complimenting the Government on a notable success will not be hazardous to mine. The success to which I refer was the defence of AIM during negotiations on the prospectus directive. Perhaps that success will prove that taking a harder line during negotiations in Europe does indeed pay dividends.

If the concession had not been won, AIM's ability to operate would have been undermined by increased compliance costs for firms wishing to list. Baroness Cohen of Pimlico paid tribute in another place to the Government's efforts. She said that AIM has "been actively nurtured, given a favourable tax regime and defended from rather heavy-handed regulatory proposals, which were introduced by the European Commission in the early stages of the financial services action plan."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 16 March 2006; Vol. 679, c. 1422.]

But despite this success, the fact remains that there are currently twice as many real estate companies listed on AIM that are trading in overseas property markets as those involved in the UK domestic market.

The Bill as it stands will disadvantage the domestic real estate sector by excluding those companies and others with similar credentials from converting to REITs. My hon. Friend's amendment will ensure that the REIT structure can harness a market that is tailored to smaller and younger companies and has a streamlined regulatory regime. Instead of a REIT structure that is inclusive, flexible and entrepreneurial, we are in danger of developing one that is exclusive, inflexible and commercial. Instead of greater autonomy for small firms, we are set to create yet another oligopoly of institutional investors.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): Having spent the past nine hours supporting my right hon. Friends the Paymaster General and the Financial Secretary, it is a great relief to have the opportunity to speak in the debate. I hope that the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) will sit opposite me in Committee during the next few weeks. After the local election results, it might well be the Leader of the Opposition who will be carrying out a fundamental reshuffle of the Opposition Front-Bench team.

I shall respond to the issues and challenges set out by Opposition Members in the debate. The amendments and the contributions have been constructive. There is a significant consensus about the importance of getting on with a UK real estate investment trust. I shall do my best to address in detail some of the questions that have been raised.

The hon. Member for Rayleigh asked when the regulations would be ready. I can assure him that it is our intention to have draft regulations ready by the time the clauses are debated in Committee. I will do my best to ensure that that happens.

Mr. Francois: I thank the Minister for giving way so early in his remarks, and I notice his bullish opening. I appreciate the commitment that the regulations will be available before we reach the relevant clauses in Committee, but that could mean, theoretically, that they are published the night before. We would like to see them earlier, so that we have time to digest and, ideally, consult on them with interested parties before we start debating the clauses. I am sure that he will understand the reasons for that. It is a reasonable request. I wonder whether he can do a little better, under the circumstances.

Mr. Lewis: My undertaking could, theoretically, mean the night before, but I will do my best to ensure that the hon. Gentleman and other members of the Committee have sight of the regulations much earlier than that.

The hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) asked me for a longer-term projection on receipts. That is not standard practice. In the present circumstances, three years is a reasonable period, but as the market develops during those three years, I am sure we will be able to consider a longer period.

As he did on Second Reading, the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) raised a couple of important issues, with which I shall try to deal. He was keen to know our assessment of how much of the emerging market would entail the conversion of existing companies, and how much of it would involve new investment—newcomers to the marketplace. At this stage, the introduction of a UK REIT is intended to improve the situation for existing companies, but as a consequence of doing that we expect new companies to emerge in the marketplace. We believe that there will be a dual effect. The measure will initially assist companies already in the marketplace, and it will encourage newcomers to the market.

The right hon. Gentleman also asked about the change of emphasis to commercial property. He will remember the housing investment trusts that were introduced in 1996 by the previous Conservative Government, which were specifically focused on low cost residential property. Sadly, no housing investment trusts were created as a consequence of that legislation, but UK REITs have always involved both commercial and residential property. Of course, the commercial property market is an important part of the economy, so it is vital that that market is working efficiently. I would not necessarily accept that there is undue emphasis on commercial property, but it is a very important part of this new development.

I shall come to the other points made by the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire in a few moments.

The hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) took us on a tour of the international community, of which I am sure we were all appreciative, in looking at the models that exist in different countries. I should like to make two points. It is important that hon. Members adopt a model that we believe is appropriate to the current UK market. However—this also responds to a point made by the hon. Member for Rayleigh—it is also important that we keep that market under review, as it develops.

We are willing to consider any consequence of market developments and what we are learning about what happens in the international community. We must always be willing to consider whether we want to change the regime in the interests of the market and clearly not to the disadvantage of the Exchequer. Of course, we can give a commitment today, in the context of the concerns that have been made or suggestions to do things slightly differently, that we will keep the situation under review. If necessary in the future, we would be willing to consider in a flexible way whether changes need to be made.

The right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire was keen that I try in my response to look beyond simply the amendments and put the UK REIT regime into a bigger picture or wider context. If you will permit me, Sir Michael, I intend to do that, as I develop my arguments. Of course, I will then deal specifically with the amendments and explain why we do not feel able to accept them at this stage, although we will reflect on the reasons why they have been proposed, quite responsibly, by the Her Majesty's Opposition.

I should like to remind the Committee of the rationale for UK regime, of which clause 106 is, of course, an important element. REITs exist in a number of other countries with well-developed property investment markets and provide a specific tax regime for investing in property. We believe that the time has clearly come for the UK property market to have access to such reforms. Investment in property can be undertaken both directly and indirectly, such as through a company or unit trust, but the way in which property companies are currently taxed has led to inefficiencies in the way that markets operate.

Property companies are taxed at corporate level on their rental income in the same way as all other companies. However, as a consequence, for many types of investor—for example, pension funds, and I will deal with the comment about pension funds—the overall tax effect of investing indirectly through a property company is higher than if they had bought the property directly. That tax distortion has led to significant inefficiencies in the market, as tax has often been a primary driver of investment decisions, and the Government are seeking to remove that distortion with the introduction of this legislation.

I want to talk a little about the market inefficiencies that we believe require addressing. First, there are high barriers to entry to investment in the property market, particularly in commercial property, where few retail investors have access to that asset class, given the scale and cost of the underlying property assets. The introduction of UK REITs will therefore help to improve access for all investors by allowing smaller, more liquid investments.

Secondly, as I mentioned earlier, there are a number of ways for investors to access returns from property: direct ownership, onshore and offshore unit trusts, limited partnerships and companies. Given the differing tax regimes that apply to those vehicles, investing in property through a listed UK company is relatively unattractive. As a result, the commercial property investment market is now characterised by poor levels of liquidity, with pricing and investment decisions largely determined by individual transactions among a relatively small number of players. REITs will offer the opportunity for a more liquid market, with improved transparency and scrutiny, by removing the tax disadvantage that listed property companies currently face.

Thirdly, UK property companies have tended to have a market value lower than the value of their net property assets, a feature caused in part by the tax system. That has led to a strong reliance on debt financing as equity investors are less attracted to listed property companies. The UK REIT regime will reduce the impact of tax as a significant factor in the choice between debt and equity in raising capital.

Fourthly, a high proportion of commercial property in the UK is owner-occupied, and there is some evidence that this property tends to be used less intensively than property in the investment market. The introduction of UK REITs offers the opportunity for greater economies of scale, as a new tax-efficient vehicle will be available through which property can be released into the investment market.

Finally, as highlighted by the Barker review of UK housing supply, UK REITs offer the opportunity to provide greater institutional and professional investor involvement in the private rented sector as an alternative to the direct buy-to-let market. That will help to address the variable standards of management and quality of housing stock, particularly at the bottom end of the private rented sector, as well as providing developers with a more efficient and liquid investment market into which newly developed private rented accommodation can be sold.

Furthermore, while we are on the subject of housing, the introduction of the UK REIT regime supersedes the housing investment trust or HITs regime, introduced in the Finance Act 1996. It has been confirmed through consultation with industry that the provisions of the HITs regime were never utilised. The Government therefore propose to repeal the relevant parts of the Taxes Act.

[Mr. Lewis]

In summary, the proposed UK REIT regime will help to address the various problems that I have just described, and we believe will lead to a more efficient property investment market in the UK. At the same time, the Government have always stated that one of our objectives is to retain fairness for all taxpayers by ensuring that UK REITs are introduced at no overall cost to the Exchequer. For that reason, companies joining the UK REIT regime will be required to pay an entry charge, details of which are set out in clause 112.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) (Con): Are there any proposed restrictions on the degree to which these REITs can be leveraged? I am not suggesting that there should be, but it should be clear whether leverage will be possible.

Mr. Lewis: I will come to that in a moment. There are some restrictions. If the hon. Gentleman had been here a little longer he would have realised that a significant part of the debate that we have had has been about those restrictions on leverage.

To give some background, the Government began consulting on the possibility of introducing a UK REIT regime in 2004. Draft legislation was released in December 2005, and since then the Government have consulted extensively on the proposed regime with representatives of the property and investment industries. Of course there is always a fine balance between wanting to get such a measure on the statute book and get on with it, and ensuring that we get the regime right. If we spend time consulting properly and as a consequence design a more satisfactory regime, it is far more likely that it will be viable in the long term. Had we rushed the process, we might have ended up with an inappropriate regime, which would have undermined the whole concept of a UK REIT. Therefore, I defend the time that the process has taken. The consultation that has taken place during the past few months has been incredibly productive and constructive, and I suspect that that is why we have a significant degree of consensus, not only in the House but in the market, on the model that the Government propose to take forward.

The proposed regime will be available to companies if they meet certain conditions. A company must be resident in the UK, its shares must be listed on a recognised stock exchange and it must not be close. Those requirements are set out in clause 106. These companies will be exempt from corporation tax on property rental income, provided that they distribute 90 per cent. of such profits to investors, who will then be taxed at their marginal rates. That will achieve the fundamental aim of the regime—to mirror the tax treatment of direct property investment. To provide flexibility for companies to operate, the regime will be available to groups of companies, subject to certain conditions, including that the principal company in the group is UK resident, listed and distributes 90 per cent. of its property rental profits as just described.

To ensure that UK REITs remain focused on their core property investment activity, at least 75 per cent. of the company's business, by both assets and profits, must consist of property rental business. The remaining 25 per cent. may be in any kind of activity, but will be subject to corporation tax in the usual way.

To avoid tax leakage, the regime sets limits on borrowing and the proportion of the company owned by any one shareholder. The nature and enforcement of these limits have been the subject of detailed discussions with the industry and others, which has produced a set of rules that can be enforced flexibly, with remedies proportionate to the level and nature of the breach. In practice, breaches of most of the conditions of the regime will simply result in a tax charge to compensate for lost revenue, with expulsion from the regime being reserved for certain key conditions or cases where clear abusive activity has taken place.

Companies will be able to participate in the regime from 1 January 2007, subject to meeting all the necessary conditions and paying an entry charge equal to 2 per cent. of the value of their property assets.

I should like to deal now, Sir Michael, with the Opposition amendments proposed by the hon. Member for Rayleigh—[Interruption.] I am sorry, Mrs. Heal, I nearly said something that I might regret. I shall deal first with amendment No. 4 and I shall attempt to respond to the issues raised mainly by the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark). As to his concerns about the future of hon. Members' careers after praising the Government, that is a matter for others and not for me to speculate on.

Amendment No. 4 deals with the condition requiring listing on a recognised stock exchange. As has been said, that condition excludes shares traded on an alternative investment market and the amendment proposes that the Government extend the UK REIT regime to companies traded on AIM. I would like to respond to the points raised by hon. Members and explain why we believe, at this stage, that the amendment presents too many difficulties.

First, it is obviously a new regime and in the Government's opinion, the first companies in that regime should be listed only on exchanges that are regulated, which gives some assurances to investors, particularly small investors, that their investments come with full—and full is the important word—regulatory protection. Only regulated markets are admitted to the list of recognised stock exchanges maintained by Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs.

Secondly, the term "recognised stock exchange" is a fundamental concept used in our tax legislation. For example, only those shares listed on an RSE can qualify for inclusion in an ISA and the RSE definition is also important in areas such as stamp duty, venture capital trusts and the enterprise investment scheme.

Thirdly, and crucially—to deal with a point that hon. Members did not raise—it would not be possible to allow companies with shares listed on AIM to be eligible for the regime without also extending the same position to companies listed on similar markets in the European Union. The behavioural effects of such an extension are difficult to quantify in terms of the long-term cost to the Exchequer. Again, the risk for small investors would be greater than if the regime were restricted to companies listed on an RSE.

To conclude my response to amendment No. 4, an extension of the regime to include companies traded on AIM would not meet the Government's objectives at this stage. On that basis, having explained the Government's position, I hope that the hon. Member for Rayleigh will consider withdrawing the amendment.

Amendment No. 23 also deals with a condition of the regime. Its effect would be to allow a UK REIT to be a close company. Being close is often used as a tax test to identify a company that is controlled by five or fewer people. Removing the restriction would allow companies controlled by a smaller number of investors to become a UK REIT. Hon. Members have made a case for us to consider doing so. As I have said, to achieve our policy aims for the regime, we would want the UK REIT to be capable of wide ownership by investors. That is not only to achieve a political objective, but for the sound reason of preventing tax avoidance. The closed company test is used throughout tax legislation for precisely that reason, and we believe that it has stood the test of time, which is why we have introduced it into the Bill.

The amendment would strike out that condition, the absence of which would allow any one person to control a UK REIT and divert many of the benefits of tax exemption conferred by the regime. In particular, a large group of companies could set up its own private UK REIT and obtain entirely unintended tax benefits in relation to the group's property holdings. That would be a clear subversion of the intention of the legislation, which is that the tax benefits of the regime should be available only when that kind of owner-occupied property is released into the investment market. The listing requirement, while undertaking a useful function in encouraging wider ownership, would not be sufficient on its own to prevent that kind of abuse. Companies may argue that they do not always know when they are closed, but the test is commonly understood and should not trouble a truly widely held vehicle. Indeed, that condition attracted little adverse comment in any of the public consultations in recent months.

The hon. Member for Rayleigh expressed the concern that a company may not know when it has reached that particular stage, but we believe that a company would know in most cases. An exclusion is available in the most common circumstances, which are when difficulties may be created by the involvement of a venture capital firm. One would expect companies to go to reasonable lengths to ensure that they do not breach that requirement and to use all the tools at their disposal in order to do so. For example, a UK-listed company can issue notices inquiring into the ownership of its shares.

The hon. Member for Rayleigh has also raised the question of pension funds, which I want to address directly in order to explain why there is not a problem. The extension in section 415 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 allows 35 per cent. of shares to be held by "the public". The definition of "the public" includes a pension fund, which effectively removes that problem. I assure the hon. Gentleman that his concern is not valid, but I shall write to him with a more detailed explanation before Committee.

Amendment No. 24 seeks to require an annual report to Parliament on the number of market capitalisations of companies in the UK REIT regime. The FTSE real estate index currently includes 35 companies, which have a combined market capitalisation of approximately £28 billion. At a recent industry conference, it was stated that most of those companies will choose to enter the UK REIT regime in January next year or at some point after that, depending on their particular circumstances. In addition, the expectation was that some currently unlisted companies would choose to list in order to join the regime and that some companies would be formed from scratch for the purpose of joining.

There would be very little value in having a specific Government report on an issue which will be widely known, which will be in the public domain and on which we will have the opportunity to report, perhaps in the pre-Budget report or the Budget. However, we cannot see why the Chancellor needs to produce a specific annual report. As I have said, however, we will keep the emerging market under review, and if developments occur that require us to adjust that regime to make it more effective and efficient and to ensure that we can pursue our objectives, then we will be open to reviewing it from time and time and making the appropriate changes.

Having accepted that there is significant consensus in the House today on the UK REIT regime and having tried to respond in depth to the genuine concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Rayleigh, I hope that he will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Quentin Davies rose—

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sylvia Heal): Order. I believe that the Minister has completed his speech, so the hon. Gentleman cannot intervene on him.

Mr. Francois: I am sorry that my hon. Friend was slow off the mark, but I am speaking now, and I am happy to accept an intervention from him. I shall do my best as a stand-in and try to answer his questions.

Mr. Quentin Davies: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind suggestion, but I am not sure that he is in a position to help me, because I wanted to remind the Minister that he promised to deal with my question about regulations that could limit REITs' capacity for leverage. He did not manage to address that point, contrary to the undertaking that I believe he gave me.

5.15 pm

Mr. Francois: If it assists my hon. Friend, I am happy to act as an intermediary. I understand that there is a condition on a gearing ratio of 1.25:1. That is the basic answer to his question, but if the Minister has anything to add he is welcome to intervene on me.

This has been a useful start to our discussion on the concept of REITs, which are a principal component of the Bill. Most contributions to the debate were well informed, but I am afraid that I must make an exception for the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy), as she took a side-swipe at the alternative investment market. [Interruption.] Well, she was a little undermined by the intervention of her hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso), who pointed out that he had been an investor in that market, although he was honest enough to say that he had not enjoyed tremendous success. On the degree of risk in AIM, it is important to stress that in many cases it is investment managers' responsibility to decide where to invest institutional money. They are paid a great deal to make risk decisions, and they are well placed to try to decide whether it is best to invest in an AIM company. Companies are allowed to list on AIM, but people are not forced or compelled to invest in them. If companies are strong and credible, people have the option of investing in them, whether they are institutional investors or individuals. If they are not strong and credible, they will not do so. That is a perfectly reasonable response to the point made by the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross.

Julia Goldsworthy: May I point out to the hon. Gentleman that I was stressing the importance of risk? REITs are about to be set up, but the matter should be revisited once they are more firmly based. That does not constitute a side-swipe at AIM.

Mr. Francois: People who monitor our proceedings can read Hansard and judge the matter for themselves. However, I did not think that it was a pro-capitalist point from the Liberal Democrats.

Some of the questions that I asked were ably amplified by my right hon. and hon. Friends. However, I am not sure whether the Minister fully addressed the important point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), who has a background in housing. On Second Reading he stressed the question of whether REITs would benefit the residential property market. Most of the discussion about REITs has been about the way in which they affect the commercial property market, and most people approach them from that perspective. However, REITs provide an important opportunity to boost residential property in this country, not least as some people find it difficult to afford a house, and therefore want to rent. I commend my right hon. Friend for raising that issue, and give the Minister notice that we shall want to explore it in more detail in Committee.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Does my hon. Friend agree that it may not be entirely sensible to have a restriction of 1.25:1 on the maximum leverage that a REIT can undertake? There is nothing to stop a REIT from investing in a project or a building which itself carries a much greater degree of leverage. Investors will not be protected by this restriction. On the other hand, it prevents somebody from setting up a REIT with the specific objective of offering a highly leveraged play in the real estate market. Some people might like a higher-risk instrument at certain stages of the property cycle, so why should the Government officiously cut off that opportunity? Does my hon. Friend agree that this matter has not been as thoroughly thought through as it might be?

Mr. Francois: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that important point. I have not delved into the gearing ratio, because it was not one of the conditions in clause 106 on which I decided to concentrate today. My hon. Friend has put down a marker from his own perspective, and I am sure that the Minister and I will want to debate the matter in detail when we get to the appropriate clause in Committee.

Mr. Gauke: At an earlier stage the Government proposed a leverage limit of 2.5:1; now, it is 1.25:1. In February the Royal Institute of Chartered Surveyors argued that that restriction was unnecessary because the market will restrain excessive borrowing and ensure a reasonable level of taxable deductions. That tends to be the international norm. In many jurisdictions there is no leverage limit.

Mr. Francois: I thank my hon. Friend for reiterating that point. I will not respond in more detail for fear of straying beyond the bounds of order. Nevertheless, I commend my hon. Friends the Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) and for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) for their ingenuity. Suffice it to say that we shall want to explore the issue in more detail when we move upstairs.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Hertfordshire for his assiduous research on how REITs work in other jurisdictions around the world. He said—this is important in relation to AIM—that one day the United Kingdom might become the REIT capital of Europe. Were that to happen, I am sure that we would all welcome it. However, it will require a regime that is flexible and encourages investment. I want to make a couple of points about that. There are already several offshore property vehicles, which have mushroomed in the past few years while everyone was waiting for REITs, but they did not turn up. Jersey has been mentioned in that context.

One of the tests of the REITs regime will be whether it succeeds in bringing that money, or at least a fair proportion of it, back onshore. The Government need to take that on board. Sophisticated institutional investors will carry out a cost-benefit analysis of the advantages or otherwise of different jurisdictions. They will look very carefully at the UK REITs regime, and I am sure that the ability to have several REITs companies invested on a fairly broad basis will have an impact on their decisions on whether to bring their money back onshore.

Mr. Gauke: My hon. Friend makes a good point. There are two tests here. Let me take the example of Jersey. First, will Jersey continue to expand or, as one would assume, slow down? Secondly, will the sums that have already been invested in Jersey come back onshore, and do we need a specific regime to encourage that? I hope that we will have an opportunity to explore that in Committee.

Mr. Francois: My hon. Friend has put down a marker, and I look forward to his amendment. He also referred to an important aspect of tax competition, which is important in the context of AIM. There is some tax competition between REITs in different jurisdictions. For example, the Singapore Government have recently decided to levy no tax on the dividends from REITs because they are trying to compete directly with REITs in Hong Kong. The Economic Secretary must examine that when considering the sort of regime that he wants to construct, because our regime in the United Kingdom will have to compete with, for example, that in France, and shortly that in Germany. He must bear all that in mind when he keeps those matters under review.

I welcome the Economic Secretary's general pronouncement that the Government are willing to keep the regime's operation under review. The industry, and investors too, will welcome that. If I heard him correctly, he said that the Government would be "willing to look at how flexible changes could be made in the future." That does not completely commit him, but it shows that he is open-minded and we welcome the statement in principle.

I also welcome the Economic Secretary's commitment not to publish the regulations as late as the night before we reach them in Standing Committee. The earlier, the better. The Government have had several years to prepare for the regime and, by definition, for the regulations. It would therefore be nice if we could have them fairly promptly. We cannot accuse the Government of not having had time to plan. The Economic Secretary said, in a positive spirit, "As soon as possible," and I reply, in the same spirit, thank you—and the sooner, the better.

Our purpose in tabling the probing amendment on the annual report was to try to get from the Government some commitment that they would report to Parliament progress on the REITs concept. There does not have to be an annual report, but we tabled amendment No. 24 so that we could discuss the idea. The Economic Secretary responded by saying that it might be possible to include an update in the pre-Budget report—presumably, that would apply to the report for 2007. I welcome the suggestion. I do not think that he promised to do that, but it might be useful for the pre-Budget report of 2007 to include an update, so that we can ascertain how the concept is panning out. On that basis, I shall not press amendment No. 24.

I am grateful to the Economic Secretary for clarifying the technical point that I raised when considering amendment No. 23 on close companies. I am sure that the industry and the pensions industry will welcome that. I also thank him for his courtesy in offering to write to me specifically on the matter. I am sure that a clearly set out letter from him will solve the matter beyond peradventure. I look forward to receiving that correspondence so that the issue can be quietly put to rest. It would therefore be churlish of me to press amendment No. 23.

I must chide the Economic Secretary slightly in the context of amendment No. 4, because he said that AIM was not regulated. To be fair, I believe that he corrected himself. AIM is regulated, but more lightly than a full listing on the stock exchange. Most investments involve some risk. There is, arguably, a slightly higher risk in investing on AIM than in investing on the full London stock exchange, but it is not that different. It should be possible for people to decide for themselves whether they want to invest in a company on AIM or one that is listed on the London stock exchange, through examining the company's record, that of the directors, past performance and so on.

By not spreading the capability so that companies on AIM can achieve REIT status, the Economy Secretary denies potential investors such a choice. He also denies companies on AIM the choice to apply for REIT status if they wish. He could be compelling them to apply for full listing on the London stock exchange when they are not ready for it. They may feel that they have no option but to go for London stock exchange listing to get the tax advantages of REITs, and that they would be vulnerable to takeover by a REIT listed company if they did not do that.

If the Government do not give way on that issue, there is a genuine problem concerning the effect on the orderly running of the market. To those who said that we were going too far, I stress the fact that we received representations to press the argument to extend the provision to unlisted companies. We have not gone that far. We made AIM our sticking point today, and we have asked the Government to respond to that.

However, the Economic Secretary replied responsibly and gave a commitment to keep those matters under review. We shall need to see how the regime is working as it rolls out in 2007, and if it seems to need a further boost by extending the REITs concept to the AIM, I hope that the Government will be prepared to view the matter seriously and to allow the concept to be spread to a wider range of companies, precisely along the lines that my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Newmark) described. That has worked very successfully in the United States, and his point that unlisted REITs outnumber listed REITs in the US by a ratio of 4:1 was extremely pertinent.

The Minister has offered to keep the matter under review, and I thank him for what he has said this afternoon. We have had a very positive start to our discussion on REITs, and we look forward to more such discussions upstairs in Committee. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 106 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 13

RATES

5.30 pm

Julia Goldsworthy: I beg to move amendment No. 25, in clause 13, page 14, line 20 [Vol I], leave out Table A and insert—

No. 22, in clause 13, page 15, line 12 [Vol I], at end insert—

'(3A) after paragraph 1B insert—

"1BB For the purposes of paragraph 1B above, 'households with a postcode in a rural area' shall be defined in regulations; and before making such regulations the Chancellor of the Exchequer shall consult the Countryside Agency."'.

Julia Goldsworthy: The proposed changes illustrate the recognition of the fact that people in rural areas are likely to have higher transport costs and less access to public transport than people in urban areas, and should therefore receive a discount on the vehicle excise duty that they pay. The discount proposed in our amendments is 50 per cent. Of course, the changes should be accompanied by wider changes to ensure that the polluter pays, and to extend some of the changes proposed by the Chancellor, but I appreciate that it will not be possible to do that today, even though amendments on that issue have been tabled.

I shall focus on the impact that the amendments would have. People who live in sparsely populated rural areas often have poor access to public transport. The 2003 national travel survey for England showed that half the residents in rural settlements of fewer than 3,000 people lived within a 30-minute walk of a bus stop. That compares with 95 per cent. of the people living in larger urban areas.

Those rural residents are likely to spend more per week on transport than their urban counterparts. The expenditure and food survey for 2002–03 showed that households in rural areas with a population of fewer than 3,000 spent £70.60 a week on transport, compared with £45.50 for those living in urban areas. Half of their expenditure goes on operating costs, a large proportion of which is the cost of fuel. That is because they have to travel to work and they do not have the option to use public transport. Also, they often have to drive their children to school. The operating costs in rural areas are often much higher. For example, fuel in the highlands is 10 per cent. more expensive than elsewhere.

People in rural areas make a similar number of trips to those made in urban areas, but those trips are longer and more likely to be made by car. Many of those people are also likely to live in isolated and deprived areas.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): Will the hon. Lady tell the House what definition of "sparsely populated rural area" she proposes to insert into the Bill?

Julia Goldsworthy: Of course I will come to that. Our proposals deal with sparsely populated rural areas as defined by the Countryside Agency—although they apply only to England and Wales. However, I hope that we shall be able to consider those criteria in relation to Scotland or, if necessary, table an amendment that would allow such a decision to be devolved to the Scottish Parliament.

My constituency is in the county of Cornwall. Cornwall's gross domestic product is less than 70 per cent. of the European average. Many people there live in isolated areas with very little access to public transport, and are therefore reliant on their cars. Many households in rural areas are isolated and deprived, dependent on a car and more likely to own an older car. I am not simply talking about farmers who rely on their 4x4 vehicles, but about people who are totally dependent on a car to get around.

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): I want to press the hon. Lady on the point made by the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman). In the south-west region, which she and I both represent as Members of Parliament, what percentage of the population officially live in a rural area as opposed to a town or city?

Julia Goldsworthy: The definitions in the amendment mean that it would affect hundreds of thousands of people who do not live in settlements of 10,000.

If the Government are to take seriously what the Chancellor has called the "moral duty" to tackle environmental change and make the polluter pay—in the direction of which the Finance Bill and Budget made the smallest possible gesture—it must be recognised that deprived and car-dependent households in sparsely populated and rural areas will be hit hardest by further changes to vehicle excise duty if the "polluter pays" principle is applied.

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): I strongly support what my hon. Friend says on this point. In my constituency in the highlands of Scotland, the vast majority of people live in rural communities, a car is essential, few public transport alternatives exist and the price of petrol is much higher than in many other parts of the country. The amendment would enable pollution to be tackled through higher vehicle excise duty, while ensuring at the same time that those for whom a car is a necessity rather than a choice could be insulated from those costs.

Julia Goldsworthy: My hon. Friend makes his point well. Those people will be hit hardest by changes to vehicle excise duty if the Government are serious about following through their commitment to the "polluter pays" principle. However, they are also the people on whose behaviour the changes will have the smallest impact, as they have no alternatives to car use. Under the amendment, the attempt to alter behaviour through changes in vehicle excise duty can continue without crippling those people.

Mr. Goodman: As the hon. Lady apparently has a definition of people in rural and sparsely populated rural areas, can she tell the House how many people would benefit from her amendment?

Julia Goldsworthy: I certainly can. According to the rural and urban area classification 2004 and census data, we are talking about 398,249 households.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): I am fascinated. Notwithstanding the fact that the Countryside Agency covers only England, not England and Wales, Scotland has two definitions of "rural"—one is the Scottish Executive's, under which 98 per cent. of the land mass and 18.7 per cent. of the people are covered, and the other is the Randall definition relating to sparsity, under which 89 per cent. of the land mass and almost 30 per cent. of the population are covered. Is the hon. Lady really trying to achieve an opt-out for 30 per cent. of the population?

Julia Goldsworthy: I am talking about households living in sparsely populated rural areas. As I have made clear, we wanted to set out a sparsity criterion in the amendment that could be applied across the UK. The criterion to which we worked was that provided by the Countryside Agency. We would be more than happy to accept an amendment to devolve that—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I know that the hon. Lady is relatively new to the House, but it is important to address the Chair.

Julia Goldsworthy: I apologise, Mrs. Heal. If the hon. Gentleman wants to table an amendment devolving that responsibility to Scotland, I would be more than happy to accept it later.

Sir George Young: I am not unsympathetic to the hon. Lady's point, but the tax that she proposes to amend is not on households but on cars. Can she confirm that any car registered in a postcode covered by her amendment would qualify for the reduced rate?

Julia Goldsworthy: I can confirm that. Cars must be registered to households, not just for vehicle excise duty purposes but for insurance purposes—were there any abuse, the insurance would not be valid.

Rob Marris: Following the point that has just been made, the form concerned—whatever it is called now—would give the address of the car's registered keeper, not necessarily that of its owner. The owner is entitled to insure the car, so an urban owner whose distant aunt living in the middle of nowhere is the registered keeper could get around the VED regime proposed by the hon. Lady. How would she avoid that?

Julia Goldsworthy: Quite simply: by ensuring that when someone paid vehicle excise duty, that person declared that he or she was also the main driver of the car.

Amendment No. 25 would provide a 50 per cent discount for cars registered before 23 March 2006 in households with a postcode that defined them as being in a sparsely populated rural area. Amendment No. 21 would sustain that discount for all cars registered after 23 March, except those that are most polluting. I think it desirable to retain the incentive for people to seek less polluting vehicles when purchasing new vehicles. However, I favour a much greater differential, as recommended by the Energy Saving Trust.

Even for those requiring a new 4x4 for work, there are less polluting alternatives. The Land Rover Freelander 4x4 Td4 Adventurer estate produces carbon dioxide emissions of 205 g per km, and the Subaru Forester 4x4 produces emissions of 220 g per km. Amendment No. 22 suggests that sparsely populated rural areas should be defined in terms that the Countryside Agency has already explored. The Agency may be able to establish criteria that could be applied to the United Kingdom more widely. Alternatively, as I have said before, I should be happy to accept on Report an amendment devolving this definition to Scotland.

Mr. Paul Goodman: Does the 398,000 figure relate to people living in rural areas, or to people living in sparsely populated rural areas?

Julia Goldsworthy: It relates to sparsely populated rural areas as defined by the 2004 census.

Our amendments recognise that people who live in sparsely populated rural areas rely on cars, and that those people will be hardest hit by any change in vehicle excise duty because they are least able to change their behaviour. They would allow the Government to proceed even further with the "polluter pays" principle, which they failed spectacularly to do in the Budget, without having an unfair impact on those vulnerable groups.

Mr. Goodman: It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair, Mrs. Heal. It is also a pleasure—after listening to some of the Second Reading speeches and some of the speeches that have been made today—to take part in this Finance Bill debate for the first time.

I am sorry that I cannot respond directly to the Economic Secretary, who, in a bold, combative and assertive statement, said that the Conservative party might need a reshuffle after the local elections. I was going to tell him that there might just be a reshuffle in the Labour party. I note the shock on the Labour Benches at the very prospect of that being raised, but I was going to tell the Economic Secretary that whatever might happen in that event, I hoped that he and the Financial Secretary—who is here—would be present in the Standing Committee, because I look forward to the usual exchanges.

I shall return to the Government's proposals when we debate clause stand part. The key to the amendments can be found in tables A and B in clause 13. Table A sets out VED increases for vehicles registered before 23 March—the Liberal Democrats seek to amend that table—and table B sets out the increases for vehicles registered after 23 March.

The amendments tabled by the hon. Members for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) and for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Breed) should be put in context. Last Thursday, the leader of the Liberal Democrats, the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell), suddenly rushed out what he described as a challenge to my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) to form what he described as a cross-party consensus on the environment.

The timing of the challenge was a little curious, as I understand that my hon. and right hon. Friends were already holding discussions with the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne), who I see is in his place, about forming exactly that cross-party consensus. We were therefore a bit surprised to receive the challenge, whose content was also curious: the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife urged my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney to sign up to replacing the climate change levy with a carbon tax—something to which my right hon. Friend had already signed up several days earlier.

5.45 pm

Chris Huhne (Eastleigh) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman clarify whether the Conservative party's carbon tax proposals extend its application across the board, including to households?

Mr. Goodman: I look forward to doing that in Committee, but I am afraid that I would be ruled out of order today. We are debating vehicle excise duty, to which I turn now.

In respect of VED, the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife said:

"There should be a substantial increase in the top rate of Vehicle Excise Duty."

That is nice and plain, and the hon. Member for Eastleigh helpfully chipped in on Sunday, in a report in the News of the World. It is encouraging to see someone getting into that newspaper for sound and substantial policy reasons. The report stated:

"The Lib Dems want to hit gas-guzzling motorists with a whopping £2,000 car tax to help the environment."

It added:

"They've tabled an amendment to a government bill that would see the top rate of car tax rise from £215 to £2,000."

The report quoted the hon. Member for Eastleigh as saying:

"If people choose to buy the most polluting cars they must recognise the environmental cost."

On the same day that their leader made his VED announcement—and at about the same time that I assume that the hon. Member for Eastleigh was talking to the News of the World—the hon. Members for Falmouth and Camborne and for South-East Cornwall tabled amendment No. 25, which we are now considering. Why? The amendment would not impose a whopping great increase in the top rate of VED, but rather a whopping great decrease of some 50 per cent. in some areas.

Chris Huhne: The hon. Gentleman may not be overly familiar with Finance Bill procedures, but if he were, he would know that only a Minister of the Crown is entitled to have selected for debate an amendment that would raise revenue. Last year, my party tabled an amendment in respect of self-invested personal pensions—SIPPs. It could not be debated, but it was nevertheless the only Opposition amendment to be accepted completely by the Government. Before the hon. Gentleman gets too disparaging, I suggest to him that we might achieve the same success with our proposal to raise the higher rate of VED to £2,000.

Mr. Goodman: I shall have a good deal to say about that amendment in a moment, but I thought that Liberal Democrat Members were the ones unfamiliar with Finance Bill procedure. I do not see the point of tabling an amendment that cannot be voted on, nor of tabling an amendment that directly contradicts another one.

Julia Goldsworthy: My hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) referred to the SIPPs amendment that we tabled to last year's Finance Bill. It had more impact than the sum total of all the amendments tabled by the Conservatives then.

Mr. Goodman: The hon. Lady claims that an amendment that could not be voted on made a substantial contribution to last year's Bill, but—

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): On a point of order, Mrs. Heal. Can you advise us whether this metaphysical discussion of the Liberal Democrat party's strategy—or absence thereof—is advancing the debate on the amendments before the Committee?

The First Deputy Chairman: I should be much happier if hon. Members participating in the debate returned to the specifics of the amendments before the House.

Mr. Goodman: I shall return to the specifics of the amendments, (Mrs. Heal) even if I disappoint some Labour Members by doing so.

We have been told why the Liberal Democrats tabled the amendments that we can discuss fully and vote on: households in sparsely populated rural areas have special transport and social needs. People in rural areas who farm or work on the land, it is argued, often need larger vehicles that emit more carbon. That is true, and during the coming days and weeks we look forward to hearing Liberal Democrat Members, who represent urban areas and who have, like the hon. Member for Eastleigh, I am sure, been fully signed up to amendment No. 25 by the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne and her colleague, the hon. Member for South-East Cornwall, explain to their urban constituents why they should pay higher VED on the most polluting vehicles registered before 23 March 2006 while people in rural areas pay lower VED on exactly the same vehicles.

We also look forward to the hon. Member for Eastleigh explaining that when he told the News of the World that

"If people choose to buy the most polluting cars they must recognise the environmental cost", he meant to say that if people choose to buy the most polluting cars they must recognise the environmental cost "sometimes".

Chris Huhne: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman does not realise that the rural discount applies only to the bands below top band G of vehicle excise duty. That fully meets his point.

Mr. Goodman: I am aware of that, but I must not be drawn back into metaphysical speculation about an amendment that I cannot describe. Were I able to do so, I would be able to answer the point, but you would rule me out of order Mrs. Heal, so as I do not want to provoke your wrath I shall press on.

Regardless of the Liberal Democrats' internal discussions, one conclusion is certain. Before seeking to provide special treatment in the Finance Bill for households in sparsely populated rural areas, one needs to be able to provide a robust definition of such households and areas that will hold good in all circumstances—a definition that will stand up to legislative scrutiny.

That requirement brings us neatly to Liberal Democrat amendment No. 22, which was also tabled by the hon. Members for Falmouth and Camborne and for South-East Cornwall. Does the amendment offer such a robust definition? In our view it does not; it simply dumps the problem in the lap of Ministers and would compel them to define, in unamendable regulations to be tabled at a future and unspecified date, households with a postcode in rural areas. Presumably that would take place after the Bill has become law, which raises the question: what would happen to the amendments if they were accepted and the Bill was enacted and became enforceable in the meantime?

Julia Goldsworthy: A clear definition is set out by the Countryside Agency, with reference to the distance of certain areas from a population centre. It would not be complicated to apply that definition to England and Wales and to find a way to apply similar criteria to Scotland. The amendments could thus be tabled on Report.

Mr. Goodman: If so, the Liberal Democrats might have found a clearer way to spell out a full definition in their amendments. Furthermore, Members and other people with an interest in the measures may find other definitions of "sparsely populated rural area", which could be introduced in the Standing Committee. There could be some controversy—at the very least—in the hon. Lady sticking so precisely to one definition. However, that is merely an introduction to the deep problems posed by amendments Nos. 25 and 21, to which I shall turn shortly.

With reference to the consultation proposed in amendment No. 22, why is the Countryside Agency the only body named? What about other Government bodies with an interest in rural areas or the environment, such as the Environment Agency or the Air Quality Forum? What about non-governmental bodies with an interest in rural affairs, the environment and vehicle excise duty? Transport 2000, Friends of the Earth and Greenpeace have made comments on the Government's VED proposals, to which I shall refer in the clause stand part debate. If amendments Nos. 25 and 21 were successful and the Liberal Democrats obtained the changes to VED that they seek, how would those changes be implemented in the time gap between the passing of the Finance Bill—if it is passed—and the subsequent laying of regulations before Parliament?

Other questions follow. Is it right that a multimillionaire driving a polluting vehicle and living in a mansion should pay a reduced rate of VED on that vehicle if he registered it before 23 March? [HON. MEMBERS: "David Cameron."] That was not the gentleman I had in mind, but I am grateful to Labour Members for drawing the matter to my attention. I do not believe that he is a "multimillionaire". Would it be right for such a mythical and imaginary person living in a sparsely populated rural area and owning a polluting vehicle to pay a reduced rate and then move out of that area? Is it really fair that someone who does not live in a sparsely populated rural area and who owns a green vehicle does not pay a reduced rate and then moves into that area?

Chris Huhne: Under the proposals, it is clear that if such a person were to own a green vehicle, they would pay zero duty whether they lived in a sparsely populated rural area or not.

Mr. Goodman: I am glad to have that clarification from the person who is clearly leading for the Liberal Democrats in this debate. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the amendment paper, he will see that the amendment to table A, which deals with people who have registered cars before 23 March, applies to a cut in the rate for all vehicles, including the most polluting. I shall come to that point in a moment.

Amendment No. 25 seeks to reduce VED rates for the most polluting vehicles registered before 23 March this year, while amendment No. 21 seeks to leave unchanged VED rates for the most polluting vehicles registered after 23 March. There is a case for leaving unchanged the VED rates levelled on the most polluting vehicles that have already been registered by people who live in sparsely populated rural areas, but I find it very hard to see a convincing case for cutting those rates, which is what the Liberal Democrats are proposing.

There is also a case for leaving unchanged VED rates levelled on the most polluting vehicles registered after 23 March, just as there is a case for raising VED rates levelled on those vehicles, as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) sought to do—if I can turn metaphysical for about 10 seconds—in amendments that were not selected for debate. However, there is surely no case whatever for seeking simultaneously to leave unchanged VED rates on the most polluting vehicles in some rural areas while seeking to raise VED rates on those vehicles in these areas. The Committee will agree that one cannot do both at once. I do not want to be ruled out of order, so all I will say is that hon. Members only have to read the amendments tabled for the debate to see that one political party has sought to do both at once and, needless to say, it is the Liberal Democrats.

Julia Goldsworthy: Is it therefore my understanding that the hon. Gentleman and his party would make no changes to the VED tables as laid out by the Government in the Finance Bill and that he and his party think that we have a satisfactory state of affairs to take forward?

Mr. Goodman: I shall come to all that in the clause stand debate. If the hon. Lady is not happy with my answer, I will be happy to give way to her.

As I said, we cannot discuss in detail a tax rise proposed in an amendment that was not selected for debate, so I will not seek to explore further the mystery of how the Liberal Democrats propose simultaneously to raise a tax while leaving it completely unchanged. I will, however, assure the Committee that the Conservative party will do all that it can tomorrow, as people vote in the local elections, and in the months to come to raise this mystery and the incoherence of these amendments on the doorstep and at every opportunity with voters whenever the issues of green taxes or the environment are raised. I am afraid that it is the same old story. It is one thing for one group of people outside and another thing when it comes to tabling amendments to the Finance Bill. The Liberal Democrats have a choice. They can be a serious potential party of government or they can be fringe operation whose muddled, ill-thought-through and opportunistic contortions provide hours of harmless entertainment for all the rest of us.

On the basis of these amendments, they have chosen to be purveyors of entertainment. I urge the Committee to reject the amendments.

6 pm

John Thurso: I rise to support the Liberal Democrat amendments, but first I want to set out the nature of the problem that my constituents face. Any of my constituents—there are quite a few of them—who are watching this afternoon's proceedings on the parliamentary channel will have been somewhat bemused by both the tone of the remarks and the risible nature of the conduct of the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman), in particular. For them, the amount that they have to pay for motoring is a very real issue, as are the extra costs that they bear not simply through VED—as will happen under the Bill—but through the excess that they pay on fuel costs.

Let me set out the problem in an area that I confidently expect that nobody will dispute is genuinely sparse. I refer to Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross. Some parts of Sutherland have a population density that is somewhat less than that of the Sahara desert. The area is 3,400 square miles and there is no public transport whatsoever available for very large parts of it. The vast majority of people who live there are crofters and small farmers who make a living by operating the croft—as there are so many Members present who have no experience of Scotland, I will remind them what that is. It is a smallholding with two or three acres of in-by land and access to common grazing. It is not something that anybody is going to make a vast amount of money on. Those people will croft part-time and they will work part-time—perhaps going to sea; perhaps doing something else.

The likelihood is that those people—the majority of whom will be on modest or low incomes—will have only one vehicle. That one vehicle will double as the family transport and the farm workhorse. That is the vehicle that they will have to use. They need a vehicle of a certain size to be able to operate the farm and they have to use it for other things that they have to do, such as taking the kids to school. First, people in that area have no choice. There is no public transport, unlike in many of the constituencies represented here this afternoon, where public transport is available. Secondly, and most importantly, there is no congestion of any kind. Of course, all those who are interested in climate change will understand that congestion multiplies the effect of emissions fairly considerably.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): My hon. Friend also needs to make the point that public transport would probably be an environmentally inefficient way of providing transport in such a sparsely populated area. It is probably more efficient for people to use their transport when they need it, rather than to rely on the marginal running of buses that would often be empty.

John Thurso: My hon. Friend makes that point extremely well. A bus with one person in it is far more polluting that a car with one person in it. He is absolutely right.

The objective that the Government have set out to achieve with the increase in vehicle excise duty is extremely laudable. It should be the case that more polluting vehicles are punished and, broadly, we want to see a reduction in polluting vehicles and in emissions. However, much of the debate—including the discussions that we have heard today—has been characterised by references to what people are wont to call Chelsea tractors. I am not persuaded that that is the appropriate way for the debate to proceed. We are unable to go into any detail today, but I am not persuaded, as a point of principle, that taxation of ownership—in effect, that is what vehicle excise duty does—is the most appropriate way to tackle pollution and congestion. I would look to a form of national road user charging as the appropriate method to do that. In addition, I very much doubt whether any great increase in vehicle excise duty will have much impact on the owner of a Chelsea tractor. Such people tend to live in million-pound homes and have six-figure incomes, so I do not think that they will notice it very much. However, my constituents on whom the increase is to be imposed will see it as a real burden. As I have already said, such people typically have low or modest incomes.

I have raised this matter before in Westminster Hall. The price of petrol and diesel in Wick, Thurso, Durness or any of the other remote areas in my constituency tends to be between 10p and 15p more than even the dizzy metropolitan heights of the cost in Inverness. Typically, the premium averages out at about 12p a litre. One of my constituents who owns a car with an average consumption of sufficient substance to tow the sheep to market will pay something like £200 a year more for their fuel than a person with exactly the same vehicle who operates in an area with a more competitive market for fuel, such as Inverness, Edinburgh, or even London.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I always enjoy the hon. Gentleman's contributions. He has been cut loose from the Front Bench and takes opposing views to those of some of the more radical elements of his Front-Bench team. Does he agree that he should encourage his constituents to consider alternatives, such as liquefied petroleum gas, that would not only be more environmentally friendly to his beautiful constituency, but allow them to pay less vehicle excise duty?

John Thurso: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take up my offer of coming to visit me sometime in the north. As far as I am aware, only two garages in my constituency offer LPG. One is in Golspie, and I think that there is one in Thurso, too. For people in vast swathes of Sutherland, having to make a return trip of 100 miles to top up with LPG would not be hugely helpful.

Mr. Jones: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman does something that I did in my early days on Newcastle city council by encouraging his local council to make their vehicles run on LPG. That creates a local market and ensures that bunkering facilities can be provided, even in isolated communities such as his.

John Thurso: I would be delighted to give such encouragement to the Highland council, which covers three, if not four, constituencies. In parentheses, I should tell the hon. Gentleman that any of my councillors in Thurso who go to a council meeting in Inverness make a round trip of 240 miles, which perhaps—

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I ought to remind hon. Members that we are going a little wide of the amendment. Perhaps we can get back to the specifics once again.

John Thurso: I apologise for straying, Mrs. Heal.

My constituents already pay an increase to the Treasury due to the increased VAT that they pay because of the higher price of their fuel. It is thus perfectly appropriate to offer them some form of alleviation. My hon. Friends have tried to achieve that through an amendment to this imperfect Bill on vehicle excise duty. The way in which they have tried to achieve that in principle, if not in detail, gives us a good way forward.

The key point is that those who live in genuinely remote rural areas suffer a real burden. It was extraordinary that the hon. Member for Wycombe was so dismissive of that burden, although it might explain why the Conservatives regularly come fourth in elections in my constituency and much of the Highlands. His speech has probably done more for my party's prospects in elections in Scotland than anything that I could ever have done. The amendment is a sensible way forward.

Mr. Goodman: As the hon. Gentleman has such confidence in his party's amendment, can he confirm that his party will be putting it to the vote?

John Thurso: I am a humble Back-Bench Member in this army. I do not have the slightest idea what my Front-Bench colleagues intend to do. It may be that the response from the Government Front Bench will be of such wonderful acceptance and pleasure at what my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) has proposed that all will end well. Never mind, we will hope for the best and move on.

There is a technical problem with the amendment. In drafting it, my hon. Friends have referred to the Countryside Agency, and the agency has no remit in Scotland. A fly was cast over my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne as to what the definition should be. That is always a typical answer of the Treasury when a Member is proposing any scheme. The response is "Ah, tell me where the definition is and I will tell you what the problem is."

We should take on board the fact that the EU has well-defined sparse and remote rural areas and, in many countries, has successfully introduced schemes to help such areas. It recognises the problems that they have. Whatever the definition, it seems to me that if we accept the principle of helping those who need help, which is what I thought that those of us on the progressive side of politics were seeking to do, and we wish to help people on modest incomes who need help, we can find the means.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne and other Front Bench colleagues for proposing the amendment. I hope that they will press it if the Government do not accept it, and that the House will support it. I congratulate them.

Stewart Hosie: It seems that there is a move to tackle two separate issues. The first is to create a vehicle excise duty regime that will offer a genuine disincentive to unnecessary use of high CO_2 emitting vehicles, and the second is to protect car users in rural areas where there is no alternative to the car and unnecessarily high costs.

The amendment draws attention to a number of flaws. First, the main penalty faced by drivers in remote and rural areas is the regular high cost of fuel, not the one-off cost of VED. The price of fuel went through the £1 a litre barrier in many parts of Scotland some time ago. The issue would be far better resolved by a sensible and sensitive fuel-tax regulator to lower the level of duty when world oil prices rise. It is a great pity that such a regulator was opposed by the Liberal Democrats and others last year.

The issue of fuel cost is extremely important. The last available rural Scotland price survey showed that in all of rural Scotland the price of road fuel was 6.3 per cent. higher on average than in urban areas. In the rural highlands and islands area, the price was 9.7 per cent. higher. This is a genuine issue.

The second flaw is that the amendment does not recognise the difference between genuine working vehicles and other high CO_2 emitting vehicles that happen to be in rural areas, for which a disincentive for high use or unnecessary usage would be welcome. For vehicles that are not used for genuine working purposes where the owners are as close, perhaps, to a supermarket or a filling station as the owners of vehicles in some of the suburban parts of my constituency, a reduction in VED would be unnecessary.

The third flaw is the definition—definition is incredibly important—of a sparsely populated rural area. The hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) referred to the Countryside Agency's definition. Would she prepared to accept amendments to the amendment? Obviously the agency has no locus in Scotland or in Wales. That has been accepted. However, there are a number of definitions. The definition used by the Scottish Executive contains a sixfold description of rural and urban areas. That covers 98 per cent. of Scotland's land mass and 18.7 per cent. of the population. That definition would be wholly inappropriate.

There is also the Randall definition, which is based on sparsity of population. A sparsely populated rural area is defined as one with less than one person per hectare. The definition is based on local authority areas that cover Aberdeenshire, Angus, Argyll and Bute, Dumfries and Galloway, east Ayrshire, the highlands and so on.

[Stewart Hosie]

That definition would cover 89 per cent. of Scotland's land mass and take in 29 per cent. of the population. The use of such a definition would also be wholly wrong.

6.15 pm

I am on record in this Chamber—twice, and I stand by it—as saying that there is a world of difference between a Land Rover taking animal feed up a snowy field in late spring to early lambs, and a Chelsea tractor sitting outside a flat in Kensington. Of course something needs to be done to help genuine working vehicles.

Mr. Kevan Jones: I hear what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but surely vehicles working in fields are already covered by red diesel, for example.

Stewart Hosie: The Financial Secretary will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe that the Budget documentation referred to discomfort with the red diesel regime, because many on-road vehicles now fall within it. So I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman's point is particularly helpful in this regard.

In intervening on the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mark Lazarowicz) during a previous debate, I argued that there is a difference between working vehicles and Chelsea tractors. He agreed and suggested that there must be a better way of dealing with the problem. I agree entirely. We need to establish a regime that does not penalise genuine working vehicles. We should have started with an analysis of the impact of high fuel and high VED, and I hope that we can soon establish a sensible fuel tax regulator similar to the one proposed previously. I hope, too, that the Government will consider what the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) said in a previous debate about an EU derogation for the areas to which he referred. Of course, there are other ways of defining "remote" and "sparse", but those terms are not defined in the amendments before us.

We will not support the amendments because they are ill-conceived and ill-thought through. They seek to reduce vehicle excise duty for too many people, which would be unhelpful in terms of the environment.

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): Define "we".

Stewart Hosie: The hon. Gentleman will be aware, given that he has been here for most of today's debate, that this has been a very sparsely populated debate, just as many of the parts of the country that we wish to help are sparsely populated. The amendments would not provide such help.

Chris Huhne: The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie) made much of the difficulties that rural areas face in paying high fuel prices. I sympathise greatly with their situation, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) also referred. I should however point out to the hon. Member for Dundee, East that money is fungible, and that although the people to whom he referred may be experiencing a disadvantage as a result of high fuel duty, if they have a corresponding and offsetting advantage through a reduction in vehicle excise duty, they will be free to spend that money as they like. That would deal with the problem, which is precisely what the amendments before us are meant to do.

The United Kingdom has a difficulty, in that the main instrument available for changing behaviour in terms of greenhouse gas emissions and climate change is green taxes. However, green taxes, of which two thirds comprise fuel duty, have fallen from 3.6 per cent. of gross domestic product in 2000 to 3 per cent., according to the latest figures. The Budget proposals will in fact lead to a further fall in green taxes as a percentage of GDP. One reason for the reluctance to rely more on green taxes and the price mechanism in providing an incentive to change behaviour is precisely those difficult cases such as rural areas. The relevance of amendment No. 21 is that it would deal with a specific set of problems and release a wider instrument to be used against greenhouse gases.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman is speaking in favour of amendment No. 21, which, as I understand it, is not revenue-neutral. He is supporting an amendment that will cut green taxes, so he is speaking against his case.

Chris Huhne: The hon. Gentleman has participated in such debates for a number of years and is extremely well informed. He well knows that it requires a Minister of the Crown to table for debate an amendment that raises revenue. The Paymaster General seems to disagree, but that is my clear memory from last year. The amendments on self-invested pension plans were not selected for debate and the reason given was that they would raise revenue. The right hon. Lady was not prepared at that stage to table such an amendment, but I am pleased that by the pre-Budget report in October she had changed her mind, along with all the other Treasury Ministers.

Mr. Paul Goodman: So that we are all clear, may I ask the hon. Gentleman, who is making the second Front-Bench speech on behalf of his party, which is his preferred amendment for table B? Is it amendment No. 21 or amendment No. 26?

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I remind hon. Members that amendment No. 26 has not been selected.

Chris Huhne: Thank you, Mrs. Heal. I shall speak about the amendment under discussion and highlight the difficulties faced by people in sparsely populated rural areas as a result of the high cost of fuel and of motoring.

In urban areas about 30 per cent. of households have no access to cars because they can rely on public transport. In rural areas—not even sparsely populated rural areas—only 8 per cent. of households are carless. That underlines how important the car is as a means of getting to work, getting to the GP's surgery, accessing basic services, accessing accident and emergency, doing the school run, and so on

My hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) pointed out that households in rural areas spend more than £70 a week on transport, compared with £45 a week in regional built-up areas. It is the operating costs of cars, including fuel, that make up the difference.That is why any reliance on green taxes to change behaviour must take account of the high dependency of all households, including poor ones, on fuel in rural areas, and why it is important to propose measures that can alleviate the costs of transport in rural areas as part of a package to encourage us towards more sustainable personal transport. We strongly support the Chancellor's intention to raise fuel duty in line with inflation in September, as announced in the Budget. Relief for rural areas makes that policy more robust and defensible because it takes the edge off for some of the worst losers.

The discount in the proposal is designed not for anyone living on the urban edge, but for areas where distances are important. Hon. Members are right to say that the Countryside Agency has defined the more sparsely populated parts of England, which are areas of Cornwall, Devon, Cumbria, Northumberland and the Fens. The definition covers the 5 per cent. least densely populated parts of England. It is easy to extend that to Scotland and Wales by regulation, as proposed. That answers the hon. Member for Dundee, East. The definition will be exactly equivalent. I look forward to replies from Treasury Ministers when they are in a more co-operative mood to honour written answers.

Stewart Hosie: Is the hon. Gentleman speaking of the 5 per cent. population in the most sparsely populated areas? Is it the bottom 5 per cent. only, based on sparsity of population? Is that the definition?

Chris Huhne: The hon. Gentleman may have misunderstood me. The Countryside Agency's definition of a sparsely populated rural area in England is of the least densely populated 5 per cent. of areas in England. If the same criterion—the same lack of density—is applied to Scotland, I have no doubt that it would apply to a substantially greater part of Scotland than of England, as Scotland forms 40 per cent. of the landmass of the United Kingdom. As this is a taxation matter, exactly the same definition should be applied in Scotland, Wales and England.

There is a very clear and robust definition, which is perfectly capable of handling the issue. I refer those hon. Members who would care to have more detail to the excellent paper of Messrs. Bibby and Shepherd, entitled "Developing a new classification of urban and rural areas for policy purposes—a methodology", which is published on the Office for National Statistics website.

Some sparsely populated areas, unlike many rural areas, are still declining. About 600,000 people live in the sparsely populated English areas out of a combined rural population of some 9.5 million. Those areas have particular problems in achieving one definition of sustainability—somewhere that people want to live and work—and the underlying problem is remoteness. There are dramatic differences—for example, in broadband connectivity, with just 33.4 per cent. of households in villages in the sparsely populated rural areas having such access, against more than 75 per cent. in villages in the less sparsely populated rural areas. People are further from public services, such as those provided by GPs, hospitals and secondary schools. Bus transport is even less frequent. The economy is clearly less successful. Income poverty is clearly higher than in other rural areas, although it is still broadly in line with the national average. That is why it makes sense to introduce a discount that helps those areas in particular.

In cost terms, this is a modest measure, partly because there are relatively few households in those sparsely populated rural areas and partly because such a high proportion of them are recorded as a second or holiday homes and therefore would be ineligible for the discount. Indeed, in sparsely populated villages, the Countryside Agency reports that almost one in 10 household spaces is recorded as a second or holiday home; about five times the number found in similar-sized settlements elsewhere.

There is another mitigating factor on cost. There would be no discount on the new band G or the vehicles that emit most carbon. The cost of up to £50 million a year for England, using the most conservative assumptions about the size of vehicles, is small by the side of the extra revenue that the Chancellor can hope to gain with both the indexation of fuel duty and a more radical approach to the progressivity of vehicle excise duty.

Although other proposals that deal with revenue raising cannot be debated because of the rules of the House, it is worth pointing out that the £2,000 revenue raising proposal, for example, would more than adequately fund the rural discount. This is a sensible package that would enable green taxes to do their work in helping to change behaviour, without raising taxes overall. As the increases in vehicle excise duty would operate for new cars only, the impact on purchasing decisions is open and transparent. No one could claim that they had not been forewarned. Moreover, there is a benefit for those with existing cars in sparsely populated rural areas that recognises their circumstances, thus allowing greater weight on fuel duty and other green taxes than would be allowed otherwise.

I note that the Liberal Democrats are the only major party to attempt to grapple with the issue. If we consider what the Chancellor has done, as opposed to the spin that he likes to put on the Budget, the reality is that green taxes have been falling, year on year, as percentage of GDP and, indeed, as a percentage of the overall tax take. I am afraid that the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) has confirmed that the Conservatives show no interest whatsoever in using the price mechanism to change behaviour in this direction, and it is matter of regret that, in their proposed amendment to the general motion on the Finance Bill, they did not mention the environmental objectives that are such a clear and important part of such policies; at least that is something that the Chancellor recognises in words, if not in deeds. I very much hope that the House will support the amendment, as it clears the way to a substantially more radical approach to other green taxes.

6.30 pm

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): I am grateful to my colleagues for tabling this group of amendments and enabling us to have this debate, because it demonstrates that, at least on the Liberal Democrat Benches, there is a recognition that environmental taxes have a social consequence and need to be refined. They cannot be applied as a blunt instrument. The speech made by the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) on behalf of the Conservative Front Bench confirms to anyone who listened to it why the Conservative party is almost non-existent in Scotland. It has no understanding of what sparsity and remoteness are about, other than in terms of its own support.

My hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso), who represents a constituency that has all those characteristics and has a real understanding of the matter, has given a pretty coherent account of why the needs of people in such areas should be addressed by the House in the way that the amendments try to do.

In a brief intervention I simply want to make the point that car ownership in rural areas, and certainly remote and sparsely populated rural areas, is not a luxury but a necessity, and the costs imposed are a real burden. There are factors that need to be taken on board. For example, the Scottish Executive have been reviewing their definition of poverty because on a previous definition car ownership meant that one could not be poor. In reality, poor people in rural areas simply cannot function without owning a car, yet under a previous definition people owning a car were not allowed to call themselves poor. That is the sort of absurdity that one gets into when the definitions do not take into account the reality on the ground. The amendments seek to do that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) has demonstrated clearly that this is a coherent and balanced part of an overall policy, and one that the Conservative party would be well advised to take a little more seriously and not try to predetermine when, frankly, its own policy has no intellectual coherence whatever. In particular, it showed no interest in the problems of poor people living in rural areas, only a desire to have a go at the Liberal Democrats for really trying to address the issue. I just note in passing that the Scottish Nationalists sent the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Stewart Hosie) to make the argument, not one who represented a rural or sparsely populated area who might have had some greater understanding of the problems being addressed.

Stewart Hosie: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way, not least because I am the party's Treasury spokesman and this is my brief. Two thirds of the landmass of my constituency is in Angus, and one ward is fully rural. I have a perfect understanding of the issues that the hon. Gentleman is discussing.

Malcolm Bruce: We shall see, but I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's contribution demonstrated that understanding. He was implying—this was what slightly nonplussed me—that he thought it unfortunate that our amendments would have qualified a greater proportion of the population of Scotland to receive the benefit. I should have thought that a Scottish MP would welcome the fact that amendments were being tabled that had particular relevance to rural areas of Scotland and from which a greater proportion of Scottish households and individuals would benefit. My hon. Friend has confirmed that applying the English Countryside Agency's definition to Scotland would inevitably reach a greater percentage, for the simple reason that we are defining remoteness and sparsity and the problems that go with them.

I have just been dealing with a matter relating to fuel poverty in Scotland. Central heating fuel bills in Scotland can be 68 per cent. higher than in the south of England, and the same applies to transport costs for many people living in the north-east, the north of Scotland, the borders and the rural areas of Scotland. Through necessity, transport costs are much higher. Another problem is that, given that people on low incomes have to struggle to pay high excise duties and higher fuel charges, one thing that often goes by the board is regular vehicle maintenance, which has detrimental effects on the environment.

I commend the amendments, which address a real issue and show the understanding of a party that supports the case for developing green taxes, that in order to ensure that those taxes do not fall disproportionately on people in disadvantaged areas we must introduce refinements. That is what the amendments seek to do and I commend them to the House.

John Healey: The debate has been entertaining, Sir Michael, particularly for Government Members. It has also been comprehensive and, if I may so, entirely between the Opposition parties. That is also entertaining, given that these are the parties that are supposed to have reached some consensus on climate change. That comprehensive debate leaves me, in all honesty, with very little else to say.

The amendments proposed by the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) call for the introduction of regional rates of excise duty so that those with a postcode in rural areas can pay less than urban areas. I have both principled and practical objections to those proposals. UK vehicle excise duty rates are set at the current level for good reasons. First, they raise revenue to fund essential services and, secondly, they help to achieve environmental objectives, which apply equally to rural areas as to the rest of the UK.

Chris Huhne: Will the Minister give way?

John Healey: No, I will not; I am responding to the amendments proposed from the Liberal Front Bench by the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne. That is what I am responding to—despite the hon. Gentleman's own speech.

In addition to the technical and practical deficiencies of the amendments, introducing a separate rate of vehicle excise duty for rural areas would also present significant administrative difficulties as well as compliance problems. Motorists could easily register vehicles in designated sparsely populated rural areas and then use them exclusively or predominantly in urban areas. Other hon. Members have already mentioned the technical and practical difficulties, to which I am now adding administrative and compliance difficulties.

Julia Goldsworthy: I noticed that the Minister referred to the environmental objectives of vehicle excise duty. Will he provide further detail on the impact on behaviour of the structure that he has proposed? Will he also recognise the burden on people living in remote rural areas and the fact that they are reliant on cars because they do not have any realistic alternative? I hope that he will take seriously the points that Liberal Democrat Members have passionately made.

John Healey: I am disappointed in the hon. Lady. I did not accept the intervention of the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne), who gave his question to the hon. Lady to put to me. The question she poses, however, is a question for the clause stand part debate, not our debate on vehicle excise duty amendments. I do not accept that the Liberal Democrat amendments are desirable or workable. I do not accept that a principled case has been made for them. I believe that they would prove administratively complex and open to abuse. If pressed to the vote, I urge my hon. Friends to reject them.

Amendment negatived.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

John Healey: We had a wide-ranging debate on a narrow set of amendments, but I should make some remarks in the clause stand part debate. In general terms, I welcome the fact that climate change is increasingly recognised as one of the most serious global challenges that we face. In the UK, we produce just 2 per cent. of global greenhouse gas emissions, but we must build on the progress that we have made on our Kyoto obligations. We are and remain one of the few countries on track to meet our obligation. We must also build on our ambitious domestic goals to cut carbon and move to a low-carbon economy. It is right to do more and it was right for the Chancellor to have done more in his Budget announcements.

Transport is one of the key sectors in which we need to build on existing reforms. It is the second largest source of carbon dioxide emissions in the UK and a source of significant air pollution. The vehicle excise duty system has been radically restructured, and it is now based on carbon emissions. Under this Labour Government, the UK has taken the lead in introducing a structure for vehicle taxation that differentiates according to CO_2 emissions, just as we did with the climate change levy and the first economy-wide emissions trading scheme. The European Commission has recommended that graduated VED should form the blueprint for vehicle taxation across the EU. The graduated VED system is designed to provide a signal to consumers at the point of purchase to bear in mind the environmental impact of the models that they are considering.

Julia Goldsworthy rose—

Chris Huhne rose—

John Healey: I shall give way to the hon. Lady, who is leading for the Liberals in this debate and who is shadow Chief Secretary.

Julia Goldsworthy: Returning to my earlier intervention, what impact does the Financial Secretary think that the new VED band will have on consumer behaviour?

John Healey: If the hon. Lady studies the evidence on the impact of the graduated VED scheme, she will see that the VED scheme at the point of purchase has a relatively modest impact on consumer behaviour. The point is to incorporate into the system signals to the consumer at the point of purchase to consider the environmental impact and environmental performance of the models that they are considering buying. The system is also designed to provide signals to car manufacturers to encourage still greener engine design and performance.

Clause 13 builds on the environmental signals already in place by reducing VED band A to zero. It reduces the VED for cars in band B by £35 a year and for cars in band C by £5 a year. It freezes VED for cars in bands D and E, and it increases VED for vehicles in band F by £25. To further strengthen the environmental signals, the clause also introduces a new band G, which increases VED for the most polluting cars.

In the run-up to the Budget, we received representations from a number of organisations, including the RAC Foundation, which advanced the argument that now is the right time to widen the differentials between the least and the most polluting bands. Clause 13 does just that and it means that the differential between the lowest VED rate for petrol cars and the highest, which was £100, is now more than double that at £210. The Budget announcements will see VED frozen or reduced for 50 per cent. of cars, with around 3 million cars now paying VED at £100 or less. The clause 13 reforms build on the existing VED framework and support the drive for further falls in transport emissions for new cars in the future.

Julia Goldsworthy: The changes in clause 13 are one of the main headlines in the Budget and were used by the Chancellor to bolster his green credentials. He announced with great fanfare that there would be a new band of VED. Incidentally, given the fight to get on the front foot on that issue between the Conservative party and the Labour party, I am surprised that the Conservatives did not call for this clause stand part debate.

In his Budget speech, the Chancellor said:

"I propose to radically reform vehicle excise duty."—[Official Report, 22 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 295.]

The Financial Secretary has said this about the measure:

"The strengthening of environmental incentives announced in the Budget is designed to give a clear signal to motorists to consider the environmental performance of vehicles at the point of purchase"

which is a point that he has just restated. The reality is that the measure involves the smallest possible change to the most polluting vehicles. The new band G includes a maximum charge of £250 per annum, which means that the most polluting cars—cars that emit more than 225 g of CO_2 per kilometre—attract a price differential to the next band down that is equivalent to less than half a tank of petrol. What difference will that make to consumer behaviour? The environmental impact of the change in consumer behaviour will be negligible. My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) tabled a parliamentary question about the issue and was told that the estimated carbon savings of the new higher band of vehicle excise duty would be equivalent to 0.06 metric tonnes of carbon emitted by 2010. He was told, however, that

"calculating this figure is complex and subject to a significant margin of error."—[Official Report, 28 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 972W.]

As there is virtually no impact on behaviour, the initiative is an eye-catching but ultimately meaningless measure.

6.45 pm

On what evidence did the Treasury base its decision to set the new band at a maximum of £215? The Energy Saving Trust produced a significantly different figure and came to some very different conclusions. It agrees that a new band G should be introduced, but it made it clear that

"very high carbon cars should pay significantly higher VED than they do now."

It reasoned that the average carbon dioxide emissions from cars sold to the private consumer market has increased—not decreased—since 2002–03. That should be of concern to the Minister, as private car sales account for nearly half of new annual registrations in the UK or 1.2 million sales. We therefore need to change consumer behaviour, and Government intervention is required to promote and incentivise the low-carbon car market.

Another key finding in the Energy Saving Trust report is that vehicle excise duty has had little impact on the carbon profile of the private car market. It argues that the proportion of vehicles falling into band F is too high at 50 per cent., and that the differentials are too low to change behaviour. Although there has been some tinkering with differentials and bands in the Bill, the differentials remain incredibly small. For example, the differential between bands F and G equates to less than a tank of petrol, which is hardly enough to change behaviour. Does the Minister believe that the differentials in the Bill are sufficient to achieve a significant impact on consumer behaviour and, if so, on what evidence is that view based? The Energy Saving Trust calculated that the differential for the new band should be about £2,000, rather than £50, to have an impact on behaviour. Will the Government consider adopting such a measure in future years?

Mr. Kevan Jones: I am listening carefully to the hon. Lady, but less than 10 minutes ago Liberal Democrats moved an amendment to make rural areas a tax-free haven for gas guzzlers and petrol heads. Is she trying to tell the House that those areas are exempt from the provision, but that the rest of us must go down the green route?

Julia Goldsworthy: I was making the point that they are much more vulnerable to increases. We are therefore trying to release the mechanism so that it can be used to change behaviour effectively. In rural areas, it does not matter how the VED bands are set as people have to use a car. If they are on a lower income they are forced to spend more and more, so we are trying to provide relief for people who are disproportionately and unfairly affected. The mechanism can be used to change behaviour if there is an alternative.

A series of amendments on the need for wider differentials was tabled by Liberal Democrat and Government Members who tried to provide a solution to the problem. I accept that it is not appropriate to refer directly to those amendments, but I urge the Government to consider them. They should investigate the differentials required to make an impact on behaviour and consider ways of implementing them. In the longer term, road user charging may represent a fairer alternative. The Government are looking into the feasibility of such a scheme, which Liberal Democrats support, and I hope that they will seriously consider the practicalities and time scales. An effective mechanism is required so that motorists pay when and where they are driving. That is a fairer way to target relieving congestion in problem areas without penalising people in rural areas, and it provides freedom from pollution, congestion and the effects of climate change. I hope that the Government will consider that alternative.

In conclusion, the decisions in the Budget and the proposals in the Bill mean that green taxes will continue to drop as a proportion of the total tax take, regardless of the Chancellor's warm words. The Bill was an opportunity to create real incentives for people to choose more environmentally friendly cars. It was an opportunity even to consider more radical proposals such as road user charging. It is an opportunity that has been wasted, and in its place we have seen tokenism of the worst kind.

Rob Marris: We should review what the Government have done as regards motoring and emissions. In 1997, they introduced monitoring of CO_2 emissions from vehicles. They introduced bands A to F labelling on fuel efficiency. They carried out a major overhaul of the company car tax regime, which has led to a significant fall in the average emissions output of company cars. They introduced banding of vehicle excise duty—the graduated scheme that has been mentioned. This country is likely to more than meet its Kyoto targets. Between 1997 and 2004, there was a 10.7 per cent. cut in the new car average emissions of noxious gases, particularly CO_2. Now, clause 13 introduces band G, with lower bands at the beginning of the scale.

Julia Goldsworthy: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Rob Marris: I will not, I am afraid, because I do not have time.

There are some negatives. In recent years, private buyers have been buying fewer fuel-efficient cars each year. In 2003–04, the average figure for CO_2 emissions was 170 g per km. On average, that is higher than the figure for private fleet new vehicle purchases in 2002. In 2005, the UK average was 169 g per km, making us fourth worst out of the 15 European Union countries before accession. The western European average is 160 g per km. The European Union target, which is adhered to in principle by this Government, is to get average emissions for new vehicles purchased in the UK down to 140 g per km by 2008. Unless something dramatic happens, there is no prospect whatsoever of our reaching that target, given that our average in 2005, three years beforehand, was 169 g per km. In some ways, we are even behind China, which has legally binding maximum CO_2 emissions for cars based on their weight.

I am disappointed with clause 13 in terms of where we should be going. Next year, we should hit gas guzzlers—4x4s are not the only issue. MORI research for the Department for Transport indicated that 72 per cent. of people would swap their vehicles if there was a £300 or more differential on vehicle excise duty. Clause 13 is a start, but the new band G is not nearly enough of a differential.

We have heard about people in rural areas going across the fields in 4x4s to do their spring lambing. I have to say to hon. Members that of the 10 highest CO_2-emitting cars, only the Chrysler Jeep SRT 10 comes into the category of a vehicle that one could take lambing. Those that do not include the Lamborghini Diablo, the Lamborghini Murcielago, the Bentley Arnage, the Aston Martin DB7 GT, the Ferrari 612 Scaglietti, the Aston Martin DB7 Vantage, the Lamborghini Gallardo and the Aston Martin V12 Vanquish. They all emit more than 448 g of CO_2, compared with 109 g for some of the lowest-emitting vehicles, such as the Toyota Aygo, whether petrol or diesel. Band G is not set high enough. As the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) said, some 4x4 vehicles, for those who need them, emit considerably less than 200 g per km—the Toyota RAV4, for instance. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to look at this seriously and to do a whole lot better than clause 13 in next year's Budget.

Mr. Paul Goodman: Given that we have not had the chance to vote on the Liberal Democrat amendments for reasons that have not been satisfactorily explained, I shall contribute briefly to the stand part debate.

Tables A and B are the key to the clause. It is clearly sensible in principle to use the tax system to encourage motorists to go green. It therefore follows that one should tax the most polluting vehicles most heavily and the least polluting vehicles least heavily, if at all. Changes to vehicle excise duty bands must therefore be carried out with conviction and at least look to make a difference to consumer behaviour.

Let me sum up the consensus of opinion of the organisations that commented on the Government's proposals. It is that, although the Government are moving in the right direction, the changes lack conviction. Transport 2000 called the new top rate "derisory" and said that the changes would hardly pay for the new paperwork. Friends of the Earth called the changes "utterly inadequate" and said that they "will not result in the widespread uptake of cleaner vehicles, and will, therefore, not reduce the rising cost of climate change to the transport sector."

Greenpeace said that

"the Chancellor must know that £210 is far too little money to stop anyone buying a gas guzzler."

On the lowest rate, it is not unreasonable to expect a tax incentive to be of some use to the consumer. Members on the Treasury Bench will be aware of the point that was made previously that no cars on which the new rate would apparently apply are currently available on the market. There therefore appears to be little conviction.

There are two courses than an Opposition can take on the Government's proposed changes. They could table amendments to try only to reduce the take from vehicle excise duty because one cannot propose an increase in a Finance Bill. If the Liberal Democrats want to do that, that is up to them. We believe that that is an irresponsible approach and that the Opposition should look forward to 2009, when my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) will present his first Budget. We will try to provide greater incentives at the bottom band and consider heavier increases at the top. If the Liberal Democrats want to make tax and spending pledges, that is up to them, but we cannot say whether our proposal will be a revenue-neutral package or constitute a reduction.

Julia Goldsworthy: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Goodman: I apologise but I want to allow the Financial Secretary time to reply. We cannot say now whether, in 2009, the incentives will be part of an overall package that tries to reduce the tax take—which the Liberal Democrats propose today—whether they will be revenue-neutral or constitute an increase.

In summary, the Government are heading in the right direction by introducing a new zero bottom band and a heavier top band but that does not appear to be done with conviction because it will make little difference to what people consume in the market.

John Healey: Earlier, I set out the purpose and outlined details of clause 13 and I am glad that the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) says that it is going in the right direction. It may interest hon. Members, especially the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy), to know that in 1997 only 4 per cent. of the cars that were registered that year had emissions below 140 g per km. In 2005 the figure was 18 per cent. Our reformed vehicle excise duty system plays a part and makes a contribution, alongside other policies, towards driving down the average emissions by cars.

I am especially grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) for reiterating many of the points that I made about the Government's strong environmental record. I take his point about gas guzzlers as an early representation for the Budget in 2007.

I commend the clause to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 13 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 14 and 15 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Monday 8th May, the Speaker shall not adjourn the House until any message from the Lords has been received, any Committee to draw up Reasons which has been appointed at that sitting has reported, and he has notified the Royal Assent to Acts agreed upon by both Houses.—[Mr. Watts.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Monday 8th May, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 16 (Proceedings under an Act or on European Union documents), the Speaker shall put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motion in the names of Mr Douglas Alexander and John Healey relating to European Union Documents not later than three hours after their commencement; proceedings may continue, though opposed after the moment of interruption; and Standing Order No. 41A (Deferred divisions) shall not apply.—[Mr. Watts.]

Missed NHS Appointments

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watts.]

7 pm

Grant Shapps (Welwyn Hatfield) (Con): I rise to raise the issue of missed appointments in the NHS and the extraordinary cost and impact involved. The matter first came to my attention through one of my constituents, Mr. John Mitchell, who I am pleased to say is watching the debate this evening. Mr. Mitchell, who is from Welwyn, missed a hospital appointment. Being a public-spirited gentleman, he kindly took the decision to send the East and North Hertfordshire NHS Trust a cheque for £15, as he wished at least to make a gesture to make good following his missed appointment.

Imagine Mr. Mitchell's surprise when the trust, which is some £53 million in deficit, returned his cheque, saying that it did not need it or could not cash it, or something like that. Missed appointments cost the trust about £2.8 million a year. I pay tribute to John Mitchell for taking such a public-spirited approach. He had been to the dentist the previous week and seen a notice saying, "If you miss your appointment, there will be a £15 charge". He therefore thought that the NHS trust would accept the money, and that it might help to make up for his missed appointment.

That case sparked my interest in the subject, and the Minister will be interested to hear that I then fired off freedom of information requests to each of the 245 acute trusts in the country. I cannot reveal the details yet because I have not got all the information together. On Monday, however, I will have it, and I shall issue a report that I shall be happy to share. It does not take much to realise that if my medium-sized NHS trust is some £2.8 million adrift as a result of missed appointments, and if there are 245 acute trusts, including the ambulance trusts, in the country, we must be talking about a very large sum of money indeed.

I want to address the issue of missed appointments and to find out what the Government intend to do about it. I also want, to call for much more action than is apparently on the cards at the moment. I know that the issue has been raised with Ministers in the past, and that they said that they would take measures to cut the number of so-called "no-shows". It is therefore a mystery to me that, two and a half years after they made that pledge, nothing has happened. I have the figures here for 2003, when there were about 5 million missed appointments, and 2004, when there were about 5.7 million. Despite the fact that we are only just into May, I shall be able to reveal the figures for 2005 on Monday, and I am afraid that they do not make good reading for the Minister.

The response so far has been to look for solutions that involve very large computer-oriented fixes. We are all familiar with the £6.2 billion project designed for booking appointments, the so-called choose and book system. We are also aware that the project has been mired in controversy, with backlogs, and with money going down the drain. It was supposed to be up and running by last year, but it was not. I would be interested to hear a progress report from the Minister on that system. An efficient choose and book system would of course make a great deal of difference in cutting the number of missed appointments. However, the Government seem to confuse spending vast sums of taxpayers' money on complicated computer projects with actually fixing the problem.

In the context of the pledge to try to reduce the number of no shows, and the reference to the new £6.2 billion computer system, does the Minister feel that that was money well spent? Has it lived up to expectations? Clearly it cannot have done so far. Will it live up to expectations, or will that money never be recovered? I ask that question for a very good reason: £6.2 billion is perhaps six times the deficit for this year alone in the NHS. That is an awful lot of money, and so far we have seen no benefits from the system. I have figures from August last year showing that if the system had been on target, 205,000 appointments should have been made. However, only 63 appointments were booked though the computerise' system. I would be interested to hear an update on those figures from the Minister.

The NHS has a big problem of missed appointments, which is costing it a huge amount of money. I will have the figures for that on Monday, and I would not be surprised if the sum is the same as the total deficit in the NHS for last year. I hope that the Minister will accept that that is a huge issue, and I know that the Government have accepted previously that it is a problem. The proposed solution appears to be a very large computer project, which, according to the National Audit Office, has gone terribly wrong. I am keen to hear an update on that.

Simultaneously—let us not forget that this is at the heart of the problem—my East and North Hertfordshire NHS Trust, which serves perhaps 300,000 people in the Welwyn Hatfield area, while losing all this money through missed appointments and many other problems relating to its financing and running, is closing down children's services, the blue light accident and emergency department, the maternity department, elective surgery and many other services besides. We must get to grips with that problem, which has now spiralled out of control. I am pretty sure that the answer is not spending money. There must be solutions relating to the role of management and Ministers in the running of the NHS.

Before the Minister starts accusing me of wanting to charge all the patients who miss appointments, let me say that that is not what I am driving at. I use the NHS myself, and do not have any other kind of health cover. Indeed, my life was saved by the NHS in 1999–2000, when I was effectively treated for Hodgkin's lymphoma. I am indebted to the NHS. I do not want to hear anything about how, if the Conservatives got into power, we would start charging people for all their NHS services. That is not what this debate is about—I know that, because it is my debate. What I want to know is what will happen about missed appointments.

The Minister might try to tell us that these problems are much more complex than I am trying to represent them as, that the administration involved is somehow beyond our comprehension, that the £6 billion IT system might ultimately resolve the problems—although so far we have little to show for the expenditure—and perhaps that dark forces are at work that a mere Back Bencher cannot easily comprehend. I would point to research carried out by the NHS on why people are missing their appointments. What is the great reason behind more than one in 10 people missing their appointments, at huge cost to the NHS? According to that research, two thirds of those people simply forget.

I am not convinced that a £6.2 billion computer project is required to remind people of their appointments. I approve of spending on technology in the NHS and can see the worth of it. What worries me more than anything, however, is that where there is a problem there is a budget, that when that budget is broken, that does not much matter, and more will be spent until the problem is solved.

I do not think it is good enough to say that spending money on huge computer projects is a panacea that will solve a problem two thirds of which is due simply to the fact that an individual forgot to turn up for an appointment. There must be something else that we can do, and some of the solutions may be blindingly straightforward, as is the problem itself—the fact that people are simply forgetting about appointments.

Let me run a few of my ideas past the Minister. Perhaps I will receive a response. It seems to me that when my constituent Mr. John Mitchell, being a public-spirited gentleman, sent a £15 cheque to the NHS trust, it might have been better had it been cashable by the trust. That was, after all, my constituent's intention. I should have thought that if the trust did not feel that it could cash the cheque, it would have been appropriate to send it to the League of Friends of the QEII hospital.

What interests me is where the blockage lies. When the trust was asked about the matter, the head of communications, one Peter Gibson, told the local newspaper, the Welwyn and Hatfield Times, that it would be simply illegal to accept the £15. I ask the Minister this: is it illegal to accept a £15 donation, and if so, why? If it is not illegal, will the Minister undertake to drop a note to the chief executive of the East and North Hertfordshire NHS Trust, Nick Carver, explaining that it is not illegal? While she is at it, perhaps she will write to the other 264 trusts in England and Wales telling them that they can accept such donations.

On Monday, when I release a report containing all the data from all those 264 trusts, I shall be very surprised if other people do not come forward with exactly the same story. I am fairly convinced that a string of constituents from all over the United Kingdom will say, "That's funny: exactly the same thing happened to me."

I should have thought that in an age when people care passionately about the national health service and really want it to work, the Government and Ministers would want to do more to ensure that people who are generous in spirit, like my constituent, can make up for their error in forgetting to turn up for an appointment. I should have thought that there was sufficient good will throughout the nation for the establishment of a rather more formal arrangement.

Another solution might be to adopt the dentists' system. There might be a compulsory charge, or it could be suggested that those who missed appointments might like to make a payment. I would be surprised if that did not raise several million pounds a year.

There are practical solutions that the Minister could pledge to adopt this evening. She could write to all the chief executives reminding them of the legal position. If it is not the case that, as the East and North Hertfordshire NHS Trust claimed, it would have been illegal to accept the money, a letter to remind trusts of that would cost only 264 postage stamps and could save the NHS a fortune. The Minister could also consider whether it would be possible to introduce a scheme that would stop shy of compulsion, but would go as far as inviting public-spirited payments for missed appointments—if necessary, through a separate fund, or possibly to organisations such as the league of friends of the QEII hospital, which has equivalents throughout the country, or indeed to the main coffers of the trust itself.

I feel that my questions require answers. I hope that on Monday the Minister will be interested to see the results of the research that I have conducted throughout the country. I also hope that if I send her a copy of my report on the total cost of missed NHS appointments, she will tell me whether further measures could be taken to reduce the number of missed appointments—and I very much hope that the solution will not be purely and simply to rely on a £6.2 billion computer project that we all know has gone badly wrong.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): I must confess that when my private office approaches me and says "You must respond to an Adjournment debate", my heart often sinks. On this occasion, however, I must compliment the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Grant Shapps) on the entertaining way in which he presented his case, and the industry that he displayed.

I was aware that the hon. Gentleman had made requests under freedom of information legislation to various health organisations, and I compliment him on his industry. He is right that this is an important issue: we take it seriously and acknowledge that it is problem.

I shall not adopt a political position and say how much better things are under this Government. That would not be appropriate, but it is important to set the context for the debate and make it clear that our investment and reforms are having an impact on waiting times. In the past four years, waiting times for a first out-patient appointment have halved, falling from 26 weeks to 13. The maximum waiting time for an operation is now six months—and the average is even lower—compared with the two years or more that some patients used to endure.

I do not pretend that the new connecting for health computer system will be the panacea that resolves all problems. I shall detail what I expect will happen in a moment, but our investment means that the NHS will have a proper IT system that is able to track patient progress. That will make it much easier for patients to contact their GPs and the consultants dealing with their cases than has been the case in the past.

In addition, we are enabling patients to choose where they will go for treatment. The connecting for health system does much more than allow hospitals to track people who do not turn up for appointments. The hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield referred to the electronic booking system that we are putting in place. That will enable patients to select the time and date, as well the place, for their treatment.

On top of that, our financial reforms are developing incentives in the NHS to tackle the problem locally. Payment by results should mean that hospitals will no longer be able to pass on the costs of missed appointments to their commissioners. I understand that a figure of £100 per missed appointment is being bandied about. It is not one that I recognise: I think that it overstates the cost by quite a large amount, although I accept that missed appointments are a cost to the NHS.

Grant Shapps: That figure is based on Government estimates in the past, although I admit that I have only seen it quoted in various articles and do not know its precise source. However, I have much more detailed information about the actual cost of each missed appointment. I assure the Minister that my estimates will be based not on the £100 figure, but on independent health trust statistics.

At the beginning of her speech, the Minister reeled out some information about how appointments were being speeded up. Does she agree that that makes little difference to people in Welwyn Hatfield, given that the QE2 is all but being closed down?

Jane Kennedy: Clearly, I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman says about his local hospital, and I shall speak in a moment about the efforts being made by the local health organisation to reduce the number of occasions on which appointments are missed and the cost that flows from them.

Where missed appointments are a particular problem, NHS trusts already have the devolved power and the incentive to tackle them locally. Hospitals know their rates of failed attendances. Those figures are predictable, and NHS trusts are dealing with the problem. For example, it is likely that two patients out of 20 will not turn up to a clinic. When a patient does not show up, doctors do not just sit on their hands: they get on and see the next available patient.

Like other NHS trusts, East and North Hertfordshire is taking action locally to reduce the number of missed appointments. That goes beyond merely spraying money at the problem, but includes improving the quality of the trust's communication with patients. Reminders are sent out, and the trust also follows the matter up with those who fail to attend. In addition, it contacts the GPs of people who frequently miss appointments. That generally makes clear what the problem is, and I assure the House that it is not the same for all patients. I shall be interested in what the hon. Gentleman's research uncovers in that regard.

The hon. Gentleman referred to his local newspaper. His local trust uses the media to explain how important it is to keep appointments or, if that is not possible, that the trust is contacted to change the appointment. That has enabled the trust to reduce missed out-patient appointments by nearly 10 per cent. this year and it is planning action to reduce them even further next year.

The hon. Gentleman said that his constituent, Mr. Mitchell, had offered a contribution towards the cost of his missed appointment. I understand that his contribution was not accepted because it was offered as a payment. As I hope we all accept, the health service does not make charges to patients, so it cannot accept payments. However, had the contribution been offered to the League of Friends of the hospital, as the hon. Gentleman suggested, it would have been in order for the friends to accept it. A donation is different from an offer of payment, which was, I understand, the context of the offer.

The issue of missed appointments is important and I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising it and allowing me the opportunity to explain the work that the Government and the health service are doing to reduce that extra burden and cost to the NHS. One of the reasons that the issue is so important is that the NHS is treating more patients than ever. In the last year, 9 per cent. more patients were seen in out-patient clinics and 6 per cent. more as in-patients than under the previous Government. Despite that, the proportion of missed out-patient appointments is coming down—from 13 per cent. last year to 12 per cent. for the first three quarters of 2005–06.

Grant Shapps: I want to check some of those figures, to make sure that I heard them correctly. The number of missed appointments is not coming down for the year as a whole, so will the right hon. Lady undertake to ensure that there is some feedback on those figures when the report is submitted? The numbers mean nothing to me in the context of the research that has been carried out, so I suggest that they may be wrong.

Jane Kennedy: The Government will receive the hon. Gentleman's report with interest when it is ready for publication.

The electronic booking system to which the hon. Gentleman referred earlier should allow patients to see all available dates and times. They can then book an appointment straight after seeing their GP, or at their own convenience after checking with friends and family. We have been testing the system and we know, from pilot sites, that it has a strong, positive impact on missed appointments. The hon. Gentleman may be interested to learn that in one pilot scheme, the out-patients manager reported that none of the patients who had been electronically booked failed to turn up for their appointment. In another pilot, cardiology missed appointments dropped to 10 per cent. for electronically booked appointments, compared with 30 per cent. for traditionally booked appointments. At the Good Hope Hospital NHS Trust, the first two years of electronic booking helped to reduce missed appointments from 16 to 2 per cent. There is still further work to do and further improvements to be made, but we are making progress.

The investments we have made mean that now almost every out-patient appointment is booked in consultation with the patient, which is a massive improvement on the take it or leave it approach of the past. Although we do not collect figures on missed appointments with GPs, we know that it is an issue. That is why the Department of Health is funding the "Keep it or cancel it, but don't forget it" campaign to raise awareness among patients of the impact of their missed appointments. The campaign provides GP practices and primary care trusts with examples of best practice from other areas, as well as tools to help them to address missed appointments.

Finally, may I return to the point about charging patients for missed appointments? I do not believe that it would be right to charge for missed appointments. First and most important, we remain committed to an NHS that is free at the point of delivery, and I welcome the hon. Gentleman's generous comments about his gratitude to the NHS in his case. Charging for missed appointments would be not only wrong in principle, but uneconomic. Unless the fines were very large, it would cost more to collect them than it would bring in revenue. We are not sure how effective that would be. We know that many of the people who fail to attend are elderly or suffer from mental illness. Would it not be a cruel policy that punished the very people most in need of care and least able to pay?

We see a national health service that is treating more patients than ever before, treating them more quickly and reducing missed appointments. We are introducing systems that will allow patients for the first time to choose where and when they will be treated, and we are enabling local NHS organisations to tackle missed appointments at the grass roots. I accept that the problem is not resolved, and that there is still a way to go. I anticipate that the hon. Gentleman's report will enable us to consider further what more can be done to help local NHS organisations to reduce the cost to them of missed appointments.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-six minutes past Seven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

The Secretary of State was asked—

Artists and Entertainers (Fees)

2. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): When he next expects to meet the relevant unions and trade bodies to discuss up-front fees charged to artists, actors and models. [67723]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I am very concerned about the number of people who are still charged up-front fees on the promise of work that never materialises by employment agencies that operate in the entertainment business. We revised the Conduct of Employment Agencies and Employment Business Regulations in 2004 to address this issue, but allowed agencies in some special sectors to continue to charge a justifiable fee where this could be shown to be necessary for the promotion of the artist.

It is clear, however, that abuses are occurring. In our employment strategy paper "Success at Work", we have said that we will look at the issues affecting agency workers, and that includes hard-sell tactics resulting in people paying high fees up front. My officials have already been in contact with the relevant trade bodies and unions, and I will be having discussions with them as we move to address this problem.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply. He is obviously taking this issue seriously. Is he aware, however, that a recent survey by The Stage magazine shows that many young artists are being charged as much as £2,000 for either book fees or photographic services before the agency in question has found them any work? Also, a vigorous campaign by Clive Hurst has revealed that three quarters of the artists paying these fees receive no work at all in the following 12 months. Action is obviously needed, and I hope that the Minister will build on the action that he has already taken.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising this issue, because it is causing some concern. Between 18 and 20 agencies that have operated in this way have already been prosecuted. The exemptions were there to enable agencies to promote artists and to recover the costs of the publications involved, but, as the review by The Stage has shown, this practice is on the increase, and we need to do something about it. We are determined to stamp it out, and I shall be taking action.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): In any discussions that the Minister has with the BBC, will he raise the issue of regional drama programmes made by BBC Northern Ireland? Many of them are going outside Northern Ireland, and even outside the United Kingdom, to give work to actors in other nations, even at the further reaches of the EU. Will the Minister ensure that pressure is brought to bear on the BBC to ensure that drama that represents part of the United Kingdom is based and shot in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I do not think that that is my responsibility, but I will be happy to work with the agencies involved—and to speak to the hon. Gentleman outside Question Time—to look into the details of the issue. I shall also refer the matter to my colleagues in the Department for Culture, Media and Sport.

Ethical Trading Initiative

3. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): What discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for International Development on the ethical trading initiative; and what his policy is on the creation of an ethical scorecard for the benchmarking of companies. [67724]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Meg Munn): Officials from the Department for International Development and the Department of Trade and Industry work closely together on the Government's corporate social responsibility agenda, including the ethical trading initiative. The Government are a strong supporter of the ethical trading initiative, and, through DFID, have provided core funding of more than £2 million since 1998. We are delighted that an increasing number of companies see the value of this scheme, demonstrated by their joining the organisation, and we encourage others to do so. We do not at present have plans to create an ethical scorecard.

Malcolm Bruce: I thank the Minister for her detailed reply. Will she acknowledge that the surest way to get poor countries out of poverty is to create quality jobs, and that the ethical trading initiative provides a significant way to do that? Is she also aware, however, of the evidence given by the director of the ethical trading initiative, Dan Rees, to the International Development Committee last week? He said that the Government "could have a more coherent approach to ethical trading . . . I hear much from DFID but I do not hear nearly so much from DTI".

Will the Minister and her Department do even more to encourage British companies to join up and to practise ethical trading? Will she also consider whether some kind of benchmark or scorecard illustrating the achievements of British companies in this area might encourage more companies to take part?

Meg Munn: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman's Committee is looking into this issue, because it is enormously important. I have read the evidence that was taken last week. We are not in favour of the ethical scorecard approach because it would be very difficult to implement, and we do not want to increase the burdens on business. Different businesses have a different make-up: large corporations, for example, might have hundreds of thousands of suppliers, compared with the number supplying small and medium-sized enterprises. However, many benchmarking tools already exist, including the FTSE4Good, which deals with a range of issues. Companies are increasingly recognising the importance not only of having an ethical policy but of demonstrating that that is the case.

The DTI is keen on the whole range of corporate social responsibility—we have a corporate responsibility academy, which is developing and which is a success—so I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's view that the DTI is not doing a great deal on this.

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, North) (Lab): While I welcome the Minister's response and support for ethical trading, can she give an indication of how the Government are considering the issue of public procurement at national Government and local government levels, so that we can continue to discuss corporate responsibility not only in the private sector, but in the public sector?

Meg Munn: My hon. Friend raises an enormously important point. Increasingly, the Government, and indeed other organisations, are recognising the real procurement opportunities that exist in relation to not only ethical issues, but a range of issues involving equality, equal pay and those aspects that she knows are very much part of my brief. We are continuing to look at the issue and to develop our thinking in that area. We welcome her comments and those of the Committee.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): As champions of corporate social responsibility, Conservatives recognise the good work of the ethical trading initiative and we recommend that consumers consider the ethical status of companies when making their purchasing decisions. However, does the Minister agree that this is an area where the Government must be cautious of using the blunt instrument of regulation rather than information and transparency, allowing for consumer choice?

Meg Munn: Well, Mr. Speaker, a cautious champion. I am not sure that we have heard that before.

Mr. Djanogly: A wise champion.

Meg Munn: I hear the hon. Gentleman's comment.

I know that you are aware, Mr. Speaker, that I am a Labour and Co-operative Member of Parliament, as is my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and the Regions. We have long championed corporate social responsibility, so we welcome the Opposition to that point of view and would like them to be a little less cautious in this area.

BCCI

4. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): When he last met the liquidators of BCCI; and if he will make a statement. [67725]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I have not met the liquidators of BCCI. Officials from the Insolvency Service last met with the liquidators in 2004. The liquidators sent the annual report of their administration of the company, made up to January 2006, in March. My hon. Friend knows that the Secretary of State is unable to intervene in the administration of any liquidation. The control of liquidation proceedings is a matter for the creditors committee and the court.

Keith Vaz: Has my hon. Friend had the chance to read the judgment of Mr. Justice Tomlinson, in which he condemned the liquidators of BCCI for bringing a flawed case against the Bank of England, which cost millions of pounds of creditors' money and lasted 256 days? Does he not agree that a liquidation that has lasted 15 years has lasted far too long? Will he therefore call the liquidators to a meeting at the DTI to try to bring the liquidation to a conclusion? He could be the first DTI Minister in the last 15 years to bring matters to an end. Is he ready for his place in history?

Mr. Sutcliffe: May I first commend my hon. Friend for the work he has done on behalf of the creditors of BCCI over many years in trying to restore their funds? To date, 81 per cent. of funds have been restored.

My hon. Friend makes a legitimate point about the position of the liquidators. The Secretary of State and I have no powers to intervene, but I am prepared to facilitate a meeting with the liquidators to see whether we can make any progress.

Construction Industry

5. Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the contribution of the construction industry to the UK economy. [67726]

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): The construction industry is one of the most important sectors of our economy. It accounts for 8.3 per cent. of UK gross domestic product and employs 2.1 million people. I am impressed by the improved integrated teamwork shown by the industry, which has been given a tremendous opportunity to showcase its strengths in the build up to the 2012 Olympics.

Gordon Banks: I thank the Minister for that response, but does he agree that construction is a sector of industry that could benefit significantly from deregulation and a reduction in the regulatory burden that it experiences?

Alun Michael: There are certainly aspects of regulation that cause burdens for industry, and we are committed as a Government to easing those burdens and to approaching this matter from the basis of better regulation. Regulation is needed—such things as building regulations and so on are crucial for high quality and the protection of the public—but we are considering a variety of ways of doing that better. Only this week, I had a discussion with the construction industry umbrella organisations, which included that issue. I acknowledge the point made by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What is the Minister's assessment of the skills shortage in the construction industry and to what extent does that industry now depend on foreign labour?

Alun Michael: As far as skills are concerned, the London Development Agency and other regional development agencies are working closely with skills organisations. Where a lot of construction is likely to happen, such as in the area of the Olympics, skills training and encouragement will be necessary to ensure that our people can compete for such jobs. Again, I am impressed with the industry's leadership in that. Only last week, I joined the Prince's Trust and industry leaders to launch an initiative aimed at increasing the number of young people from more disadvantaged backgrounds who come into the industry, as well as encouraging people with the talent to lead to come into the construction industry. I acknowledge the importance of the issue.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): Naturally, it is pleasing that the construction industry is doing so well, but is health and safety for workers engaged in that industry improving?

Alun Michael: Again, I am able to say that it is. That is one of the topics that I discussed with the umbrella organisations this week, and the engagement of the representative bodies and trade associations acknowledges the importance of such improvement. Like my hon. Friend, I am pleased at the industry's success, which has made an enormously important contribution in my constituency, as he is aware.

Israel/UK (Bilateral Trade)

6. Rosie Cooper (West Lancashire) (Lab): What the level of bilateral trade was between Israel and the UK in the last two years; and if he will make a statement. [67727]

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): Let me begin by saying that the Government welcome the formation of the new Israeli Government today and look forward to working with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to take the peace process forward.

Bilateral trade between Britain and Israel increased marginally to £2.38 billion in 2005 from £2.34 billion in 2004. UK Trade and Investment, through commercial teams in the UK and Tel Aviv, provides a full range of services to British exporters and investors wishing to do business in Israel.

Rosie Cooper: I join the Minister in welcoming the growth in trade between Britain and Israel. Given that the UK and Israel both have strong track records in research and development, particularly in medicine, information technology and engineering, does he welcome initiatives to improve research collaboration between the two countries to ensure that the UK stays at the cutting edge of those fast-moving industries?

Ian Pearson: I know that my hon. Friend has visited Israel and is well aware of the technological potential and capability of its companies, of which we in the UK are well aware. The Britain-Israel Technology Foundation—Britech—was set up by the Israeli and British governments to support collaboration between high-tech companies, and broadening those links is certainly high on my agenda. I hope to visit Israel with a trade delegation later this month. The major tradeable sectors between the UK and Israel, in both directions, are telecommunications equipment, medicines and pharmaceutical products, as well as electrical machinery and scientific control instruments supplied from the UK to Israel. That indicates the current collaboration, but a lot more can be done.

Energy Supplies

7. Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): If he will make a statement on the current and future diversity of the UK's energy supply. [67728]

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): Securing reliable supplies of energy in the medium and long term is one of the key considerations of the Government's energy review, which I am leading, that will report to my Secretary of State and the Prime Minister in the early summer. Details on the diversity of the UK's energy supply will be contained in the latest report by the joint energy security of supply working group, which, I am pleased to tell the House, will be published next week. In addition, I will make written statements to the House soon about the past winter's experience and on the key issue of planning needs for new gas import and storage infrastructure.

Mr. Lancaster: Increasing the use of renewable energy sources is the best way of increasing diversity in the UK's energy supply. But does the Minister agree that we need to reconsider the renewables obligation, which focuses on wind power to the detriment of other emerging technologies?

Malcolm Wicks: Yes, I agree that the renewables obligation, despite its strengths, which have brought forward much renewable energy, could appear to be a blunt instrument and certainly seems to be favouring one technology—the wind farm. Within the review, we are therefore considering the issue that the hon. Gentleman raises. He refers to it as the best way of promoting a diversity of supply. We have a target that 10 per cent. of our electricity should come from renewables by the end of this decade, and what we currently call an aspiration of 20 per cent. by 2020. That is one way, but there are other ways of promoting such diversity.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): In all the debate about the future mix of Britain's energy needs, may I urge the Minister not to forget the important role of oil and gas, much of it from the North sea sector? Does he agree that it is important for us to attract youngsters into the oil and gas industry? Many see it as a sunset industry, but it has a longer future than other areas of energy development. It might help if we could sort out the argument about the offshore working time directive.

Malcolm Wicks: I understand my hon. Friend's fundamental point. Although oil and gas from the North sea and the wider UK continental shelf is in decline, perhaps 40 or 50 per cent. of stock remains. The oil and gas industry will continue to be an important and vibrant British industry for the next 30 or 40 years, and it is attracting new companies for exploration purposes. We need to promote the importance of both the gas and the electricity industries throughout the energy field, along with the importance of skills and training—not least so that we can attract new people into an important and indeed successful British industry.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Does the Minister regret saying that the country was awash with gas? Does he appreciate that one reason for the disruption of the energy supply during the winter was the lack of gas storage facilities in this country? How will he deal with that?

Malcolm Wicks: On the day that I said that the country was awash with gas, I had been told by the national grid that the country was awash with gas. I thought it important and, indeed, ethically responsible to present the truth to the House on that day.

It has been a difficult winter, although not as difficult as some Jeremiahs predicted. Unlike other European countries, we never had to cut off energy supplies. Nevertheless, there are crucial issues relating to future storage—which we are addressing—and, obviously, crucial issues relating to future sourcing of gas. We must think about obtaining it not just from our own continental shelf—which we have just discussed—but from a variety of regional sources, and obtaining it through new pipelines, for example from Norway. We must also recognise the emerging importance of liquefied natural gas from Qatar and, indeed, other nations.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): As a Leicestershire Member, I am naturally attracted by the potential of more than 800 million tonnes of coal in north-east Leicestershire, in the constituency of the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan). Can the Minister confirm that the review will consider carefully the potential of carbon capture, and that geological sequestration in the oil and gas reservoirs of the North sea has some potential? Does he acknowledge that more investment may be necessary to establish the possible benefits?

Malcolm Wicks: I think that that has huge, indeed mammoth potential. Given that the world will be burning huge amounts of carbon—fossil fuels such as gas and coal, not least in China—for a century or more, the only way in which we can square the circle and meet the challenge of climate change is to ensure that we promote technologies that can strip out carbon dioxide and store it safely, for example under the North sea. I heartily agree with the significant point that my hon. Friend has made.

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): The Minister has fairly acknowledged that one of the unfortunate consequences of the renewables obligation has been the skewing of the electricity market in favour of wind power at the expense of other technologies. Will he also acknowledge that tidal power is a far more reliable potential source of renewable energy than wind, which is inherently unreliable? What consideration has he given to the proposals for a tidal lagoon off the north Wales coast?

Malcolm Wicks: A number of ideas of that kind are being discussed. We have been backing marine technologies, both tidal and wave-power projects, for a number of years. The Secretary of State recently announced £50 million of funding for research and development relating to marine projects. They are exciting technologies, which could make a significant contribution in the future.

The words of caution, however, are "in the future". These are relatively new technologies, which to some extent are as yet unproven. Not many of them have been, as it were, tested in the water for long periods. It is important for industry, supported by Government whenever possible, to recognise and back new technologies to establish which can penetrate the market. As I have acknowledged, that has an implication for the renewables obligation. It also has an implication for grant aid from Government, and we are, indeed, putting our money where our mouth is.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that there are many hundreds of millions of tonnes of coal not only in Leicestershire, but throughout the area from Yorkshire to the coast and in north Lincolnshire? All that needs to be exploited in a clean fashion, but will he remember that when we talk about coal as part of our energy total, we should not talk too much about imported coal? We should talk about using what we have within our own shores, because it all has to be paid for; we do not want to be held to ransom on three different fronts. As for these wind farms, good as they are, nice and pretty as they are, the truth is that if we had to rely on them, we would have to have them at Buckingham palace, Highgrove and all the rest of the royal palaces.

Malcolm Wicks: Right. I am shocked that my hon. Friend has got hold of our secret list of potential sites, including—[Laughter.] Of course, hot air potential is another source of renewables. My hon. Friend makes a serious point and, with respect, it is so serious that we should not pit one energy source against another; we will need a range of different sources to deal with climate change and energy supply. The review is looking at British coal, a great deal of which is still underground. If we can relate clean-coal technology to it, we can see whether it has a future.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): On the future of nuclear in Britain's energy supply, can the Minister confirm that, following the decision to extend the life of Dungeness B last year, other existing nuclear power plants could have their lives extended by between 10 and 15 years? Is this option being considered in the energy review, and what discussions has he had about it with the nuclear installations inspectorate?

Malcolm Wicks: There are one or two issues associated with extending the life of such plants, and here, I should strike a note of caution. The Nuclear Decommissioning Authority has a major challenge on its hands: to decommission existing nuclear plants and to tackle the waste issue as seriously as possible. I attach real significance to that objective, but as I said, one or two issues are being explored. I am always impressed when individuals and political parties that are fundamentally opposed even to considering future nuclear nevertheless urge me to keep existing nuclear reactors.

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): Does the Minister agree with me that the anti-nuclear bias that was evident in a previous question seems to be present, according to reports, in the submissions to his review? Does he also agree that research and development in the nuclear industry has put a lot of money into this country's coffers, and that the United Kingdom should increase its nuclear R and D in order to add to the Chancellor's money?

Malcolm Wicks: Our position has always been to keep the nuclear option open. The Prime Minister has asked us to consider this issue and to come up with proposals by the summer, and we are looking at it very seriously. Nuclear contributes some 18 to 19 per cent. of our electricity, and 9 per cent. of our total energy supply for all forms. The case for new nuclear is strong; however, concerns about waste and safety, and the need to consider the economics and to make a cost-benefit analysis, are also important factors. As I said, the outcome of our review will be reported to the Prime Minister, and to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, by the summer.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) (Con): A lot of hard work is going into the energy review, both in this House and outside. It is clear that the Prime Minister has pretty well made up his mind that he would like a new generation of nuclear power stations, but potential investors will want to know what the waste regime will be. The Committee on Radioactive Waste Management has said that waste should be buried very deep, but does not think that an appropriate site will be found for decades. Filling the generation gap is an urgent matter, but how can anyone invest in nuclear if the uncertainty over the waste regime continues?

Malcolm Wicks: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, and we need to achieve certainty on the waste issue. Stage one of that process is the work being undertaken by the Nuclear Decommissioning Authority in clearing up the waste legacy of many decades at a large number of sites. Stage two involves the important work being done by CoRWM. It has produced some preliminary work, but will report in full by the summer, on securing a medium to longer-term resting place for the waste. It is critical that the Government make a judgment on the CoRWM recommendations as soon as possible—partly because it is a disgrace that Governments and Parliament have not tackled the problem in the past 30 or more years, and partly because there is a need for certainty, as the hon. Gentleman said. Everyone involved tells us that they want long-term certainty in our energy policy, and that means certainty over several decades.

Mr. Duncan: The Prime Minister seems very keen on nuclear, but the Minister seems very keen on coal. He said:

"The environmentalists may not like that, but tough."

To be fair, he said that because he thinks that coal-powered generating stations can capture the carbon, but will he name a single company that is capturing carbon commercially, other than for the purpose of enhanced oil recovery?

Malcolm Wicks: No, I do not think that I can, as these are still relatively early days in the story of carbon capture and storage. I spoke about being tough, but it was what I said in the next couple of sentences that was important—that we therefore need to develop the technologies of carbon capture and storage, and of clean coal technology in particular. Unless we do that, we will be in trouble globally, given the developments in China. That represents a great manufacturing opportunity for British industry: if we in the UK can demonstrate the importance of clean coal technology, we will be one of the world leaders in the export of that expertise.

Sunday Trading

8. Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): What plans his Department has to change Sunday trading laws. [67729]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Alan Johnson): We are currently reviewing the whole question of Sunday shop opening hours and whether there should be deregulation in that area. An independent economic cost-benefit analysis, commissioned by my Department, will be published on Friday. No decisions have been made: if the Government decide to alter the current arrangements, there will be full public consultation beforehand.

Tony Baldry: All hon. Members who were here when Parliament legislated in the mid-1980s to deregulate shop opening hours will recall that a compromise was agreed on Sunday trading. Without that compromise, the Bill would not have passed into law. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that nothing has happened in the intervening years to suggest that that consensus, which after all is based on the irrefutable premise that Sunday is a special day, should be undermined?

Alan Johnson: I accept that the regulations were agreed in 1994, but I do not agree that nothing has changed since then. This matter is worth considering, although the hon. Gentleman may be right that the public perceive the balance to be about right. However, things have changed since 1994: more people are at work and are working flexibly, and we have a more multicultural society now. Moreover, there is now a real feeling that we should regulate only where necessary, and that we should deregulate where we can. The Government do not take a position on the matter. Our approach is very neutral: we want to examine the cost-benefit analysis, but any decision to go further would involve a full consultation process. I do not think that anyone could reasonably argue with that.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): Given that the Government have confirmed that any changes to Sunday trading legislation would require primary legislation and given that nearly 250 Members have signed a Commons motion supporting the great British compromise as enshrined in the 1994 Act, does my right hon. Friend think that if he brings forward proposals, there will be a strong case for a free vote on Government Benches, as in 1994, particularly as there was no mention of this in our election manifesto?

Alan Johnson: I am a long way from considering free votes and even from considering legislation. Primary legislation would be required. At the moment we are simply taking a look at the issue 10 years on to see what the situation is now and whether there should or can be deregulation, and to listen to people's opinions. When we reach the stage of legislation, I shall bear my hon. Friend's suggestion in mind.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): I think that I identified a little political correctness in the reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) saying that we have to consider all multicultural aspects. This is Britain. Sunday has always been special. In the 24/7 commercial world in which we now live it is important that there is a gap, a pause, to allow families and communities to focus on other things than shopping and so forth. I for one would very much like to see Sunday remaining special. May I hope that the Secretary of State will support that and, more importantly, allow us all to have some indication of the timetable for when a decision will be made?

Alan Johnson: I have never been accused of being politically correct before. I was simply pointing out what has changed since the last time Parliament discussed the subject. I am well aware of the strong feelings on this issue, not least because of the pleasant vicar from Walsall who has chained himself to a bed outside my last four constituency surgeries. The bed, curiously, is meant to signify that Sunday is a day of rest. One of my splendid constituents berated him and said, "It is all right for you to go and work on Sunday. Why are you stopping me?" A good line to a vicar, I think. I completely understand that there are strong views on this. Remember it was this Government who, because of the private Member's Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones), legislated to resolve the anomaly on Christmas day, for which there was only regulation when it fell on a Sunday. We acted to deal with that because of the special nature of Christmas day. We understand the special nature of Easter Sunday and Sunday itself. That does not mean to say that we should not look at this again, just as we looked at it in the 1990s. We were tied to the Shops Act 1950 for about 40 years when society had changed completely. This is a chance to look at the matter. There is no timetable at the moment because we are still at the cost-benefit analysis stage. There will be the fullest consultation, including a timetable.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating USDAW, the shop workers' union, on its campaign to protect its members who work on a Sunday, many of whom are low-paid and women workers? Can he assure me that his Department will take the proactive approach to protecting Sunday workers that it took when I piloted my excellent Christmas Day (Trading) Bill through the last Parliament?

Alan Johnson: I am glad that my hon. Friend is present to hear the congratulations in person. We are looking at the 1994 legislation. Protection for shop workers is contained in the Employment Protection (Continuity of Employment) Regulations 1996. We do not intend to alter those in any way. The protection that currently exists for workers on Sunday is not a part of this review.

EU Gas Market

10. Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): What assessment he has made of the future structure of the gas market in the EU. [67732]

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): A properly functioning EU market is essential if we are to receive reliable and competitively priced supplies of gas. While some progress towards market opening has been made, we are working with the Commission and other member states to accelerate progress on liberalisation.

Ann Winterton: Bearing in mind that large industrial users in the United Kingdom face the highest gas prices in Europe, despite our having a fully liberalised gas market and remaining the largest producer, does the Minister agree that the lack of liberalisation of continental gas markets is causing distortion which could cost UK gas consumers as much as £10 billion this year? Why did the Government not push hard for the liberalisation of the European gas energy market when they held the presidency of the European Union?

Malcolm Wicks: The one bit with which I agree is that the situation produces distortion and extra costs; it certainly did in 2005. I agree with those data. For 10 years or so, British industry and the British domestic customer paid far lower prices than the average in continental Europe, but there are now serious difficulties. We are pressing very hard on the matter, which was a key priority for us when we held the presidency. If the hon. Lady had been at the Energy Council, she would have found that that was the case. Two commissioners have produced strong reports on the need for liberalisation; we are pressing hard and the Commission has indicated that it will take legal action against those blocking the path.

Mr. Mike Weir (Angus) (SNP): The Minister will remember that during the passage of the Energy Act 2004, there was much discussion about the security of energy supply. As he knows, Gazprom, which is state-controlled, not state-owned, is buying up gas supplies in continental Europe and has now set its sights on Centrica. What would it do to the security of energy supply in this country if such a company had control of so much of the gas market?

Malcolm Wicks: It is absolutely crucial that we have energy diversity, so that not all of our energy eggs are in one basket—whether the gas basket or another—hence the discussion about renewables, the importance of coal in our considerations and the controversial nuclear issue. We need diversity, although the shape that will take remains to be seen, and we need to promote competition and liberalisation. Any developments or takeover ideas will be a matter for the competition authorities to make sure that our objectives are not threatened.

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): On the hottest day of the year so far, it may seem churlish to talk about next winter, but the Minister will not have forgotten that earlier this year the national grid issued an unprecedented gas shortage warning. He will also be aware that an energy crisis was only narrowly avoided and that experts already predict that the situation next winter will be as tight, or even tighter. We have heard some generalities from the Minister, but what specific steps are the Government taking now, during the spring and summer, to increase the amount of gas storage supply in the United Kingdom and to improve the availability of imported gas to ensure that next winter we shall not again be on the brink of an energy crisis?

Malcolm Wicks: The gas announcement was unprecedented because we had only just brought in the procedures for such announcements. As it was the first time, I would have been unhappy had it not been unprecedented. The commercial market is setting up more storage capacity. We got through this winter even though the main storage facility at Rough was out of action due to a fire, so there will be more storage in the future. More gas will be coming into Britain; liquefied natural gas from Qatar and more gas from the Langeled pipeline and Norway. Storage and diversity of supply are central to the energy review.

Pipe Organs (Lead Pipes)

11. Mr. Alan Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): When his Department first became aware that the use of lead pipes in newly built pipe organs could be prohibited under the restriction of hazardous substances directive. [67733]

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): A different topic, but an important one. Our clear view is that pipe organs do not fall within the scope of the directive and that view is widely accepted in the European Commission. The DTI is working closely with the Commission, and our aim is to reach a successful conclusion before the directive comes into force on 1 July.

Mr. Beith: I welcome the Minister's reply and invite him to go down to the Crypt chapel of the House of Commons, listen to the beautiful organ and reflect on how absurd it would be if the ability of British craftsmen to build organs of high quality depended on a renewable derogation, to which we would have to return, perhaps every four years. As neither commissioners nor other European countries seem to accept that that is necessary, I hope that the Minister will stand firm and insist that the directive should not apply to lead in pipe organs.

Malcolm Wicks: As I have just said, our view is that it should not apply and that view is strongly held in the Commission. I hope that it will be confirmed at an important meeting in June, so that we can put an end to all this nonsense, which has understandably upset people committed to church organs and their manufacture. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be reassured by my words; we are absolutely determined to get this right. Very soon, we shall all be singing from the same hymn sheet.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): Will the Minister arrange to make a statement to the House after that meeting, on the creation of new organs and the repair of existing ones, and will he tell the House now what "widely" includes? Who disagrees with the view that he says is widely held?

Malcolm Wicks: Margot Wallström, the European Commissioner responsible for the negotiations on the directive and Caroline Jackson, MEP, a crucial player on the Environment Committee, have recently made public statements in agreement with what I have said. We have now got to go through a process in the European Commission for that to be absolutely confirmed at this crucial meeting, which I think will take place in the third week of June. Will I make a written statement afterwards? Yes, of course I will.

National Minimum Wage

12. Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): How many workers he estimates will receive higher pay as a result of the recently announced increase in the minimum wage; and how many of these workers will be women. [67734]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): The DTI estimates that just over 1.3 million workers stand to benefit from the October 2006 increase in the national minimum wage. Of the estimated 1.3 million beneficiaries, two thirds are women.

Mr. McGovern: Unfortunately the press and the Opposition seem to have largely ignored the recent increases in the national minimum wage. The Minister has just pointed out that many people will benefit from that and I am sure that they appreciate it. I am concerned, however, about the number of women who are on the national minimum wage. I am sure that everyone agrees that they benefit from it, but real action is needed to reduce that number. If the Government are going to bring forward proposals to cut the gender pay gap, I hope that those proposals will address not only the glass ceiling at the higher end of the pay scale, but the sticky floor that sees a disproportionate number of women on the national minimum wage.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am pleased that my hon. Friend welcomes the success of the national minimum wage—a flagship policy of the Government that was opposed by the Opposition parties, who have now admitted their mistakes. He is right to highlight the issue of low pay and particularly low pay among women. I am sure that he will be pleased by the recommendations of the women and work commission, which is looking at cutting the gap. We will continue to monitor what happens with the national minimum wage, but we believe that people on low incomes benefit greatly from it—together with the tax credit system.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Given that there has been a modest, but persistent phenomenon of non-compliance with the 1998 legislation, would the hon. Gentleman care to consider the proposition that in such instances, when people have to take action to secure their legal rights, there is a lot to be said for including in legislation an entitlement to the payment of interest on the sums that they are due? I first made that proposal, as an amendment to the national minimum wage legislation, on the Floor of the House as long ago as March 1998.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on being a lone voice in the Opposition in relation to the national minimum wage. He is right to highlight that a small minority of people are still not paying the national minimum wage, but the legislation covers that situation in that when people are convicted or found not to have paid, they must back-pay to the original start date of the employment. We are looking at enforcement and it is important that we do so right across the range. We have picked particular sectors. Notably, we recently picked hairdressing, where we have looked at enforcement. We will consider all ways of making sure that rogue employers who do not pay the national minimum wage are made to pay it.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): I fully agree with the comments made by the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow). I wonder whether the Minister would consider amending another anomaly in the legislation that means that, when people pay their bills by credit card and leave a tip on the credit card, that can be used at part of the calculation of the minimum hourly rate. That is an unacceptable practice and I wonder whether we can change the legislation.

Mr. Sutcliffe: We have looked at that issue. My hon. Friend will know that we deal with such issues by asking the Low Pay Commission, which is made up of employer and employee representatives, to consider them and see what can be done. We take on board its recommendations. The commission has considered the issue and there are no plans to change anything at the moment.

UK Aerospace Industry

13. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): What assessment he has made of the future viability of the UK aerospace industry. [67735]

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): The UK Aerospace industry is one of our great strengths—regionally and nationally. This was shown by the 2003 aerospace innovation and growth team report, which set out a vision for the future. Government endorsed that vision. More information is set out in the Department of Trade and Industry evidence to the Trade and Industry Committee inquiry in March 2005 and in our formal response to the report in July 2005.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for that full and accurate reply. The aerospace industry is critical to manufacturing. It produces at the cutting edge of technology and contributes hugely to our exports. Will he ensure that his colleagues in the Ministry of Defence are aware of the importance of the MRA4 project to British Aerospace at Woodford? If the order could be placed as soon as possible, that would be helpful to the industry. Will he also accept, on behalf of the Minister for Energy, the hon. Member for Croydon, North (Malcolm Wicks), a visit from me and a company in my constituency, Senior Aerospace, which is currently in some difficulty with health and safety? The Minister is aware of that. It is critical to the survival of that company for it to be able continue its operation.

Alun Michael: I am aware of the specific point, which is being looking at. We are co-signatories of the defence industrial strategy with colleagues at the Ministry of Defence and the Treasury, and I very much commend the work of Lord Drayson, who is the Minister responsible for procurement, on the way that that is being developed and the fact that it recognises the importance of the industry, both to our defence needs and to our industrial needs in this country. The hon. Gentleman would not expect me to make promises on some of the specifics of his question, but I understand their importance to his constituency. I would be very happy to talk to him further.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

The Minister for Women was asked—

Flexible Working

19. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What steps the Government are taking to encourage businesses to adopt flexible working patterns for parents of young children. [67743]

The Minister for Women (Tessa Jowell): In April 2003, we introduced the right to request flexible working for parents of children under six and disabled children under 18. This law has been a success and welcomed by families. The evidence is that more than twice the number of mothers returning to work now do so to work flexibly than did in 2002, and that 90 per cent. of the requests made by parents—mothers and fathers—to work flexibly are agreed.

Michael Fabricant: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply. She is right—the law has been a success—but does she not also think that home working is very important, too, and that it is very much a possibility through the use of home computing? Did she make representations to the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the repeal of the home computing initiative, which may prevent poorer families from buying computers that they could use to work at home?

Tessa Jowell: The hon. Gentleman raises an interesting issue, which I will certainly pursue, but he will be aware that the right to work flexibly applies not only to hours but to working at home.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries and Galloway) (Lab): All too often the cry is about women in senior positions. Will my right hon. Friend outline to the House what steps she is taking to ensure that there is more flexible work for women in senior positions?

Tessa Jowell: My hon. Friend makes a very important point, which was addressed by the women and work commission, chaired with such distinction by Baroness Margaret Prosser, and we are considering all the commission's recommendations. The essence of closing the gender pay gap, which the commission was established to consider, is opening up more opportunities for women to do senior jobs on a part-time basis—that is the key—and we intend to make proposals, with the social partners, on how that might be achieved.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): I agree with a lot of what the Minister has said, but will she confirm whether the Government will also pay attention to the many thousands of women who not only look after small children but have other family responsibilities, often more difficult ones, as carers for elderly, ill or disabled relatives or friends? Does she agree that the problem for many women in the work force is having to deal with both ends of family responsibilities? Will she undertake to consider carers in all that the Government are planning to do to encourage flexibility in the workplace?

Tessa Jowell: I agree that it is important to consider the needs of women and men who have elderly relatives who depend on them, which is why the Work and Families Bill, which is being considered in another place, includes a proposal that the right to request flexible working should be extended to men and women with caring responsibilities. I am delighted that there is cross-party support for that provision, but the hon. Lady may not wish to remember that her party voted against the introduction of flexible working.

Mrs. Laing: I did not vote against it.

Tessa Jowell: The hon. Lady is an exception to the general rule in 2002.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): Research published in Wales by the Equal Opportunities Commission and the Welsh Development Agency shows that small businesses are more profitable if women and men work at every level of the business. What can my right hon. Friend do to educate and inform small businesses of the need to use all the skills available, and to adopt flexible working patterns for parents of young children and carers with responsibilities for elderly parents or disabled people?

Tessa Jowell: My hon. Friend will be reassured to know that small businesses have extended the right to request flexible working, just as larger businesses have done. In particular, I commend the Work Wise UK campaign which is supported by the Government, as its purpose is specifically to ensure that businesses of all sizes up and down the country are aware of the obligation to offer the right to work flexibly as well as the benefits of flexible working in reducing turnover and preventing the waste of talent that is often the price of inflexible working patterns. Everyone who has stood up for those proposals for many years can be proud of their success.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): May I ask the Minister to return to the question asked by the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant), as she failed to answer it? Was she or the Department consulted on the Chancellor's Budget decision to abolish the home computing initiative? Does she not regret that decision, which will have a negative impact on flexible working patterns for parents of young children?

Tessa Jowell: As I have already said, I am happy to pursue the matter. I did not raise it specifically with the Chancellor, but the Government have a proud record of extending, particularly to people in poor communities, the right of access to information and communications technology and training, not least through the initiative funded by the lottery that is operated by my Department and that has been successful in ensuring that every library in the country is wired to the internet.

Part-time Workers

20. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): If she will make a statement on the gender pay gap for part-time workers. [67744]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Meg Munn): The pay gap between women working part-time and men working full-time has narrowed slightly in recent years, but remains unacceptably large at 41 per cent. The women and work commission has made recommendations to tackle the causes of unequal pay which we are taking forward.

John Bercow: Research by the Equal Opportunities Commission shows that four in five part-time workers are working below their potential, which represents a huge waste, and the women and work commission recommended that the Department of Trade and Industry should spend £5 million on the establishment of a quality part-time work change initiative. Can the hon. Lady therefore tell the House what progress has been made on the implementation of that recommendation, thereby giving us the chance to slash the part-time gender pay gap, which has remained stubbornly unchanged for the best part of 30 years?

Meg Munn: The women and equality unit in the Department has established an implementation group to take forward the commission's recommendations, and the Government are committed to producing an action plan within six months. As the hon. Gentleman will know, Baroness Prosser will look at our progress within a year. Those issues are being tackled, and there are good examples of companies that provide quality part-time work. As soon as we have information about the details of the plan we will make it public.

Jessica Morden (Newport, East) (Lab): The Fawcett Society has highlighted the fact that black and minority ethnic women, many of whom work part-time, face the greatest inequality in the workplace. For example, the pay gap is even bigger for Pakistani and Bangladeshi women. What steps is my hon. Friend taking to tackle that problem?

Meg Munn: It is enormously important to understand that the pay gap is different for different groups of women, and my hon. Friend rightly identified the problem for certain groups of minority ethnic women. She will know that the Equal Opportunities Commission has undertaken an inquiry into precisely that issue, and we look forward to its report. The Government will look at the way in which we need to tackle the issue in relation to different groups of women in our response to the women and work commission.

Entrepreneurial Opportunities

21. John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): what further steps the Government plan to take to increase the number of entrepreneurial opportunities for women. [67745]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Meg Munn): To provide high-profile leadership to accelerate women's enterprise, a task force on women's enterprise will be operational from June 2006. It will work with key partners, such as the regional development agencies, to increase the levels of female-owned businesses in the UK.

John Robertson: I thank my hon. Friend for her efforts and the work that she is doing in helping these women. Does she realise that it is estimated that if the same levels of female entrepreneurship in the United States were to be seen in this country, we would have 700,000 new businesses within the UK, which would have a substantial impact on productivity and employment? Will my hon. Friend redouble her efforts to tackle the under-representation of women in the higher skilled sectors of the economy, which would significantly improve business start-ups and opportunities as a result?

Meg Munn: My hon. Friend is right that if we had as many start-ups by women as in the US, there would be considerably more businesses. The figures are changing. There is good news that there are more women starting up businesses. We estimate that there are about 500,000 more businesses. Nevertheless, my hon. Friend is right. I will continue to do all that I can to promote this issue. Specifically, some of the work that we are undertaking is to ensure that the regional development agencies, which deliver our business support, are ensuring that appropriate advice is given to women, as women undertake these activities in a different way—in particular, often starting up when not being in work and taking on self-employment to fit in with family responsibilities.

Business of the House

11.31 am

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): May I ask the Leader of the House to give us the business for the coming weeks?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 8 MAY—Consideration of Lords amendments to the Civil Aviation Bill, followed by motion to approve European documents relating to future European Union finances, followed by if necessary consideration of Lords amendments.

The House may also be asked to consider any Lords messages which may be received.

TUESDAY 9 MAY—Opposition day [15th allotted day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion—I assume ironically entitled—"The Need for the Government to Appoint a Turn Around Team to the Department of Health".

WEDNESDAY 10 MAY—Remaining stages of the Police and Justice Bill, followed by motion to establish a Joint Committee on Conventions of the House of Lords.

THURSDAY 11 MAY—Remaining stages of the Housing Corporation (Delegation) etc Bill, followed by a debate on creating confident consumers on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 12 MAY—Private Members Bills.

The provisional business for the following week will be as follows:

MONDAY 15 MAY—Progress on remaining stages of the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill.

TUESDAY 16 MAY—Conclusion of remaining stages of the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill.

WEDNESDAY 17 MAY—Remaining stages of the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill.

THURSDAY 18 MAY—Motion relating to the staging of Members and Chairmen's pay, followed by a motion relating to the association of former Members.

FRIDAY 19 MAY—The House will not be sitting.

Mrs. May: The Secretary of State for the Department for Work and Pensions, on 31 January at column 245 of Hansard, expressed his hope to the House that there would be a debate on pensions before the publication of the White Paper. Can the Leader of the House confirm that he has been asked to find time for such a debate, and when will it take place? When will the Government's full response to the ombudsman's report on pension scheme failures, which found the Government guilty of maladministration, be available? Will there be a debate in Government time on the report and response before the summer recess?

Members will note that we will be having an Opposition day debate on the Government's operation of the inter-management of the health service. A debate on the health service has been refused resolutely in recent weeks by the Leader of the House. Two weeks ago, I questioned the accuracy of a statement made about the health service by the Prime Minister. The Leader of the House said:

"There is a well-used process by which statistical mistakes are corrected. Letters would be written and placed in the Library."—[Official Report, 20 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 235.]

I wrote to the Prime Minister. He did not reply. The Secretary of State for Health replied instead. Will the Leader of the House make a statement next week, telling Members what they should expect when they write to the Prime Minister about statements that he has made in the House? We realise that Ministers no longer take responsibility for what happens in their Departments, but is it also the case that the Prime Minister no longer takes responsibility for what he says in the Chamber?

For the record, on 19 April when talking about how many patients in the Thames Valley area were waiting more than 13 weeks for an out-patients appointment, the Prime Minister said that

"today, the figure is none."—[Official Report, 19 April 2006; Vol. 445, c. 116.]

The Secretary of State for Health tells me that the figures were from December 2005. So when the Home Secretary said that "very, very few" foreign prisoners had been released after he knew about the problem, he meant 288, and when the Prime Minister on 19 April said "today", he meant three months ago. Perhaps the Leader of the House could arrange for statistics and English lessons for No. 10.

Recently, when asked whether he was going to sack the Home Secretary if more of the foreign criminals released from jail reoffended, the Prime Minister replied:

"I don't think I'm going to speculate. It depends on what happens, what the reasons are."

Today we learn that a convicted criminal recommended for deportation and not deported is being sought for attempted murder and the rape of a 15-year-old girl. Does that count as sufficient reason for the Prime Minister to sack the Home Secretary? Surely enough is enough, and the Home Secretary must go.

That case shows the dangers to which the public have been exposed by the incompetence of the Government. In a recent poll 89 per cent. of people questioned said that the failure to deport foreign prisoners on release "reflects alarming incompetence". Can we have a debate on the Government's record on and responsibility for public safety? I also repeat my call for a debate on Government incompetence.

Today may well be the last time that the right hon. Gentleman attends business questions as the Leader of the House.

Comptroller of Her Majesty's Household (Mr. Thomas McAvoy): Do you know something we don't?

Mrs. May: Probably quite a lot.

Over time, the Leader of the House has been tipped for many posts. In February it was Chief Whip. Then he was 26–1 on to be Chancellor of the Exchequer. Earlier this week, sources close to Downing street said that "Mr. Blair could even turn to Geoff Hoon . . . as an outside bet to replace Mr. Clarke."

[Mrs. May]

Today I learn that his odds are 10–1 to be Home Secretary. However, perhaps the best bet was suggested by a Back Bencher, who claimed that the Cabinet Office was proving to be the best-run Department, and it has not had a Cabinet Minister for four months. Given the Government's appalling performance to date, maybe that is the answer.

Mr. Hoon: I shall attempt to deal with the serious points raised by the right hon. Lady. It may not take me quite as long as the various points that she made.

A debate on pensions would be useful, as I have previously told the House. I will have to look at the business that we have to fit in, to see whether that can be arranged before publication of the White Paper. I will certainly consider that, as it is an important subject for the House to discuss.

On corrections, when the right hon. Lady asked me for a correction, I indicated that that would be done in the usual way. She accurately described the usual process of correction, whereby a departmental Minister taking responsibility sets out the details in a letter, which is then placed in the Library. I commend her for the accuracy of her description, but I do not see how that amounts to some failure of responsibility. I may have missed the subtlety of her point.

As far as my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is concerned, he has stood before the House on a number of occasions, including yesterday, and set out in considerable detail the efforts being made to correct what he has described as an unedifying situation. It is right for him to continue to do so. Despite the protestations from Opposition Members, I have seen no substantive criticism of what he has been doing to remedy the particular problem. As I made clear to the House last week, it was only as a result of impressive improvements in the working of the Home Office in this area of policy that the particular problem came to light. Before 1999, Governments were not in a position to know whether the problem existed, because no previous Government kept records. It is important for the Opposition to think about those facts before making the sort of blustering comments that we heard a few moments ago from the right hon. Lady, if she will forgive me for saying so.

The Government have already held a series of debates on the subjects of public safety and public security, but I regret to say that, from time to time, we have not received the full support of the Opposition in our efforts to promote them. With further regard to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and the proposals that he set out yesterday, we look forward to finding out exactly what the Opposition's position is. They are certainly willing to criticise the Government, but when we make proposals to solve the problems, sadly, they do not always give us the support that we would expect.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): Could some time be set aside for a debate on sectarianism? Unfortunately, a small number of football fans bring their sectarian views into the football ground. The police tell me that, on the night of a Celtic-Rangers game, domestic violence increases by 75 per cent. A survey carried out by the health service union, Unison, in Scotland a few years ago showed that, for the same reason, some hospitals were treating about eight times as many patients for stab wounds.

Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating Jack McConnell and the Scottish Labour party on its anti-sectarian campaign? Will he also congratulate the fans of Celtic and Rangers who unfurled banners against sectarianism last week—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend both for raising the issue and setting out the answer. I am aware that both Celtic and Rangers clubs have taken initiatives and I agree that it is important to stamp out not only racism, but the sort of sectarian behaviour that has gone on for many years in Glasgow. It is certainly something that we should seek to avoid.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): We will undoubtedly have more debates on various aspects of the Government's mismanagement, but can we have a particular debate on the form and function of the Home Office, which was described by one Government Member last week as dysfunctional and by another as needing to be split up? The right hon. Gentleman will know that many of us have argued for some time that we should have a fully fledged Ministry of Justice and that we should dismantle the Leviathan that produces legislation like a sausage factory—the Home Office. Will the right hon. Gentleman allow us a debate on that matter?

Can we have a short debate on defence procurement? The deaths of the brave servicemen who lost their lives on the RAF Hercules just over a year ago will weigh heavily on every hon. Member. If there were the slightest chance that their deaths could have been averted by the provision of explosive suppressant, it should have been used. Can we have a sober and sensible debate about what can be done to protect our service people?

The Public Accounts Committee has published a report today on the channel tunnel rail link. It does superlative work in drawing attention to things that are going wrong in the Government. Had the Government listened to its comments on tax credits, the Rural Payments Agency and a host of other disasters, they might have been averted. Can we find a way of getting reports from Select Committees, including the Public Accounts Committee, before the House at an earlier stage, so that the appropriate lessons can be learned?

We have just heard the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, in answering questions for the Minister for Women and Equality, say that she will pursue the effect of the ending of the home computer scheme on home workers. I have to tell her gently that it is a little too late, when we debated that matter on Tuesday this week. No doubt she voted with the Government to reject the Opposition amendments. Can we therefore have a re-run of the debates on the Finance Bill on Tuesday so that the Government can get their act together?

Mr. Hoon: I hope that the hon. Gentleman recognises that what is important about the Home Office is not its structure, but what it does. Although he has criticised the legislation produced by the Home Office, it is interesting that his party and his colleagues voted against a series of measures which were designed to provide protection for the public and safety and security for people on the streets. He has said that the Home Office should be split up and organised differently, but he is not prepared to support the measures that most members of the public judge necessary in order to preserve their safety and security.

I share the hon. Gentleman's view on the need to ensure that defence procurement provides proper protection for our servicemen and women. However, the particular example that he has raised illustrates a problem that always arises in procurement—it is nearly always possible to find some safety feature or device which, with the benefit of hindsight, would have prevented a tragedy, but judgments necessarily have to be made about the extent to which each and every safety feature can be built into, for example, an aircraft. The safest course so far as aircraft are concerned is not to take off the ground, so the truth of the situation is that there is an inherent level of risk, and the Ministry of Defence, taking the advice of the armed forces, always minimises that risk. However, there will always be some irreducible risk, and judgments have to be made about the nature of that risk in order to ensure that the brave men and women who serve this country so well can do so to the best of their ability.

I have always recognised the important work performed by Select Committees. It is important that this House takes notice of their recommendations, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government read those reports carefully and act on them, where it is appropriate to do so. Select Committees have a significant effect—I know how much care and attention right hon. and hon. Members pay to their work, and it is important to go on learning the lessons that they outline.

I am interested to hear that the Liberal Democrats now have a new constitutional concept, which is to re-run votes where they lose, and I shall think about it.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): Yesterday, the Home Secretary promised a statement by the end of May concerning the proposals to change the operation of the Home Office on the deportation or removal of foreign nationals. Will the Leader of the House confirm that there has been no change of policy in respect of a foreign national who has been charged with a criminal offence but who has not gone through a trial? As he knows, I have raised in the House the case of my constituent, who was killed by a foreign national. That foreign national was removed by the Home Office before the trial took place, so he was not able to stand trial. In any event, will the Leader of the House confirm that we will debate those matters before any legislation comes before the House?

Mr. Hoon: I assure my hon. Friend that careful consideration is always given to such cases. Liberty involves balancing the freedom of an individual against the wider freedoms of society. In making such judgments, difficult decisions have to be taken. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has outlined a proposal to change the law to provide greater security for the citizens of this country, but necessarily account will also have to be taken of the individual rights of those concerned. My hon. Friend has raised that case before, and I recognise the importance of justice being seen to be done in relation to those who have allegedly committed serious offences in this country.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): When can we have a debate on the fraudulent use of postal votes?

Mr. Hoon: That has been discussed at great length, having arisen out of various reports following the use of postal voting in the last general election. As I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware, the Government are considering ways in which the security of the system can be improved. I look forward to his support when the Government bring forward those proposals in due course.

Mr. Stephen Hepburn (Jarrow) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of yesterday's disgraceful decision by the Law Lords to deprive thousands of asbestosis sufferers and their families of their rightful compensation. When will the Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform come to the House to make an early statement so that she can tell us exactly how we are going to legislate to ensure that workers get what they are entitled to and that working class people are not dragged through the courts by multinational insurance companies?

Mr. Hoon: I am well aware that each of these cases is a tragedy for those who have been involved, and particularly for their families. Equally, I know that there will be great disappointment as a result of the House of Lords decision. I hope that my hon. Friend will recognise that this is a complex area of the law and that it will take some time to assess the case. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions will of course look at the advice that he is given in the light of that decision, to see whether further action is necessary.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): Today we mourn the passing of a colleague—the late Peter Law, the Member for Blaenau Gwent. New Labour, in an effort to prevent him from standing for Parliament, offered him a peerage. The man named as being responsible is the Secretary of State for Wales, who made the offer on the specific authority of the Prime Minister. When can we have a debate on this corrupt practice?

Mr. Hoon: Let me say how much I regret that the hon. Gentleman has chosen to raise this issue in that way. Welsh questions took place yesterday. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was present on that occasion. The hon. Gentleman could easily have raised the issue yesterday in the presence of my right hon. Friend. It is regrettable that he has chosen to raise it today when my right hon. Friend is not in the Chamber and able to answer. There has been some correspondence on this issue, which I have seen. My right hon. Friend has made it plain in that correspondence that he does not—absolutely, categorically does not—accept this allegation. He is not responsible. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the allegation, because it is totally and utterly unfair for him to raise it in this way.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would say to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) that I would have hoped that today he would have notified the Secretary of State, or any other hon. Member against whom he was going to make an accusation, to give that person an opportunity to be in the Chamber. Did he do so?

Mr. Llwyd: At 5 minutes to 11, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps in future more warning should be given. I would expect that. Hon. Members are entitled to at least have the opportunity to rebut any case that is put against them, and due notice should be given.

Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): My right hon. Friend may not be aware of a situation in my constituency, where in Crieff, in south Perthshire, as many as 40 residents are facing eviction from a caravan park because of a legal argument between the council and the developer regarding the wording of the licence and planning approval. While I understand the role of the Scottish Parliament and Executive in this matter, will my right hon. Friend find time to have a debate on this subject so that we can try to determine the depth of the problem in the UK as a whole? Does he agree that the innocent victims, namely the residents, should not be the people who are victimised in such situations?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right in saying that I was not aware of that particular situation, but I anticipate that he has achieved his purpose by raising it. He is right to do so. Such questions of planning, housing and, indeed, caravan parks, cause difficulty across the country.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): As the Leader of the House has just announced that the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill will come back to the House the week after next, would he care to comment on the Government amendments that have been tabled today, which have completely emasculated that very bad Bill? Will he, as Leader of the House, who is responsible for looking after Back-Bench interests, ensure that in future that such a Bill, which harms parliamentary democracy and does not give us a chance properly to debate and vote on issues, never sees the light of day again?

Mr. Hoon: I have set out two days for the House further to debate that Bill. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman has chosen to put his criticism in that way. I should have thought that this indicates the way in which the Government respond to criticisms and table appropriate amendments. I am sure that I could discuss the matter at great length today. It is a fascinating Bill, and one that I am sure that all hon. Members will enjoy reading again in its amended form, but I will postpone that treat for a week or so.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): May I, too, call for a debate on pensions, especially occupational pensions? Now that the Government have rejected the recommendations of the ombudsman, my constituents who worked for Allied Steel and Wire and lost their pensions are pinning all their hopes on a hearing in the European Court on 1 June. Of the 2,000 affected in Cardiff, only 17 have been able to gain any assistance from the financial assistance scheme. Can we have a debate on that subject so that we can bring home to the Government the limitations of that scheme?

Mr. Hoon: I indicated earlier the importance of a debate on pensions, and I will certainly find out whether one can be arranged in an early manner. I am sure that my hon. Friend will have the opportunity to raise the position of her constituents at that time. I hope that she would give the Government credit for having, for the first time, introduced the financial assistance scheme. We recognise the vital importance that individuals place on their pension provision. When they are, through no fault of their own, deprived of that pension, the Government have taken action to provide some degree of security. That clearly needs to be discussed in the context of the wider issues about pensions, and the Government are keen to take forward that debate.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): While the House welcomes the regular statements from the Home Secretary about the well publicised failings in his Department, is not there a strong case for a calm, full-day debate in Government time on how the systemic failings in the Home Office arose and on the steps being taken to put them right and, it is to be hoped, to prevent any recurrence? Will the Leader of the House find time for such a debate?

Mr. Hoon: I welcome the suggestion that Conservative Front Benchers, in particular, would benefit from a degree of calmness as they approach this issue. They should debate the subject rather than the prospects for the continued employment of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. Calmness is important, as this is a serious, sensitive issue. I recognise the importance to the country of ensuring the safety and security of our citizens. The Home Secretary has lately demonstrated his determination to come before Parliament regularly to explain the steps that are being taken to sort out the situation, and I anticipate that he will continue to do so.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): A day or two ago, our Government entered their 10th year in government. The transformation of resources available to the public sector and the quality of services delivered has been very considerable. However, one area where we have, sadly, maintained the record of the previous Government is in the acquisition, design, build, implementation and running of major computer systems such as connecting for health, which had an original cost estimate of £2.3 billion. However, different estimates that have recently been made in The Sunday Times and elsewhere—twenty-three academics wrote to the Select Committee on Health—suggest a cost of £15 billion or more. As that overshoot of £12.5 billion would fund the deficits in NHS trusts for the next two decades, is it not about time that we had a debate on better ways of acquiring major new computer systems, in the way that is suggested by early-day motion 2056, of which I am a co-sponsor?

[That this House notes with concern the contents of a letter to the Commons Health Select Committee signed by 23 senior academics in computer-related science which criticises the NHS Connecting for Health computer system, and reports in The Sunday Times of 16th April that the system, which was projected to cost £2.3 billion, could cost between £15 billion and £30 billion; further notes that NHS trusts are facing an estimated deficit of £600 million to £1 billion; and calls upon the Secretary of State to set up an independent review of the project and to ensure that any savings identified are directed to cash-strapped NHS trusts.]

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend raises a serious and proper concern about large-scale computer systems. I assure him that lessons have been learned. Too often in the past, single systems were introduced on a large scale and did not produce the anticipated results. There have been several initiatives to try to introduce systems on a smaller scale to allow them to develop incrementally and deal with the problems over time. That means that we do not always experience immediate improvements and it is clear that the sort of changes that people face in society require computer systems that are sensitive and can be adjusted to deal with them. That is a continuing challenge for the Government.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): The Leader of the House knows that hon. Members from all parties would like the House to take more control over how it spends its time. Will he therefore allow a debate on setting up a business committee in the House? Such a committee operates in the Scottish Parliament, the Welsh Assembly, the Northern Ireland Assembly, when it is operating, and in many legislatures throughout the world. Will he seriously consider that so that the way in which the House operates is more transparent and more sympathetic to its Members?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for repeating the speech that he gives regularly before the Modernisation Committee. I am growing to appreciate, love and even understand that speech. He is voluble member of that Committee—

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): And valuable.

Mr. Hoon: Thank you. The hon. Gentleman is, indeed, voluble and valuable. I believe that we shall continue debating the matter in the proper way through the Modernisation Committee.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): I am sure that the Leader of the House appreciates and recognises the value of the service that local radio stations throughout the United Kingdom provide. The recent BBC White Paper has been met with some anxiety by many of those radio stations and I know that hon. Members would like to raise those concerns in a wider debate. Are there any plans for a debate on the BBC White Paper? If so, when?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to praise the work of local radio stations. I am an assiduous listener to Radio Derby on the Saturday afternoons when Derby County play away from home. It is interesting to note that the peak listening time for all local radio stations is when the local football team is away. However, they are a valuable source of information throughout the day and week. They are popular, especially with the elderly, and it is important that their continued success is recognised when we debate and discuss the BBC's work, as I am sure we shall do in the context of the White Paper.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): Farmers in my constituency face disaster. Those who are tenants cannot pay their rent, many have crippling debts and others cannot pay their suppliers. That is all due to the Government's delay in making the single farm payments. Will the Leader of the House arrange an urgent statement so that Ministers can refute recent reports from Brussels that they are attempting to get permission to delay the payment still further?

Farmers deserve fairness. The House deserves answers. Britain deserves better than Labour.

Mr. Hoon: I recognise the concern that the hon. Gentleman has properly raised about single farm payments. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is tackling the issue urgently. I recently spoke to some farmers and I understand the anger and concern that is being caused. All I can do is assure the hon. Gentleman that determined efforts are being made to ensure that the payments are made in whole or in part by June. We need to continue to work through the system. The hon. Gentleman is right to raise the matter, and the Government are responding as quickly as they can.

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know that the five major banks in this country have reported more than £32 billion of profits in recent weeks, yet the complaints against them about overcharging and placing ATMs in areas where there are people on benefit and the elderly and in rural areas are increasing. Will he find time for a debate on whether we should introduce a regulator who can keep those banks in check and ensure that the people who can least afford it are not charged unduly?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to raise ATMs, especially in rural areas. It is a problem in several small villages in my constituency and I recognise that people are worried about the costs that they face, especially for accessing their own money. The Government continue to raise the matter with the clearing banks—it is something that we need to get right.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): At column 961 of Hansard yesterday, the Prime Minister made the astonishing claim about foreign prisoner releases that he is "making sure that that system is radically overhauled so that those who are convicted of a serious criminal offence are deported automatically."—[Official Report, 3 May 2006; Vol. 445, c. 961.]

I am sure that I do not need to point out to the Leader of the House that the Human Rights Act 1998 bears on that. Given that the Home Secretary's assurances about that measure during the passage of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 have not been effected and the PTA is being challenged in the courts under the Human Rights Act, may we have a debate on the latter's operation? All hon. Members believe in human rights but many of us also believe that the House should determine those rights in relation to the national interest and not have them decided by an external jurisdiction that may not have the national interest at heart.

[Mr. Bernard Jenkin]

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hoon: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman puts the case in that way and even sorrier that he appears to get so much support from Conservative Members. He should know—I am sure that he does—that this country has been bound by the European convention on human rights since the early 1950s.

Mr. Jenkin: Rubbish.

Mr. Hoon: I am afraid it is true. A Conservative Government, led by one of the greatest Englishmen who ever lived—Sir Winston Churchill—signed up to the European convention because, at the end of the second world war, the need to safeguard human rights and liberties was recognised absolutely. This country led the way—we drafted large parts of the European convention. To blame matters, for party political reasons—the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, but that is the case—on the Human Rights Act, which simply incorporates our existing international obligations into domestic law, is misleading. It is party political point scoring, which is wrong and unfair.

The hon. Gentleman needs to recognise—doubtless he will have some spare time over the weekend—that the key case was decided in 1996 by the European Court of Human Rights. A Conservative Government were in power at that time. The Government have joined in the challenge to that decision because we believe that the judgment should be changed. However, to suggest that the problem began with passing the Human Rights Act is plain wrong—and he knows it.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): The Leader of the House may not know that a hospital in my constituency has announced 200 job losses. He almost certainly does not know that it was identified only last year as one of the three best hospitals in the country, with efficient care at below average cost and high output measures, yet, far from being asked to expand, as it should, it is being asked to shrink. Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange an early debate in Government time about how that absurdity could arise and the key elements of Government policy that led to it, especially the capitation formula, which is dragging huge amounts of money to parts of the north of the country, where almost all strategic health authorities are in surplus, to the cost of strategic health authorities in the south of England, almost all of which are in deficit?

Mr. Hoon rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I want to take every hon. Member who is seeking to ask a question, but I can do so only if they are brief: so far they have not been brief.

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that it is right to take everyone who wants to ask a question and I shall do my best to answer their questions as briefly and succinctly as possible.

I am sure that, should the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) catch your eye in the relevant debate next week, Mr. Speaker, he will have an opportunity of asking all those questions. However, he needs to face up to the fact that the Government have introduced a fair formula for capitation. We have changed a previous arrangement whereby disproportionate amounts of money were devoted to specific parts of the country. As someone who represents a constituency in the midlands—plenty of Members who are present represent the midlands and the north of England—I know that those areas were historically not properly and fairly funded in the way in which we are now trying to achieve. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity of debating the matter with Labour Members next week, but fairness is an important part of the way in which we fund the health service.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Last week, in a record 27 days, the European Medicines Agency committee recommended the use of Herceptin for early-stage breast cancer. That confirms the practical recommendations of oncologists, who will immediately administer the drug to patients with addresses in Cheshire, Staffordshire or Wales, when their primary care trusts will fund it. However, patients with a Shropshire address have to raise £47,000 or, in a bizarre new development, consider moving to Wales to get the drug.

Thanks to the promptings of the Leader of the House, the Minister of State has now replied to my three unanswered letters to the Secretary of State for Health on this issue, and confirmed that PCTs should not refuse to fund Herceptin solely on the ground of its cost. When will the Secretary of State come to the House to explain why her writ does not run in Shropshire?

Mr. Hoon: This is a serious issue, and the hon. Gentleman has raised it assiduously and consistently. He has asked me the same question repeatedly, and I give him the same answer. Indeed, on this occasion, he has answered the question that he set for himself. I do not need to add to that, save to say that I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will see through the logic of her position, making this drug available as and when necessary on the basis of the best clinical advice.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): May we please have the first debate on Africa in this Chamber since 30 June last year? Given that, in the index of failed states that was published this week, no fewer than six of the 10 at the top of the list were in Africa—Sudan, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Cote d'Ivoire, Zimbabwe, Chad and Somalia—is it not time for the House again to consider how the British Government, working multilaterally, might address the fragility of those states, which is damaging to their own citizens and a source of wider regional instability?

Mr. Hoon: I had not realised that quite so much time had elapsed since I last granted the hon. Gentleman's request for a debate on Africa. This is a matter that the Government take enormously seriously. As we speak, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development is in Abuja to do precisely what the hon. Gentleman seeks—to ensure that the British Government show their determination to support the African Union in achieving a peace settlement in Sudan. This Government use their energy, their authority and their influence to bring about such achievements. There is no doubt that we take these issues enormously seriously, and we will go on doing so. I will look into whether it will be possible to have a debate on the matter in due course.

Michael Gove (Surrey Heath) (Con): May we have a debate in Government time on accountability in the national health service, so that Ministers might have the opportunity to take responsibility for what is happening in the NHS? The Leader of the House will remember that, more than six months ago, I raised with him the closure of the centre of excellence at the upper gastro-intestinal unit at Frimley Park hospital in my constituency. He told me then to contact the Secretary of State for Health. I have subsequently written to three Ministers in the Department of Health and received three replies. On each occasion, I have been told that I cannot have a meeting, even though I have written on behalf of hon. Friends in Berkshire, Surrey and Hampshire. How can we ensure that Ministers take responsibility for the health services that affect our constituents if they will not meet us and if they will not answer questions in the House?

Mr. Hoon: I am tempted to say that at least the hon. Gentleman got replies, which I regard as very important. I also regard it as important that Ministers are willing to meet right hon. and hon. Members of the House. That is a basic principle that should be observed, and I will certainly investigate the matter that the hon. Gentleman has raised, because I believe that he should have the opportunity to take his case directly to a Minister.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): In the aftermath of the 7/7 bombings, the Prime Minister set as his highest priority the deportation of the small number of hate-filled imams who have done so much damage among young Muslims, and against whom the moderate Muslim community has repeatedly called for action. May we have an early debate on that matter? May we also have clarification, following the announcements yesterday on the deportation of foreign criminals, that the measures will also apply to dual nationals, including the one such imam who now has a criminal record, Sheikh Abu Hamza?

Mr. Hoon: Detailed aspects of the Government's proposals will need further debate and discussion. Dual nationality might be one of the issues that has to be looked at in greater detail. I broadly share the hon. Gentleman's concern—as do the Government—to ensure that those who come here for a variety of purposes do so within the law and do not break the law. If those who are not British citizens do break the law, we take appropriate action, which must include their deportation.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Although the results of DNA tests have yet to be confirmed, Staffordshire police have said this morning that the human remains found on Cannock Chase are almost certainly those of Gladys Hammond. The Leader of the House might recall that animal rights activists exhumed the remains of Gladys Hammond from her grave in Yoxall in my constituency. Will he join me in condemning not only the animal rights activists who did this terrible deed but those who persecute people working in medical research? Animal rights activists are hypocritical in the extreme, because they will have had antibiotics and vaccinations against childhood diseases, all of which, unfortunately, had to be tested on animals. Will the Leader of the House ask the Home Secretary to make a written statement on the Government's policy on trying to control the activities of these extremists?

Mr. Hoon: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, who puts his position very well. The behaviour of those responsible for that appalling incident was nothing short of disgusting, and we all share the concern of the family involved, not least because they have been subject to so much attack and disruption for engaging in perfectly lawful activities. The Government believe passionately in the importance of science and of scientific progress. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has worked with the science Minister to ensure that this country continues to be a centre of excellence for scientific progress. If we fail in that, we will not have a competitive role in the 21st century. Science, competition and efficiency go hand in hand, and the Government are determined to support them.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): Will the Secretary of State for Education and Skills come to the House next week to make a statement on the arrangements that are being put in place to ensure that university students across the land are able to graduate this summer, should the industrial action by university staff be taken? Can the Leader of the House also offer any reassurance to a constituent of mine who has been told only this week that her dissertation is unlikely to be marked this summer, and that she will therefore be unable to graduate?

Mr. Hoon: It is important that students who have worked hard—and even some of those who have not—have their examinations marked and therefore have the opportunity to graduate. This is a vital, difficult and sensitive time in young people's lives, and we would not want industrial action to jeopardise their prospects. I suppose I ought to declare that I am a former member of the Association of University Teachers. I remember once marching under a banner that caused utter confusion to the local population, as it read "Rectify the Anomaly". It was not the most immediately effective campaign slogan, and it caused a great deal of puzzlement. I think that equal puzzlement would be caused to any students who did not have their exams marked. It is always much better if these issues can be resolved by negotiation rather than by industrial action.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): The Leader of the House might recall that I mentioned to him a while ago the case of Stephen Ayre, a convicted murderer who was released from prison on licence and abducted and raped a 10-year-old boy in my constituency. Stephen Ayre was told last week that he would spend the rest of his days behind bars, but it also emerged that although he had breached the conditions of his licence the probation service had failed to send him back to prison, which allowed him to commit this awful crime on my young constituent. Will the Leader of the House ensure that the Home Secretary comes to the House to make a statement on what went wrong in this case, and that he ensures that nothing like this can ever happen again?

Mr. Hoon: I will not comment on the case in question, but it is important that we ensure that the probation service and other agencies are properly resourced and supported to be able to carry out the terms of any sentences that are imposed. In fact, licence arrangements have been remarkably successful. It is important that we recognise that fact. There are always such terrible cases where things go wrong, but that should not allow us to ignore the fact that licence in general works very well and is an important part of our penal process. It is important that this should be got right and it is important that the probation service should be supported to get it right.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Last Friday at my surgery, a group of families from the Croyland ward, which is in the heart of the Wellingborough constituency, came to see me. They are very concerned that one or two families are terrorising the neighbourhood and making life unbearable for law-abiding citizens. There is graffiti, vandalism and foul language. Yesterday, I was shocked to learn that one of the families who came to complain had had their property set on fire. Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Home Secretary to come to the House to make a statement, in this Government's 10th year in office, on how they intend to deal with those problems?

Mr. Hoon: The Government have set out and taken action in a number of areas to tackle those problems. We all recognise, across the country, that there is antisocial behaviour, and it is probably the leading issue raised in my constituency surgery. From what the hon. Gentleman says, I anticipate that the same applies to his surgery. That is why we have set out a respect agenda, given the police more powers and put more police on the streets, as well as community support officers. A range of measures has been taken.

Every so often hon. Members raise such issues at business questions, but I would like those same hon. Members to see through the logic of their complaints by supporting legislation that the Government introduce. There is sometimes, if he will forgive me for saying so, a disconnect between the two. He is right to raise his constituents' concerns about antisocial behaviour, but I am right to say that this Government have taken more action than any other in history to sort it out.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): When can we have a debate on rural crime? I recently had a meeting with farmers, estate owners and people who live in the countryside around Kettering who feel increasingly isolated and under siege from Traveller-related and other criminal gangs, which are stealing tens of thousands of pounds-worth of agricultural equipment and threatening people in my constituency. There seems to be a group of people in the country that is increasingly above and beyond the rule of law.

Mr. Hoon: It is vital, in rural as well as urban areas, that the law is observed and enforced. I will not follow the hon. Gentleman down the route of suggesting who might be responsible for particular crimes, but I am saying that it is vital, in all parts of the country, that the police force is properly resourced and supported to be able to act against those responsible for such crimes. I believe that the Government, in ensuring that there are more police officers in every part of the country, are setting out on the right road in dealing with not only rural crime, but urban crime. I accept that there is still more to do; this Government are determined to do it.

Point of Order

12.23 pm

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At Wales questions yesterday, in reply to a question, the Under-Secretary of State for Wales said:

"The Welsh Assembly Government are planning to invest an additional £30 million in NHS dentistry in the coming year. That will bring total spending on NHS dentistry in Wales from £81,000 in the last year to over £210 million in the coming year."—[Official Report, 3 May 2006; Vol. 445, c. 957.]

Quite clearly, those figures are inaccurate. Can you advise me, as a Back Bencher, on how they can be corrected?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has raised his point of order, and Hansard will probably make a correction, but he is at liberty to speak to Hansard staff if he so wishes.

Disabled People

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mrs. McGuire.]

12.24 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mrs. Anne McGuire): I welcome this opportunity to discuss the Government's record on improving the life chances of disabled people—a record in which we can take some pride. I also hope that we can debate the challenges that lie ahead and our strategy for tackling them.

The last Adjournment debate on disability took place in summer 2004. I have read the report in Hansard, and I was struck by the focus of that debate, which was almost exclusively on civil rights, although there were, as always, some well-made points on the wider agenda.

Since then, the Government have massively extended civil rights, and I will start by setting out some of our achievements in this area. We have also undertaken a comprehensive study of the life chances of disabled people and, through the flagship report by the Prime Minister's strategy unit, set out an ambitious but deliverable strategy to ensure substantive equality for disabled people within 20 years. That ambition ranks alongside, and is indeed integral to, our ambition to eradicate child poverty. I will take this chance to update the House on our progress in implementing that strategy.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Given that the Nuffield speech and language unit is a centre of excellence that for more than 35 years has been providing specialist teaching and therapy to children aged four to seven with severe speech and language disorders for whom no comparable provision does or can exist in mainstream education, will the Minister tell the House what discussions she has had with the Secretary of State for Health on the importance of protecting that centre of excellence from the threat of closure?

Mrs. McGuire: I will not deal with the specifics of the Nuffield centre, but I will explain some areas where we are working across Departments to ensure that we dovetail far more creatively in delivering for disabled people.

In January, we set out our proposals for welfare reform, which, again, are integral to the development of our policies for disabled people. We believe that they will end the marginalisation and exclusion of disabled people from the labour market. In that report, we explicitly set out our belief in the right of disabled people to work, and I know that hon. Friends and colleagues will welcome some discussion of that key element of our strategy.

However, before I begin that discussion, I want to spend a few moments reflecting on the position just under 10 years ago, not to seek to embarrass the official Opposition—[Interruption.] No, no. We need to be clear, though, about how much the debate has moved on in that period. In today's debate, we should appreciate the dramatic changes that have been made to the environment in which debates such as this take place.

[Mrs. McGuire]

I offer congratulations to the official Opposition, who have travelled a long road since 1995. We can all accept that, in 1997, disabled people had limited rights. Indeed, they had only two substantive rights—the right not to be discriminated against in employment if they worked for a firm employing more than 20 persons, and the right not to be directly discriminated against in the provision of services. However, there was no commission to help disabled people to enforce those rights.

I hope that we can all accept that there were opportunities missed—most notably when the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 was passed—to establish Britain as a beacon of civil rights for disabled people. Although the DDA was undoubtedly a small step on the right road, I suspect that in retrospect, many of those on the Opposition Benches regret that they did not respond more positively to the challenge that was presented to them at that time.

However, since then, and with increasing consensus in the House, this Government, who came to power in 1997 determined to deliver on a commitment to improve the rights of disabled people, have taken action to ensure that we meet the ambitions and aspirations of disabled people themselves.

In respect of extending rights for disabled people and those with long-term limiting health conditions, I submit that the Government's record is without parallel. I mentioned the debate in 2004, which preceded the massive extension of the Disability Discrimination Act in October of that year—a landmark in the history of disability rights. In that debate, the then Conservative spokesperson was still concerned that there might be a massive backlash from businesses, the public and the media. I am glad, however, that those prophecies of doom proved to be wide of the mark. In fact, the changes that extended the employment provisions of the DDA to more than 1 million additional small businesses and a further 7 million jobs, and brought the final access duties into force, are driving a massive cultural change in society.

Mr. Paul Goodman (Wycombe) (Con): As the then Conservative spokesman to whom the Minister referred, may I point out that saying that something might happen is not a prophecy? May I also ask her about the timing of the debate in 2004 to which she referred? The debate in 2004 took place on European election day. The debate today is taking place on local election day. Could she arrange for our next debate on this subject to be on a day on which local or European elections are not taking place?

Mrs. McGuire: The hon. Gentleman made great play of that in the previous debate, and I noted his comments. I am sure that the business managers will have heard his plea yet again. We have the opportunity to debate the issues today, and a significant number of Members who have strong views on the subject are here. I hope that we will use the time to promote the agenda rather than bothering about whether this is the right time to have the discussion—I will not go down that route to any great extent.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): Further to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman), the Minister mentioned that the last debate was in 2004, and that the main document sets out targets for 2025. May I suggest that we have an annual debate on the subject to monitor success in meeting those targets, rather than waiting until 2025?

Mrs. McGuire: I am delighted to tell the hon. Gentleman that he will be able to monitor the targets set by the Prime Minister's strategy unit, which has given a commitment to publish an annual report. I am sure that he can highlight the issue of whether we should have an annual debate in the next business questions that he attends.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Does not this opportunity to promote the agenda of disabled people also allow us to promote the agenda of those who look after them? My constituent, Mr. Gary Murphy, has given up his job to look after his two sons full-time, and is extremely concerned that the carer's allowance to which he is entitled is not sufficient to give his sons the care that he wants to provide.

Mrs. McGuire: I hope to deal later with the carer's allowance, which is an issue that individual Members might want to raise. I do not want to go into the details now, but it has never been seen as a wage for carers but as a contribution to carers' income, and it is not the only income support that carers can access. If the hon. Gentleman wants to write to me on the specifics with regard to his constituent, I shall be delighted to respond.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I pay tribute to the Minister for the energy and imagination that she has applied to her role since she has been involved in this area. One group who sometimes feel disempowered because they are not listened to, consulted or involved are those with long-term, disabling, chronic mental health problems. Yes, we have dealt with mental capacity, and that is fine. However, I speak regularly to a consultative group in my constituency, the people's forum, and although it is happy about that provision, it feels that it is not necessarily listened to at the upper levels of government. Are such groups not included in the strategy?

Mrs. McGuire: They are indeed. As my hon. Friend will be aware, when we extended the Disability Discrimination Act, we did so in a way that was sympathetic to the needs of those with mental health conditions. Part of the previous definition said that such conditions had to be well recognised clinically, and we have adjusted that interpretation to ensure that mental health conditions are treated with the respect that they deserve. Some of our efforts in both welfare reform and our benefits system reflect that a significant number of people suffer from long-term mental health conditions, which can impact in a volatile way on everyday life. I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that we have made great progress in working with mental health charities, stakeholders and those with mental heath conditions to ensure that our policies reflect the difficulty of such issues. I also thank him for his compliment at the beginning of his contribution.

We have made a massive cultural change. In many respects, we all now take for granted access ramps, communication aids and accessible toilets, which are at last becoming the norm, not the exception. In today's debate, however, I am sure that we will hear of gaps, and of organisations and businesses that have not taken their responsibilities in relation to such duties seriously.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): There will be gaps and areas in which organisations have not matched rhetoric with reality. One of those areas, which is crucial to carers who look after those with disabilities and long-term conditions, is respite care. The situation with regard to respite care is a disgrace. When will the Government get to grips with the issue rather than just speaking about it?

Mrs. McGuire: With the greatest respect to the hon. Gentleman, I am always suspicious of sweeping statements that respite care is a disgrace. He might want to raise specific issues, but respite care is seen as an important part of the support services given to disabled people and their carers. We continue to try to improve respite care. As he will be aware, however, much respite care is delivered by voluntary organisations and local authorities in partnership.

Mr. Burns: May I allay the Minister's suspicions with specifics? The biggest problem facing people who want respite care is either that they must go on a waiting list to get it, or that they have minimal control over whether they have it at a time suitable to them?

Mrs. McGuire: For every example like that, I am sure that there are examples of respite care provision responding meaningfully to the wishes and aspirations of local families. If the hon. Gentleman can specify examples of major difficulties, however, I shall be delighted to consider them and meet him to discuss them.

We should not underestimate the scale of the challenge that remains in embedding the duties of the Disability Discrimination Act, especially for small businesses, which sometimes wrongly assume that improving access means a complete refit of their premises. The message that I have given to them over the past months, and that I will give again today, is that it is not about a massive building programme. Physical adaptation might be a part of the changes needed, but it might not be appropriate in all circumstances. Small businesses should consider the way in which they deliver their goods and services so that people can access them. That is about adjusting for better business, because it is good for business. We continue to engage in awareness-raising activity with employers and service providers, spending £6 million on publicity for the DDA extension in 2004 to ensure that there are no excuses, while at the same time highlighting the many ways in which employers and service providers can meet their duties under the Act.

However, we were not content simply to implement the original Disability Discrimination Act 1995 fully; we always knew that there was more to do. As I am sure Opposition Members will recall, another feature of the 2004 debate was speculation on whether it was possible to steer a disability Bill through to Royal Assent in the remaining parliamentary time before the general election. We did fulfil our commitment to put a new DDA on the statute book, although I admit that we cut it fine: the Disability Discrimination Act 2005 did not become law until the last day of the previous Parliament, just over 12 months ago.

One of the reasons why we were able to deal with the Bill so quickly was that it had cross-party support. Some may recall that after being appointed Minister for disabled people last May, I wrote to all Members to celebrate the fact that we had managed to pass the Bill in record time, thus meeting our commitment to disabled people.

As many Members will know, from December last year the new Act extended protection to a further 250,000 by covering people with HIV, cancer or multiple sclerosis from the point of diagnosis. People with mental health conditions will also find it easier to show that they are covered by the Act. Progressively, disabled people will have new rights when, for example, sitting exams, using transport services, renting property and joining or using private members' clubs.

But perhaps the key proposal in the new Act is the introduction of the disability equality duty, which will come into force in December. From that date, it will no longer be lawful for public bodies to design services or carry out functions without thinking about how disabled people are affected. Public bodies will have to demonstrate that in everything they do they are considering the impact on disabled people, and that they have due regard to the best ways of eliminating discrimination and promoting equality of opportunity.

I want to stress what I believe to be two important aspects of the duty: the need for public bodies to involve disabled people, and the need for evidence of how their policies affect disabled people. What do organisations need to know in order to promote equality for disabled people? Who are the disabled service users and employees, and how can they be involved ?

I assure the House that this is not just a tick-box exercise. Most public bodies will need to have a disability equality scheme that sets out how they will answer such questions. I am pleased to say that recently published research on public bodies by the Department for Work and Pensions found that most organisations that took part in the survey had a disability equality scheme in place. On the other hand, fewer than half had involved disabled service users or disabled employees in the drawing up of their schemes.

The new duty requires public bodies to involve disabled people in the drawing up of their schemes, as only through real involvement of disabled people will all parts of the public sector be able to identify and address properly the biggest barriers that disabled service users or employees face. We must recognise that if we are to deliver modern services that meet the needs of the whole community, we must ensure that policies, practices and services meet the needs of disabled people from the outset. That is key to getting the disability equality duty right. The duty will require public bodies to assess the impact of their work on disabled people.

Ensuring that our policies and practices work for disabled people will also contribute to our wider aims and objectives. For example, we will not meet our targets on employment or child poverty if we do not take account of the needs of disabled people. The new duties must make us work and do things differently.

We in the Government must also ensure that we meet our obligations under the duty. I am pleased that as part of the current consultation on the welfare reform Green Paper, the Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform has agreed that the Department for Work and Pensions will work with the Disability Rights Commission to develop a "prototype" disability equality impact assessment of our proposals for the reform of incapacity benefit. Along with my ministerial colleagues, I am determined to play my part in making sure that our Government respond positively to the challenge of the equality duty.

We are understandably proud of our record in extending rights, but I hope that this debate will focus mainly on our plans for tackling the challenges that lie ahead. As we all know, disabled people are more likely to live in poverty, to be out of work and to have fewer educational qualifications than the population in general. They are also more likely to experience prejudice and abuse than non-disabled people. We know that it takes more than legislation to change the lives of real people, and we are not prepared to sit back and see such inequality go unchallenged. That is why the Prime Minister, in his strategy unit report, referred to the challenge of identifying practical changes to help bring about equality for disabled people.

Three main themes emerged when the report was published in January 2005. It found that users were too often expected to manage their lives around public services rather than providers' designing services to meet the needs of disabled people themselves, and that public services and support were planned and delivered in organisational silos that simply failed to reflect the complexity of real people's lives. Our lives are not organised to reflect the current organisational profile of Government at either national or local level, and we need to challenge that. The report also found that service providers rarely involved users in the design of public services. How can we ever get the design of services for disabled people right without involving the people who know best what needs to be delivered?

At the heart of the strategy unit report was the belief that disabled people should be entitled to the same aspirations and expectations as those in the population at large. It contained 60 recommendations on how to achieve that across a range of areas, from early years education and support to employment and adult social care. I believe that the Government have grasped that agenda, and as a Minister I consider it a great privilege to be responsible for driving forward a cross-Government strategy to transform the lives of disabled people.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend say something about social care workers who devote themselves to helping people with disabilities? All too often, sadly, people working in social care are poorly paid and poorly trained. We need to raise the profile of social workers, care workers and those who work transporting people with disabilities, so that we can recruit high-quality people and ensure that they are properly trained, and it becomes a real career option to do an invaluable job.

Mrs. McGuire: My hon. Friend makes a good point. As one who, in a previous existence, had some experience of work in the sector, I understand what she means. We need to look differently at how we deliver services. I hope that my hon. Friend is among the many who welcomed the launch of the new cross-Government unit, the Office for Disability Issues, which will bring together disabled people, Departments and service providers to deliver a real, significant and sustainable change.

We are determined to transform the way in which the Government engage with disabled people. The ODI will bring the voices of disabled people to the heart of Government through the creation of a national forum for disabled people. The advisory group that was established to help us establish the national forum has been working hard to assist us in developing the way forward, and already the ODI is bringing Departments together to improve services for disabled people.

Most obviously, such co-operation is bearing fruit in the individual budget pilots operating in several parts of the country. The pilots bring together a range of different support services for disabled people, including housing-related and other support for independent living. We all know that the current system for delivering such support can be bewildering, involving as it does several different funding streams and administrative bodies. The end result is often that people are left with little control over the services that they receive—a point to which the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) referred in the context of respite care—and how they are delivered. That, in turn, can lead to uncertainty, anxiety and sometimes isolation, presenting a barrier to, rather than enabling, independent living. Building on the success achieved through the direct payments scheme, the new pilots are intended to overcome these problems by bringing together different elements of support and putting the ability to choose how those services are delivered into the hands of disabled people themselves.

The strategy unit report also recognised that for disabled young people, the transition to adulthood is often a very difficult time. A multi-agency approach, in which young people and their families are at the centre, is the way forward. I am pleased to say that we have seen some good results from the 70 local authorities adopting a person-centred approach to transition planning. We are also examining the transition period in three of the individual budget pilot schemes—in Coventry, Barnsley and Gateshead—to see how such an approach can support young people as they move into adulthood. It is crucial that we get this issue right, because the transition to adulthood can be the most challenging time for disabled young people and their families. We need to ensure that our services are more joined up than they currently are. Many young adults and their parents have told me that they feel as if they are standing on a cliff edge—that they do not know what is going to happen as they move into adulthood. We need to pull together and to get our approach right, so that they do not feel that they are standing on a cliff edge, with no support as they grow older.

Finally, I think it appropriate briefly to touch on the welfare reform proposals that we set out earlier this year in the Green Paper, "Empowering People to Work", which has been welcomed by the disability lobby. Such a welcome is justified, as our starting point is that many disabled people want to work, and would do so if the right opportunities and support were in place. We estimate that some 85 to 90 per cent. of the 2.7 million people claiming an incapacity benefit meet the core definition of disability in the DDA. Those figures perhaps help to demonstrate why the employment rate of this group is less than 50 per cent., at a time when record numbers are in work.

We have set out clearly our ambitions in the Green Paper. We want to see 1 million fewer people claiming an incapacity benefit, and more older people and lone parents enjoying the benefits of work. That will put us on course to reach our aspiration of getting 80 per cent. of working-age people into a job. We believe that that goal is within our grasp; indeed, we have already achieved a lot. The new deal for disabled people has helped nearly 300,000 disabled people into work—I shall be interested to hear whether the Opposition will continue to support the new deal's approach—and we will continue to build on the very positive lessons learned from our pathways to work pilots.

The pathways to work pilots involve early and intensive support from a specially trained personal adviser—supported by health specialists, where appropriate—and provide access to a help menu designed to prepare people for work. Combined with the new deal and programmes such as access to work, the pilots have led to the first significant fall in the incapacity benefit case load in more than a generation. As part of our reforms, we will roll out this highly successful scheme across the whole country, so that all disabled people claiming an incapacity benefit can benefit from extra help and support.

I have set out this afternoon a hugely ambitious agenda that is central to our goal of an equal society with opportunity for all. We are transforming the way in which the Government respond to the needs of disabled people, and driving changes in the wider society to create a culture in which disabled people have choice and control over their lives. We are nearly 18 months into the 20-year strategy, and we will shortly publish and present to the Prime Minister the inaugural annual progress report, which will provide an honest assessment of the situation and enable everyone to judge whether we are achieving our aims. The life chances report was widely welcomed by disabled people; I am sure that they expect nothing less.

I believe that people will look at the progress that we have made and see that this Government have been true to our word. We have overseen the largest extension of disability rights in history, but we refuse to rest on our laurels. I genuinely welcome the official Opposition's change in attitude, and I know that certain individual Conservatives always supported this agenda. But I hope that the change in their official heart will prove to be about more than fine words, which are always easy to come up with. They have a lot to live down in this respect.

We are delivering on a strategy to improve the life chances of disabled people, but we still have a long way to go in changing society's attitudes. We still have to challenge the view that sees what disabled people cannot do, rather than what they can do. We have to change the perception that fails to value the ambitions and aspirations of disabled people. However, we have come a long way in a few short years, and in recent months we have had the support of other parties in this House, for which I am grateful. I am pleased to commend our record to the House.

Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): I begin by welcoming the Minister to the Dispatch Box for what I believe is her first major debate on disability since taking on her new role. She was kind enough to welcome me to the Dispatch Box during oral questions on 13 March, and it is a pleasure to return the compliment.

Today, I want to talk about a new Conservative approach to disability that builds on the legislative progress made through the efforts of those in all parts of the House, but which also recognises that the challenges that disabled people face today are different from those of 10 or 20 years ago. The life chances report talks about allowing disabled people to be respected and included as equal members of society by 2025. That seems a long way off, but the reality is that we have a huge mountain to climb to achieve that goal. The challenge for policy makers is to ensure that the progress on the path towards that goal is both steady and speedy.

Before I talk about the new approach, I want to take the opportunity to pay tribute to some of my predecessors in this post, who have given me enormous support and encouragement. My hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman), who held this post until the general election, was enormously respected in the disability world for his grasp of policy detail. He undertook a detailed consultation of disability groups before the enactment of the Disability Discrimination Act 2005. Such consultation has provided extremely useful information that helped to form our thinking. I welcomed his intervention on the Minister concerning the timing of these debates; it would be good to have a disability debate on a day when more Members are able to attend.

On the subject of elections, why were 68 per cent. of polling stations inaccessible to disabled people during last year's general election? Some Members might think that the advent of postal voting means that such access is not necessary, but it is very important for blind and visually impaired people to have access to a Braille reader when voting. Such readers can be provided in polling stations; postal voting, on the other hand, does not solve the problem.

I want also to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), who held this post before taking a different Front-Bench role. I am delighted that he has kindly spared the time to wind up this debate. He has a deep understanding of the complexity of disability issues, and enormous personal commitment to the disability agenda.

I thank the Minister for her comments. On the whole, they were more positive than those made by her predecessor in the 2004 debate. There has been much legislative progress on disability issues, and I am happy to commend that to the House.

[Mr. Jeremy Hunt]

For example, the Carers and Disabled Children Act 2000 allowed direct payments to be made to families. The Disability Rights Commission has been established, and it has done a great deal to campaign for disabled people's rights. The Special Education Needs and Disability Act 2001 made it unlawful to discriminate against disabled children seeking access to schools, and regulations introduced in 2003 made it easier for disabled people to get more choice in employment. In addition, we have had the Disability Discrimination Act 2005 and the establishment of the Office for Disability Issues.

The Opposition are prepared to give credit where it is due, but I hope that the Minister will also give full credit to the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. I was disappointed that she chose to describe it as a missed opportunity. That Act, piloted through the House by my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), gave disabled people entitlement to civil rights for the first time, and made it unlawful to discriminate against disabled people in employment and in the provision of goods, facilities and services. It contained some limited but important education and transport provisions, which included the requirement that all stations and airports should be accessible, and also set up the National Disability Council, the precursor to the DRC.

The 1995 Act was

"the most important discrimination legislation in a generation."

Those are not my words, but those of the Equal Opportunities Review, which is hardly a Conservative-leaning journal. The Japanese have a saying that a journey of 1,000 miles starts with one step, and the 1995 Act was that first step.

Mrs. McGuire: The hon. Gentleman identifies that proverb as Japanese, whereas I thought that it was Chinese, but for the record I remind him that I said that the 1995 Act was a small step on the right road. That shows that we agree about that legislation.

Mr. Hunt: I am delighted to hear that clarification. The Minister's tone, both just now and earlier in the debate, is considerably different from the one that I have heard adopted on other occasions, by her and other Ministers. However, my point is that we are still very much at the start of the journey, even after all that legislation.

For example, Martine Wright is the remarkably brave woman who lost both her legs above the knees in the 7/7 bombings. Only two weeks ago, she said that her anger was directed more at the Government than the bomber, because of the poor levels of compensation that she had been offered. That lady lost 75 per cent. of her blood in the attack. She was in the Douglas Bader unit of Queen Mary's hospital for nine months, and now fears that the cost of being disabled will mean that she can no longer afford to live in London.

Martine Wright's involvement in the London bombing gave her a high profile, but there are nearly 1 million people in wheelchairs in this country. That means that every hon. Member has constituents who are being driven into poverty by disability.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): I do not want to minimise the devastating impact that losing her legs in the London bombing will have had on that young woman, but the vast majority of disabled people are not looking for compensation or for someone to blame. They just want to make sure that the facilities are in place that will allow them to get on with their lives. A person born with a disability has no one to sue and cannot claim extra compensation. Sometimes the sort of argument being presented by the hon. Gentleman can be false, as it is not the reality for most disabled people.

Mr. Hunt: I am grateful for that intervention. The hon. Lady is respected enormously in this House for her contributions to disability debates. My point is that Martine Wright was angry about the compensation levels offered to her because she has a mortgage on a flat in London. After suffering her disability, she has been unable to work and is having to consider moving out of London. She does not want someone to sue: she wants to be able to lead her life independently, as well as she can, and I am sure that hon. Members of all parties will agree with that. I am not making a party political point when I say that we have a long way to go before we are able to give people the independent opportunities that they seek.

Mr. Ellwood: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a difference between people who are disabled in a terrorist act, for example, and those who gain their disability in a different manner? I have met people who were involved in the Bali bombings and in the London incident of 7/7, and my experience is that the criminal injuries compensation scheme is very slow. The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg) is right that disabled people are not looking for someone to blame, but they do want some compensation so that they can get on with their lives. Some people hurt on 7/7 are still waiting for help with prosthesis, which is not cheap. They are not getting the support from the Government in the timely fashion that they deserve.

Mr. Hunt: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point. Regardless of the party to which they belong, all hon. Members want to help people with a disability, whether they are born with it or acquire it, so that they can lead an independent life as far as possible. The slowness of compensation is one of the issues that must be addressed if that is to happen.

I return to the broader question of disability and poverty. The Minister and many hon. Members will know that the Joseph Rowntree Foundation carried out an excellent study in 2004 that looked at the link between disability and poverty. It found that, even after all the additional benefits that disabled people get, the costs of being disabled can often amount to an extra £200 per week. It is no wonder that the proportion of disabled people living in income poverty has risen from 27 to 30 per cent. over the past 10 years, whereas the proportions of children and pensioners living in income poverty are going down.

Progress has to be made in other respects as well. In 2006, why do disabled people and their families often have to battle so hard to get the drugs that they need? In particular, people suffering from multiple sclerosis find it enormously difficult to get hold of Sativex, with totally conflicting signals coming from the Department of Health and the Home Office. If they live in Staffordshire, Sheffield or Wales, they will also find it difficult to get beta interferon, the crucial drug that can prolong active life if taken in the early stages of the disease.

Another problem is the abuse of people with learning disabilities in care homes. Just this month, in the journal Disability Now, there is a story about a man who was abused in two separate care homes in London in 2003 and 2004. Those abuses happened 10 years after the same man was in the headlines for being assaulted and neglected in the Longeve home in Buckinghamshire. Such people have a right to expect the Government, regardless of which party is in power, to take more action to prevent that sort of abuse.

I stress that the Opposition do not put the blame for all issues facing disabled people at the Government's door. Tackling discrimination is a challenge for any Government, and we recognise that good intentions in that respect have come from all sides of the House. Lord Morris of Manchester, the first Minister for Disabled People and a noted campaigner on disability issues, said that tackling discrimination needs a combination of legislation and practical action. It is in practical action, rather than legislation, that the Government have neglected two vital elements of their role.

The first element has to do with the Government's role as a major employer. With 1.3 million people in the NHS alone, the Government have a fantastic opportunity to set an example, yet some Pathways advisers say that it is much easier to place disabled people in jobs in the private sector than in the public sector, as public sector organisations can be less flexible about making reasonable adjustments. According to the Cabinet Office public appointments unit, although 19 per cent. of people of working age were disabled in 2004, only 3.5 per cent. of the appointments made to the boards of public bodies were of disabled people.

I should like the Government also to look at their crucial role as a deliverer of services to disabled people. Often, the appalling bureaucracy and waste in social service delivery in particular have meant that many disabled people and their families have not received the services that they need. According to a Mencap survey, to which I referred in the House in Work and Pensions questions on 30 March, 48 per cent. of parents of severely disabled children receive no help from social services, 30 per cent. receive less than two hours help a week and 37 per cent. have to deal with eight or more different professionals. A quarter of the money assigned to help parents of severely disabled children is lost in so-called assessment and commissioning. In other words, it does not reach the pockets of the families who need it. I stress that those are not problems concerning the Government's good intentions, but if we are to deliver independent living to disabled people and to keep the promise of life chances, action must match oratory and results must match rhetoric.

Let me outline the Conservative approach to the disability agenda. This summer we shall hold five policy seminars with groups representing disabled people to listen to what they believe should be the basis of the policy. We shall test all policy recommendations against four fundamental questions. First, does a policy help disabled people live as equal and respected members of society? Secondly, does a policy help disabled people overcome the barriers that prevent them from living independently? Thirdly, does a policy help disabled people make their own contribution to society, whether in a voluntary or paid capacity? Fourthly, does a policy help, support and value the role of families and carers of disabled people?

The goal set in the first question is the objective of the life chances report and must be at the heart of disabled policy making. We can see from the progress in changing attitudes towards women and ethnic minorities that there is a big time lag between passing legislation, for example the first Race Relations Act was in 1965, and the Equal Pay Act was in 1970, and changing attitudes. We are right at the start of that journey for disabled people. At present, 38 per cent. of employers say that they would not take on someone with a disability. In the case of someone with a mental disability, that number rises to 63 per cent. That kind of discrimination against ethnic minorities, gays or women would be unthinkable, but it is a fact of life for 10 million disabled people. Equality of esteem for disabled people means tackling the deep-seated prejudice held by many people that disabled people are inferior. The social model of disability requires tackling disablism by changing attitudes as well as dismantling the physical barriers that prevent disabled people from getting around.

On the second question that I posed, I am new to this brief but in the short time that I have held it, it has become clear to me that what disabled people want for their lives is no different from what everyone wants for their life: the chance to make choices over their future, to control their destiny, to make the most of their talents and to make a contribution to society. We have a huge mountain to climb if we are to achieve independent living for disabled people. Given that the Disability Discrimination Act 2005 did not cover aviation and shipping, when will the Government come forward with policies to address the fact that three quarters of disabled people never use ferries and two thirds never fly? Why are disabled people often treated as second-class citizens in our hospitals? Why are social services, upon which disabled people depend so much if they are to live independently, so burdened with bureaucracy? The regulatory regime for social services means that social service departments have to prepare reports for the Commission for Social Care Inspection, delivery and improvement standards reports, 26 performance assessment frameworks, including key thresholds—whatever they are—best-value performance indicators for the Audit Commission, comprehensive performance assessments, referrals assessments and packages of care reports for the Department of Health. How can anyone possibly expect social services to concentrate on delivering good services for their disabled clients when their heads must be spinning with all the reports they must write?

Policies on independent living also need to look at housing policy. According to the charity John Grooms, 20 per cent. of physically disabled people are living in a house that they find difficult to move around in, 24 per cent. live in a house from where it is difficult to access shops and a quarter of disabled people who need adapted accommodation do not have it.

[Mr. Hunt]

I turn now to the third question I asked. On Tuesday I visited Action for Blind People, a remarkable organisation that helps blind and visually impaired people take the first steps towards independence by setting up their own business. Remarkably, one visually impaired person was setting up a catering business, another was setting up a scanning business and someone else was setting up an office supplies business. Despite this excellent work, there is a huge range of disincentives that stop disabled people engaging in the world of work. Only some of those are dealt with in the incapacity benefit reform Green Paper. For example, a disabled person can trigger a personal capability assessment that could threaten their disability living allowance if they do voluntary or part-time work, or go on a training course. Yet for many people who become disabled and have to stop work—

Mrs. McGuire: For the sake of accuracy, would the hon. Gentleman repeat that statement? I fear that he may have misunderstood the criteria of DLA and I certainly would not wish disabled people throughout the country to believe that somehow they are putting their DLA at risk because of the impression that he may just have given.

Mr. Hunt: I accept what the Minister says. The point I raised was made to me by a disabled person. There is a big communications problem and a great fear of personal capability assessments.

Mrs. McGuire: May I make it perfectly clear that disability living allowance is not income assessed? Many disabled people who are in full-time work have their full entitlement to DLA. It does not relate in any way whatsoever to other income. I would hope that the hon. Gentleman, as the shadow spokesman on disability, would ensure that the person to whom he spoke was appraised of that situation.

Mr. Hunt: I return to my previous point, which is that there is a great deal of concern among disabled people that, for example, if they go on a training course or do some part-time work, they might be assessed as less in need of their DLA than was previously thought. There is a huge communications problem. As the Minister is intricately involved in the reforms proposed in the incapacity benefit Green Paper, may I say to her that there is a huge problem because disabled people are concerned that anything they might do involved with part-time or voluntary work or education could compromise the benefits that they want to receive. For many disabled people it is such part-time work, attendance on a training course, or some kind of education that is the crucial first step back towards involving themselves in the world of work. They are often disincentivised from taking that first step.

Mrs. McGuire: For the sake of clarity—I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands why I am making an issue of this—there is absolutely no impact on DLA entitlement from somebody working full-time, doing voluntary work or doing no work. DLA is not income assessed. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not confusing two benefits, namely incapacity benefit and disability living allowance. While we in Government need to be clear about our messages, he too needs to be clear and not confuse the two to make a political point in this debate.

Mr. Hunt: I am not confused and I am not making a political point. I am perfectly aware that DLA is not income-assessed, but I am trying to explain to the Minister that many disabled people are concerned that their DLA could be affected. This is an important point. We need to do more than reform incapacity benefit; we need to look much more widely at benefits across the board, to make sure that nothing in the structures has the unintended effect of deterring people from the world of work, whether part-time or voluntary.

Communications also need to be greatly strengthened in respect of access to work. Many people are not aware of the benefits available and do not know what help they could receive to get back into the world of work. Furthermore, many social services are offered only during normal working hours, which makes it difficult for people to use them while holding down a full or part-time job. Disincentives to work are the root cause of the link between disability and poverty and the Conservatives are determined to dismantle them.

The final question against which we shall judge new policies is whether a policy helps to support and value the role of the families and carers of disabled people. One in eight of the population is a carer; 1.25 million of them look after someone for more than 50 hours a week and 10 per cent. are themselves disabled, yet the system often completely fails to support carers as it should.

We should be considering streamlined systems such as the one in Austria, which I have raised with the Minister before, where families of severely disabled children are looked after by single assessment teams, comprising a paediatric doctor, a nurse, a physiotherapist and an information officer. We should be looking at streamlining the benefits system, which is neither simple to understand nor generous to carers, even though those involved in carers week estimated that carers save the state £57 billion annually.

We are proud to live in a free society where we try to value people by the merits of what they are prepared to contribute, and not by accidents of birth, class or privilege, but 10 million disabled people have been left out of the deal. It is time to put that right, not just by legislation and fine words, but by a fundamental overhaul of the way services are provided to disabled people, to help them to live independently, work freely and contribute to a society that has neglected them for too long.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to follow the hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt), who spoke for the official Opposition, and I wish him well in his new responsibilities. We can look forward to some interesting exchanges, not least because my hon. Friend the Minister is determined to make sure that the hon. Gentleman does not mislead people about their basic rights in relation to disability living allowance and other benefits. However, I genuinely wish him well. It is an important brief and we can conclude from his contribution today that he is very much on-message with his new leader, as they re-assess all their policies and make very different proposals from those of the past.

Many Members in the Chamber have a track record of tremendous experience and knowledge of the important subject of policies for the disabled. I have a few remarks about disabled people in the Edinburgh, East constituency, which I have had the privilege to represent for quite a few years.

I support the Prime Minister's strategy unit report, "Improving the Life Chances of Disabled People", published in January 2005 and to which my hon. Friend referred. The report establishes an ambitious 20-year vision, stating:

"By 2025, disabled people in Britain should have full opportunities and choices to improve their quality of life, and will be respected and included as equal members of society."

That is a big challenge, but the whole House should be prepared to sign up to it, not least because, according to the report, 11 million adults are rightly classified as disabled and there is also a large number of disabled children.

The centrepiece of the Government's strategy, as others in the Chamber know better than I do, is the promotion of independent living. Some Members will remember Margaret Blackwood, who set up the Disablement Income Group Scotland, of which I am privileged to be a patron. In Edinburgh, the Margaret Blackwood housing association specialises in the provision of housing to meet the needs of disabled people. The association makes an important contribution and is a fitting memorial to Margaret Blackwood. As the House knows, the Edinburgh economy is a dynamo for the whole south-east Scotland travel-to-work area, but a problem of that economic success is a shortage of affordable housing.

We need to tackle the barriers to employment for disabled people. We can all support the Government's emphasis in recent years on creating a society that provides maximum opportunities for disabled people to work in the wider economy—in workplaces in private businesses, the public sector and elsewhere.

The National Employment Panel's employers working group on disability published a report, "Able to Work", in January 2005, at the same time as the strategy unit document. The report noted:

"Fifty percent of working age disabled people are economically inactive—neither working nor actively seeking work—compared with just 15% of non-disabled people. Given that almost 20% of the UK's working age population are disabled, this represents a wasted opportunity on an enormous scale—for disabled people themselves, for employers and for the UK economy."

There can be no doubt about the importance of such opportunities, primarily for disabled people, because we want people to be able to make choices in society, but also for the collective good of the economy and society as a whole. We must do more to ensure that disabled people have the chance to work, to earn an income and develop their independence.

Many disabled people are prevented from making an effective contribution to their local community and economy, yet with support they can actively take part. Disabled people represent a significant pool of potential skills and abilities.

I want to focus on sheltered workshops. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will not mind my mentioning her family connection, as her father, Councillor Albert Long, is still remembered for his contribution to BlindCraft in Glasgow and Strathclyde. She will be interested in our experience over recent years at the BlindCraft factory, a sheltered workshop in my constituency.

A few years ago, it became clear that there was a crisis in the workshop, which was losing a lot of money. For example, in 2002–03, City of Edinburgh council had budgeted for a deficit of £75,000. In fact, the deficit was more than £1 million. The following year, the deficit was more than £800,000. Quite clearly, those losses were too large to be sustainable and action had to be taken. It was against that background that the council embarked on a strategic review. It was a time of considerable difficulty.

People in the workshop were understandably concerned about their futures being jeopardised. One thing that I have learned from our workshop is that, although there are many people who are able to work in the broader labour market—we want to give them the maximum encouragement—there are also people who need the shelter of a workshop and who can make a great contribution to their own lives and to society as a whole within the framework of that supported work in the BlindCraft factory in Craigmillar in my constituency.

As a constituency MP, I was involved in a series of meetings with the council, Councillor Kingsley Thomas, the administration's lead councillor on social work, senior officials and Joe Mann, who is a senior trade union official from the union Community. I do not want to make too much of this, but I had three aims and concerns. First, we wanted an inquiry into what had gone wrong—things had gone badly wrong for reasons that I will not go into. Secondly, we needed a new general manager. Thirdly, we were concerned that the strategy of closing the wire side and just relying on bedding was high risk.

To cut a long story short, the City of Edinburgh council has chosen to proceed on the basis of the bedding and the separate metal department, which does not include the old wire section. That section was important, because some of the most disabled people were able to work there. Of course, there have been job losses—a disproportionate number of which have been among the disabled as opposed to the able-bodied.

I am pleased to say that we have a new general manager in place and I was able to speak to him this week. He has come from the private sector, and he must be given the opportunity to turn the business round and generate a profit. I know that he is concerned about the competition between the different BlindCraft factories in Scotland. He believes that, particularly in the case of beds, if the margins are driven down further, we shall not get the profit that we need and we shall be unable to reduce the overall deficit, although some progress has been made in that respect. Above all—this is the real worry—the cost per individual worker in the plant will be too high. He faces a big challenge, but I am encouraged by what he is saying. He is making an important point. He also has some important ideas about other activities that we can develop within the framework of the workshop to provide employment and an opportunity for the people concerned.

[Dr. Gavin Strang]

I know that many Members want to speak in the debate, so I will make just one final point. The problem is that the workshop is not just for Edinburgh, but for the local authority areas around it. Sadly, there is no agreement about the contribution that those local authorities have to make. I do not want to go into that in great detail, but the fact is that local authorities, which provide people for the sheltered workshop, must pay their share. The disagreement about their contribution has to be resolved. We must have a framework in which we have an opportunity to make a success of the workshop. In my opinion, there are not enough disabled people working there at the moment, because the numbers have been reduced to reduce the overall deficit. The effect of that is that the subsidy per disabled person is too high.

I look forward to making real progress. I welcome my hon. Friend the Minister to her responsibilities, although she has held the post for some time now. I know that we can count on her support to help us to make the progress that we need, because we are talking about a great asset and an important element in the overall framework that the Government want in order to encourage more disabled people to live full lives in the workplace.

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the distinguished contribution from the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang). The issue that he raised is common to a number of constituencies. There are similar facilities in Inverness. Many of the problems that he described will be familiar to other hon. Members.

I welcome the opportunity to hold this debate. The Minister was right to say in opening that there has been a great deal of cross-party consensus on the issues that we are debating—[Interruption.] Recently. Over a longer time scale, the Liberal Democrat party has played a role in seeing a way forward on a number of different disability issues, so it is good to have the chance to debate the matter. However, I reinforce the point that was made earlier from those on the Conservative Back Benches that it is perhaps a shame that this debate is taking place on local election day, when many hon. Members on both sides of the House cannot, for various reasons, be present. If the debate becomes an annual feature of the parliamentary calendar, as I hope it will, perhaps in future it could coincide with the publication of the annual report. It could become a regular feature—held on a day when more hon. Members could attend and take part.

After all, according to some definitions—the life chances report makes this clear—there are 11 million disabled people in this country. To put that in context, that could be more than the total number of people who will vote in the local elections today. We are talking about a tremendously important part of the population and therefore a big issue for all MPs—not just those of us who happen to be present today—and their constituents. Many issues affect the life chances of disabled people and they cut across a number of different portfolios. There are many points that I would like to cover today, but I will not have time.

There are a few issues that I would like to draw out from the strategy unit report. The Liberal Democrats welcome the report and particularly its focus on independent living, families with young disabled children, the transition into adulthood and support and incentives for getting disabled people into employment and helping them to stay there. We also welcome the Government's acceptance of the recommendations in the report.

Importantly, the report is not based on a medical or impairment-based definition of disability. Although it does not explicitly state that it is adopting the social model of disability, its focus on the disadvantages that individuals experience as a result of barriers, both physical and attitudinal, is quite close to the social model. I hope that the Government will continue to develop that approach.

Before getting to the main issues that I want to address, I should say that, earlier this year, I put a question to all the Departments asking whether they had already nominated a Minister to liaise with the Office for Disability Issues, the establishment of which I warmly welcome. The life chances report was clear that several of its recommendations were for all Departments and not just, for example, for the Department for Work and Pensions. I was pleased that nearly all the Departments responded positively. However—I hope that the Minister will take this point up with her colleagues—there are four that I would like to name and shame, if I can use that phrase. They have not, as yet, appointed a Minister to liaise with the Office for Disability Issues. Those Departments are: the Department for International Development, the Cabinet Office, the Northern Ireland Office and, last but not least, the Treasury. Perhaps the Secretary of State could ask his Cabinet colleagues in those Departments to fall into line with other Departments and appoint a Minister with responsibility for these issues.

The life chances report emphasises the interlinked issues of poverty and work. The clearest indication that disabled people do not have the same life chances as the rest of society is the extent of the poverty among them. Child poverty and pensioner poverty are decreasing—perhaps not as fast as some of us would like—but poverty among disabled people is still high and rising in some categories.

Some 55 per cent. of families with disabled children are either in poverty or at its margins, and 30 per cent. of working-age disabled adults live in income poverty—higher than the 27 per cent. figure of a decade ago and double the rate for non-disabled adults. Some 13 per cent. of working-age adults are judged to be at risk of developing a mental illness, but the figure is almost twice as high for the poorest fifth of the population at 25 per cent. About 800,000 disabled people between the age of 25 and retirement age are classed as economically inactive but wanting work, compared with only 200,000 who are officially counted as unemployed.

Addressing the barriers to work is therefore absolutely key to tackling poverty among disabled people. Indeed, the life chances report makes that very clear in a table on the employment growth needed to reach the current UK employment rate, and by far the greatest employment growth is needed for disabled people—1.7 million is the figure given—to reach the overall employment level for the country of any of the groups highlighted in the report. With that in mind, I should like to turn to welfare reform.

The hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt), the Conservative spokesman, explained the need to communicate clearly information about such issues, but we all have a responsibility to communicate clearly about the benefits that exist, so that no hon. Member reinforces whatever confusion may exist in people's minds and may be reinforced occasionally either by things that the Government say or by the way in which newspapers pick up on things that they say.

The welfare reform Green Paper is obviously welcome, although it perhaps took a little longer to reach us than we had hoped, and there is still a problem in that it is short on detail in many respects, particularly in relation to the action that needs to be taken to help not only people on incapacity benefit to get back into work but, equally important, those people who suffered a disabling event to stay in work, rather than losing their jobs and moving on to benefits.

All the evidence shows that people are much less likely to find work once they go on to incapacity benefit, whereas retaining people in employment should be the primary objective. In that context, I hope that the Minister will seriously consider the proposal for rehabilitation leave, which was recently made in a ten-minute Bill, as a way of making it explicit in law what is already thought to be a reasonable adjustment under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995.

Making it clear in law that there was a entitlement to rehabilitation leave for people in the circumstances that I have described would make it a good deal easier for people to assert their rights, rather than expecting people to have a detailed knowledge of the 1995 Act and what might constitute a reasonable adjustment in various circumstances. Likewise, access to condition management programmes for people who are still in work but perhaps having a period of rehabilitation leave, as opposed to only being able to gain access to such programmes when they have already lost their jobs or are on incapacity benefit, would be a valuable step forward.

I should also like to ask about the overall target in the welfare and reform proposals. Again, the Minister made it clear in her opening remarks that the target was to get 1 million people off incapacity benefit over the next 10 years. There is a subtle but important distinction between targeting getting people off benefits and targeting getting people into work. Over the next 10 years, almost 1 million people who currently receive incapacity benefit will reach retirement age and therefore be entitled to claim pension. Of course, the Minister will no doubt rightly point out that many more people will be flowing on to benefits.

Mrs. McGuire: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman. Yes, our aim is to get 1 million people off incapacity benefits, but it is also to reach our aspiration of having 80 per cent. of working-age people in employment—the two go side by side.

Danny Alexander: I am grateful for that sensible and well-made point, but it is also true that the targets expressed in the welfare reform Green Paper have often been reported in the media as getting 1 million people who are on incapacity benefit into work, and it is important to be clear about that distinction.

One of the issues in the welfare reform Green Paper that needs to be further developed from what the Government have so far proposed relates to the radical reform that is needed in the benefits system as it affects disabled people. The system is too complicated. The difference between incapacity benefit and jobseeker's allowance is at least in part a recognition of the fact that people on incapacity benefit are suffering from disability or ill-health conditions whereby they are likely to be out of the labour market for a substantial period. Therefore, to some degree, within the operation of incapacity benefit, there is a link between the proportion of support that they receive for being out of work and the fact that they are disabled. That question needs to be looked at in much greater detail in future.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman says that incapacity benefit is different from jobseeker's allowance and that that indicates the claimant's desire to get back into work, so does he feel that people on jobseeker's allowance have no desire to get back into work?

Danny Alexander: No, quite the reverse. In fact, one of the principal distinctions between incapacity benefit and jobseeker's allowance is that the latter makes it mandatory for benefit recipients to engage in back-to-work activity and actively seek work, whereas those obligations do not apply to incapacity benefit recipients at the moment, although the Green Paper, which is slightly fuzzy on the detail, suggests perhaps a slight change in that direction. No doubt, we will see more of that when such a Bill is introduced in due course.

The principal issue that I should like to raise in relation to the extent to which the Government's welfare reform proposals can succeed in helping to deliver the objectives of the life chances report of getting people with disabilities back into employment is the resources that are available to extend the pathways to work scheme across the whole country. The £360 million that has been allocated in the Green Paper is simply not enough, compared with the costs of the pilot schemes. I am very concerned that the roll-out might lead to a sort of "pathways-lite".

The Government's estimated cost of £400 per claimant suggests that £440 million will be needed over two years, but the Government's estimate of £360 million does not include either the cost of the back to work credit or condition management programme. We have heard several other estimates of the cost of rolling out pathways from a number of non-governmental organisations. They all suggest that the figure that the Government specify in the Green Paper is not nearly enough. The figure is, frankly, hard to estimate, because of the poor quality of information available from the Government on the cost of pathways, but the estimates that I have seen from a number of organisations all have one thing in common: they suggest that £360 million is not nearly enough for the comprehensive support programme that we would all like to see.

I hope that the Minister will address a further point in her concluding remarks. It is suggested that the £360 million that has been allocated will come from existing resources, so I should be interested to know when we will find out from which existing resources that sum will be diverted to deliver pathways to work.

Condition management is a very popular and successful part of the programme, but it relies particularly on a supply of properly qualified professionals—such as cognitive behavioural therapists, for example—yet we do not have enough people in those categories and they can take up to five years to train. Likewise, high-quality employment advisers are also needed.

The Green Paper also considers the separation of welfare to work support from benefit decision making, particularly through the use of more private and voluntary sector contractors to deliver back to work help. That is a welcome move forward. I am sure that all hon. Members have examples of organisations that are effectively delivering back to work help in our constituencies. In Inverness, for example, there is an organisation called the SHIRLIE Project, which is very successful, particularly in enabling people with learning disabilities to get back into work. It has an astonishingly high success rate, and it has been able to draw on support from various Government bodies to deliver a flexible programme. Making more use of such organisations makes a great deal of sense. The Green Paper does not deal with the specification of contracts, but that is important if those organisations are to deliver help effectively, giving providers the time scale, flexibility and stable financial footing that they need.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): As my hon. Friend knows, my background is in dealing with visual impairment. Does he agree that just as important as getting people back to work is maintaining them in work, particularly in the case of progressive illnesses or late-onset conditions? Investing in initiatives to enable people to continue to do the work for which they are trained and in which they have expertise, irrespective of a disability that may otherwise hinder them, is money well spent.

Danny Alexander: I could not agree more, and my hon. Friend has anticipated my next subject.

Genuine support for employers and employees so that people can remain in work is an essential part of any policy framework to deliver the objective of the life chances report by 2025. The access-to-work scheme, on which the Minister and I have had exchanges before, is very valuable indeed, and it is one of the Government's great unsung success stories. If I were her, I would be shouting that success from the rooftops and promoting it to businesses large and small. However, 80 per cent. of smaller businesses do not know anything about it. I therefore urge her to go around the country and get on her soapbox to promote it. According to a parliamentary answer, its net benefit to the Exchequer is £1,400 and the net benefit to the economy after costs is £3,000 per person helped. Employers who employ individuals who have been awarded access-to-work credits can make adjustments to enable them to remain in work, which is particularly valuable in the case of people who experience a disabling event or who have a visual impairment. I congratulate the Government on the scheme, but we need to hear more about it.

There was a gap in the Green Paper on disability awareness among employers. When will the Government publish an employer engagement strategy to encourage businesses and companies in the private sector better to understand the issues and adopt the right attitude to the employment of disabled people?

Mr. McGovern: Is the hon. Gentleman aware of Remploy, which not only provides supported employment in the workplace, but helps to place disabled employees in full-time mainstream employment?

Danny Alexander: I certainly am. The hon. Gentleman has characterised its work very fairly, and it plays an important role. In the Easter recess, I was delighted to have the opportunity to visit the Working Links "Working in Neighbourhoods" project in Parkhead in Glasgow. Part of its success stems from the fact that it works closely with employers. Not only does it place people in work, but it continues to work with employers after they have been employed so that if problems arise there is a three-way discussion. That helps to prevent the problem of someone starting work, encountering difficulties and being thrown out of their job, perhaps leaving them even further behind than they were when they started work. Such initiatives should therefore be valued and promoted.

The Minister mentioned the duty to promote. Will the Government encourage more public sector bodies to attain the Employers Forum on Disability standard so that there is a better understanding in the public sector of the needs of the private sector and awareness of the forum's work to promote understanding and the right attitudes in companies? We have heard today that those attitudes would be valuable in many public sector organisations, as well.

The Government rightly accepted the proposal in the life chances report that each local authority should have a user-led organisation modelled on the existing centres for independent living by 2010, but in a survey this month by "Disability Now" magazine half the centres that responded said that they were threatened by the loss of all or part of their funding. Support for both core and project-related costs of peer-led projects for disabled people has been withdrawn. It has been given instead to organisations that are not run by disabled people or, indeed, withdrawn altogether, thus forcing centres for independent living to be excessively driven by funding demands and tendering requirements, preventing them from pursuing objectives focused on their members' needs, desires and wishes. How do the Government intend to ensure that their commitment to a network of centres for independent living is met, as the reality is that many centres are struggling to avoid closure?

Mr. Hunt: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is aware of the most recent issue of "Disability Now", which reports that half the centres for independent living that responded to its survey said that "their funding was under threat or has been in the last year"?

Danny Alexander: Not only am I aware of it, but I made that point 45 seconds ago. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, however, for repeating the point and giving some additional publicity to "Disability Now", which is an excellent publication.

Another organ ation that plays a vital role in realising the goal independent living is struggling to avoid closure. Assist UK, the umbrella organisation for centres that provide independent advice on finding the equipment that disabled people need to help them live independent lives, has lost its core funding from the Department of Health. During the Scottish parliamentary by-election in Moray, I had the pleasure of visiting the Elgin centre, which provides advice to disabled people on appropriate equipment. Such centres do fantastically important work, especially in ensuring that disabled people are not subject to doorstep selling techniques that can lead them to spend far too much on equipment that is not suited to their needs. The strategy unit report called for an independent living task force to be set up by December 2005, but that has still not happened. In answer to a parliamentary question that I tabled, the Minister said that it would be established by spring 2006. Spring was late this year, but the task force is even later, so can the Minister tell us when it will be established, as it will play an important role in promoting independent living?

Transport and getting around the community is vital to ensure that disabled people have the life chances that we all want them to have. It is important to stress that improvements are under way in many public transport sectors, thanks to the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, which the Minister rightly commended. Too many companies and organisations, however, have failed to abide by their obligations under the Act, and are getting away with it. Hon. Members will have received anecdotal reports of such problems. For example, last week a member of the Liberal Democrat Disability Association saw the companion of a wheelchair user ask a London bus driver to lower the ramp. As they waited by the exit door for the ramp to be lowered the driver closed the doors and sped off. The LDDA member asked the driver why he had done so, and he said that there was no room. However, that was not the case. Even if it was, he should have explained that to the person concerned. He refused to give his name, and a member of the British Transport police who boarded the bus said that they could not do anything to help.

That anecdote reflects a significant problem with people's attitude. What are the Government doing to ensure that disability awareness training is given to transport providers and that there is effective monitoring and enforcement? We need to see the full picture, but the anecdotal evidence is worrying.

Miss Begg: I appreciate that that did not happen to the hon. Gentleman's constituents, but constituents of mine in Aberdeen have complained to me about bus drivers' rude behaviour and their failure to offer help. I took those complaints directly to their employer, First Bus, which is keen to make sure that their drivers are always polite and helpful. The company wants abuses to be reported because it does not reflect well if its drivers are rude and unhelpful.

Danny Alexander: The hon. Lady makes a fair point. I would hope that all transport providers have the same attitude at a senior level that she has described.

The question of extending the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 to air and sea travel has been raised. It is appreciated that there are difficulties with international travel. I congratulate the Government on having made some progress during their recent EU presidency.

There need not be any delay, however, with domestic air and sea transport. I understand that a benchmarking exercise carried out with the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee was due to report on the issue in early 2006. I would be grateful if the Minister could update us on the current position.

I have had similar experiences to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg) with rail transport, where there are still significant problems with access to railway stations. That applies also to access to train services in my constituency, and I am sure that that applies to other areas. It is an issue on which we should have a continual watching brief.

I shall refer briefly to housing. In 2003, the charity John Grooms found that more than 20 per cent. of disabled people live in houses that are difficult for them to enter and move around in. It was found that 40 per cent. felt that their housing situation made them more dependent on other people. As for wheelchair users, 24 per cent. felt that they were prisoners in their own home due to poor location with lack of access to services and to transport. The lack of a proper focus on housing related issues is one of the relatively few weak spots in the life chances report. The Government need to ensure that as the life chances vision is taken forward housing does not continue to be overlooked. It was a great disappointment that the Government's review was abandoned. It would have incorporated the lifetime home standard within building regulations. I hope that that is something that can be considered again in due course.

Greater and more effective use must be made of the existing stock of accessible housing. The right hon. Member for Edinburgh, East referred to the lack of affordable housing. However, within all our constituencies there is a stock of housing that is accessible to the disabled. The use of accessible housing registers, for example, can help to ensure that that housing is made available more directly to those who need it most.

With elections taking place today, mention should be made in the debate of the difficulties that many people have in voting. A survey by Scope showed that in the 2001 general election 69 per cent. of polling stations were inaccessible to the disabled. I doubt whether any of us can give assurances that our party has ensured that we have provided our election leaflets in accessible formats for those who need that—for example, large print and easy read. Accessible versions of Government publications are equally sometimes hard to find. For example, the easy-read version of the welfare reform Green Paper—if anything should be provided in an easy-read version, it should be that document—arrived about a month after the Green Paper was published.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): Would the hon. Gentleman care to reflect on the fact that in a written answer that I received from the Minister recently, she laid great store on the care and commitment of her Department to provide accessible formats? The case that the hon. Gentleman makes, of which I was also aware, well demonstrates that in Government Departments, too, there is a long way to go.

Danny Alexander: I thank the hon. Gentleman for making that point. As for the welfare reform Green Paper, I find it disappointing that despite the delay in publishing the easy-read version, there was no extension given to the consultation period.

Mrs. McGuire: We liaise closely with the organisations involved, especially those representing people with learning disabilities. We did two things. First, we apologised publicly to them for the delay in publishing the easy-read version. Secondly, we extended the time by which they could respond to the consultation. That was made clear at the time.

Danny Alexander: I am grateful to the Minister for pointing that out. As for extending the time scale for consultation, that was not made clear to me in parliamentary answers. I am pleased that the Minister has made the position clear now. That seems to be a positive step forward.

I move on briefly to the issue of funding. A study undertaken by the Department for Work and Pensions, working paper 21, concluded that disability benefits are not currently sufficient to meet the extra costs that disabled people face. It is hard to identify all of the extra costs that are involved. Therefore, it is a complicated matter. The study was clear that while it could not necessarily ascertain the full extent of the extra costs, the full extra costs were certainly not met. That is in line with the findings of other studies, not least the Rowntree study, which has already been mentioned.

It seems to me that independent living cannot fully be achieved while that remains the case. For example, disability living allowance does not provide for communication support needs, such as augmentative communication support equipment. Towards the end of the strategy unit report, it is stated:

"Although there are advocates of a step change in allocation, it is unrealistic to assume that substantive new resources can be made available".

However, the document concludes that the unit has made a constructive case for persuasive bids in the next spending review. It says:

"With the 20 year horizon of the vision it will not be credible for the recommendations to be challenged on the grounds of available resource, only timescales."

The report also suggests where the extra resources might come from. In the summary it states:

"Successful implementation of the proposals in this report will depend, where necessary, on the appropriate level of funding being made available as a result of successful outcomes from future spending reviews. But in overall terms, a more efficient approach which promotes increased economic participation should deliver a net economic benefit in the medium to long term."

So—the Minister will no doubt point this out—there may not be funds available in the short term for a step change, but it is clear that in the long term there will be a net economic benefit from greater inclusion of disabled people in the work force, both through savings on benefit spending and increased revenue from the greater level of economic activity.

I wonder whether the agenda is being driven by the Treasury. Is welfare reform seen by the Chancellor of the Exchequer simply as a savings exercise, with all spending decisions on the net benefit to come from No. 11? Perhaps the best hope that the Minister can give disabled people today is that all of the life chances recommendations will be implemented, and that she will confirm that she will make a strong case to the Chancellor ahead of the next spending review that there is a clear case for the savings that are delivered to be at least in part allocated to bringing about the vision of the life chances report and implementing its recommendations by 2020.

That would mean that disabled people throughout the United Kingdom could have confidence that not only have the Government set out worthwhile aspirations and worthwhile policy goals in the life chances report and accepted all 60-odd of the recommendations, but that over the period of the report steps will be taken, through the benefits that are delivered to the economy, to make resources available and to deliver the other recommendations.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): I begin with an apology: I may not be available to stay in the Chamber for all the summing-up speeches. Unfortunately, the last plane to Aberdeen leaves earlier in the summer schedule than at other times. Last week my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Doran) and I both missed the plane, and it took us some effort to get to Aberdeen the night we were due to arrive there. I have constituency engagements tomorrow—and although things have improved quite considerably for disabled people, hiring an adapted car with an automatic gearbox at short notice at Edinburgh airport at 11 pm or midnight is not presently open to disabled people. I hope that it will be understood if I cannot stay to the end of the debate.

I intended to begin by listing all the positive things that the Government have done, but the wind has been taken out of my sails a wee bit. The hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) did the job for us. That in itself is a telling change, and I welcome the change in tone and mood from those on the Opposition Front Bench. The hon. Gentleman gave credit to the legislation that the Government have put in place. He talked about changing attitudes and about how the landscape for disabled people today is quite different from the landscape that existed in 1997.

Because the changes have often been incremental and quite slow, it is sometimes useful for those of us who have been involved in the debate for a long time to reflect on how much has changed, how dramatic the change has been and how much it has speeded up in the past 10 years. People for whom the Government have made successful changes have a tendency to put those improvements in their pocket and say, "Thanks very much. What are you going to do for us now?"

There have been changes in legislation and in attitudes—not just among those on the Opposition Front Bench, although perhaps that reflects their attempt to be closer to the people. They have sensed a change in attitudes to disability among people, whether they are disabled or not. The hon. Member for South-West Surrey said there was a mountain to climb.

Unfortunately that mountain keeps getting higher, because our expectations keep rising, so he will find, as we have done, that as one gets to the foothills, it is even further to the first base. I welcome the hon. Gentleman on that journey. I do not want to be churlish, but in the past his party has not even got to first base camp, so it has a long way to go to catch up with everyone else.

Attitudes have changed among disabled people themselves. No longer are they willing to sit back and accept discrimination as part and parcel of their life. Before I was elected to the House, I remember having a heated argument with someone who was involved with an organisation for disabled people. He was not disabled himself, but he worked and gave up his spare time to help disabled people. He believed that the only way to change attitudes was through education, and that legislation had no part in it. I argued that legislation set a benchmark and set the tone and the mood. People are generally law-abiding and once legislation is passed, their attitudes will fall in behind it. That is an important lesson to be learned.

The hon. Member for South-West Surrey spoke about the time lag between legislation and the change that that legislation brings about. I agree that with race and gender that time lag has been substantial, but with disability, the time lag has been foreshortened. I pay tribute to the Government because it is legislation, backed up by action, that has helped to speed up change.

I remember a time when small businesses would have been the most vehement opponents of the extension of part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. They would have said that it was impossible for them to make any adaptations as that would put them out of business, and so on, yet the Federation of Small Businesses in Scotland has been one of the bodies most actively involved in changing their members' attitudes, to make them realise that those changes are good for their business. For service providers, particularly restaurants, there is money in disability. Disabled people do not go out and socialise on their own. They tend to go out with a crowd, so if a restaurant or a venue is inaccessible to someone like me it is inaccessible to all my pals, because we will not go there. There is a good business case to be made.

For businesses that are struggling to recruit new employees at a time of high employment levels, skills shortages and in some cases a labour shortage, unless small businesses look to those who have been out of the labour market for some time because of a disability or a health problem, they will not find the quality staff that they need.

Attitudes have changed. Discrimination still exists, but not to the extent that I remember experiencing it when I first started using a wheelchair. It is not as overt and in your face as it used to be. I took petty discrimination for granted and accepted it as being part of my life. It was not worth getting worked up about it, because I would have gone through life being angry and annoyed, constantly writing angry letters, constantly complaining and constantly making an issue of it. It was just too much effort, and it was often easier to say, as many people do, that that is just what happens when one is disabled.

We are not willing to put up with that any more. That is what has changed. When discrimination occurs, it is more likely to be challenged. That is a good thing. As I said with reference to transport providers, unless people are prepared to complain, service providers do not know that further down the line there is a problem in the way that their work force are behaving towards disabled people. There is now a greater tendency to complain.

Often when I have been out socially or in the course of my work and a blatant case of discrimination has occurred, I have had a sinking feeling and thought, "Oh no, not again. I'll have to write rude letters yet again." That happened to me recently. On Easter Monday I attempted to go to the cinema in London. I did not realise that that was such a foolhardy expedition. I did not think there would be any problems, but I tried three different cinemas to see three different films in the course of one afternoon in the west end of London, and I failed to gain access to any of them. That is a real condemnation.

I can name the cinemas. At Cineworld in Shaftesbury avenue the lift was out of action, so despite the fact that it took me three quarters of an hour to get to the box office, which was a complicated route in itself, and no one had told me on the way that the lift was out of action, we had to turn round and come back. I could not get to any of the screens at that cinema. The next one was the Odeon West End, where the main screen is accessible, but not the screen where the film that I wanted to see was being shown. A number of screens at that cinema are inaccessible. At the Odeon Leicester Square, only one of the screens was accessible, not the second screen.

If I had wanted to see Ant and Dec in their new movie, I might have been able to go. Unfortunately, that is not my taste in film. Of the more cerebral films that I might have wanted to see, none was accessible. The original film that I set out to see was showing at another Odeon, in Covent Garden, but the Odeon Leicester Square could not guarantee that it was showing on a screen that was accessible at the Odeon Covent Garden.

I tell that story to illustrate how difficult it must be for visitors in London, and also because it came as an incredible shock to me. I have not been refused access to a cinema for almost 20 years. I remember when I was told that I could not come into a cinema because I was a fire hazard, but that was 25 years ago. I always thought that was a dreadful thing to say. Here was I, a non-smoker, regarded as a fire hazard, whereas the drunk man who was smoking next to me—remember, smoking was allowed in cinemas in those days, although it is allowed nowhere in Scotland now—was not considered a fire hazard. The injustice was appalling. Rightly, we do not allow that to happen any more.

I was shocked to find that the cinemas in London have got round the DDA by saying that because at least one of their screens is accessible, they have made reasonable adjustments. The excuse was that it was an old building and they had tried very hard. The cinemas in Aberdeen have been accessible for a long time and I have not faced that problem. My expectation nowadays is that I will go out to the cinema at the drop of a hat to see a film of my choice, without major forward planning. When I was unable to do that on Easter Monday, it came as a shock and a disappointment to me. It is one thing to have the legislation in place, and another to make sure that it works.

[Miss Anne Begg]

Things have changed. I welcome the Prime Minister's strategy unit report, "Improving the Life Chances of Disabled People". I welcome it because it will make things better for individuals and their chances to lead fulfilling lives, which is at the heart of today's debate. It has been announced recently that some schools are giving happiness lessons, and here the Government have a chance to make many people happy. Disabled people do not have outrageous expectations or ambitions; they just want to get on with their lives and enjoy them, with the minimum of hassle and barriers.

If anyone wants a good night out, I would recommend going out with a group of disabled people. We often have a good laugh, even when we are being refused entry to a place. The truth is that if we did not laugh at some of the things that happen to us, we would end up crying. Disabled people are good fun in general—I realise that I am making a huge generalisation—and they have adapted to some of the worst excesses, which people who are not disabled would find appalling, and would be outraged if they happened to them.

Yes, this is all about individuals and opportunities, but it is also important to the Government's ambition to end child poverty and reduce poverty more widely. There is no doubt that the link between poverty and disability is clearer and starker now than ever. The Government have been successful in alleviating pensioner policy and in lifting almost a million children out of poverty, but an important link remains—the link to disability. We have broken the link between old age and poverty and between having a family and poverty, but the Government have not yet broken the link between disability and poverty. The most disadvantaged families will often have a member with a disability—whether it be a child, an adult or a grandparent—who requires a high level of care. If we can improve the opportunities and life chances of disabled people, we can not only lift those individuals out of a cycle of poverty, but empower their families as well. At some stage we might be able to release those families from the burden of caring, which often inflicts poverty on family members as well as the disabled person.

From my perspective, it sometimes seems difficult to speak about areas of disability because I am not really a typical disabled person. There is a danger of our ending up with two classes of disabled people. It is a horrible phrase, but there is a group of "high-functioning" disabled people—people, even with profound disabilities, who hold down permanent full-time and sometimes high-powered jobs. Last year two disabled people sought my advice on how to become an MP—obviously they think that I have the magic touch, but I am not so sure myself. The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) may want to ensure that I do not remain an MP for much longer!

The two people who sought my advice had profound disabilities. One was a young woman unable to move any part of her body, yet she works for the BBC; the other was a young man who can move only his head, yet he is a full-time barrister operating in court. People with profound disabilities thus have aspirations to become MPs, and are already in highly paid and highly skilled work. My right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) could be mentioned as falling into this category, as could Tanni Grey-Thompson and other elite athletes, such as those who took part in the London marathon recently, or in the Paralympics or the Commonwealth games.

The danger of producing a disabled elite who are doing very well is that people sometimes say, "If they can do it, what's holding anyone else back?". The sort of life that that elite leads is different from the life of most disabled people, just as the life of an average MP is different from that of a single parent living in a sink estate in our constituencies. There is a big difference between what some disabled people can do and what others can do. However, that illustrates the fact that when people are given the right opportunities, the right education and the right help, the world can be everyone's oyster. It is possible to achieve—even in a society where some negative attitudes towards disability remain, where 63 per cent. of employers would not consider employing someone with a mental health problem, and where 75 per cent. of blind people are not in work. Even in such a society, disabled people can compete and achieve against the able-bodied, or anyone else.

The reality for the majority of disabled people, however, is the key issue that we should address today—and it is that reality that the strategy unit report addresses. The problems and barriers faced by disabled people are often not the result of one Department: the problems are cross-departmental and relate to a variety of issues. It is often the silo mentality of local as well as central government that acts as a major barrier to disabled people getting the holistic help that they need to lift themselves out of poverty or other difficulties.

It is interesting to note that the strategy unit report is a joint report between the Department for Work and Pensions, the Department of Health, the Department for Education and Skills and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister—and I would like to add the Scottish and Welsh Executives to that list, because housing and health issues are the responsibility of the devolved Administrations, not just of the central Government here in Whitehall. Unless we get the different Departments working together to remove the barriers, the life chances of disabled people will continue to be disadvantaged, when it is just too much of an effort to access the help required.

I have a word of warning—but I am just as guilty as anyone else. When I first got involved in the disability debate and argued in favour of civil rights for disabled people, I recall that the whole issue was viewed as a matter for the Department of Health. It was seen as a health issue, and only a health issue. That provides another example of how attitudes have changed, as we realise today that it is not just a health matter; it is about social mobility, transport, housing and a range of other issues.

The danger today, however, is that we end up concentrating only on the world of work. As I said, I am just as guilty as others of thinking that work will solve all the ills of disabled people. Of course it will not—the problem is much more complex than that—but work can go a long way to help, particularly those who are able to work. Yet another example of how attitudes have changed is the fact that when I first entered the House in 1997 and expressed the view that I had held for the previous 20 years—that disabled people should be given the chance to work and that that was a good thing—I received a deluge of letters saying, "That is disgraceful. It is all right for you, but how dare you force disabled people into work?" I viewed work as providing opportunities, but encountered the attitude that we should not be bothering those poor wee things. I am pleased to say that, on the launch of the Government's Green Paper on welfare reform, that has not been the attitude to the proposals this time round. That was the attitude until very recently, although not necessarily that of disabled people themselves. Some people used to believe that it was outrageous for people who were already disadvantaged to be given help to get over it.

I have already mentioned the Green Paper and I would like to discuss my hopes for it in more detail, but I am somewhat constrained because I sit on the Select Committee for Work and Pensions, and our report on the same issue is embargoed until midnight tomorrow. I am frightened of inadvertently giving away what is in that report and I do not want to fall foul of the House in that regard. I am sorry that I cannot say more about that matter.

Moving on from my hobby horse of the importance of work, I want to discuss some of the other areas in which we must get things right. If we hope that someone will either remain in work or get another job after a major health episode, we must get the health service right. Although waiting three months for a hip operation—unfortunately, the wait is six months in Scotland—is much better than waiting 12 months or 18 months, as happened in the past, it is still too long if someone has lost their job when a new hip would have allowed them to maintain their position in the workplace. The same is true of people who could remain in the workplace if they received physiotherapy, because some of them have to wait three months to obtain an assessment of their bad back from a physiotherapist. Unless we get health services and social care services right, the Government's aspiration to help people to remain in work may count for very little.

Danny Alexander: The hon. Lady has made an important point about health services. In pathways to work pilot areas, the condition management programme provides the sort of help that she has described for people who are already on incapacity benefit. I would like to see that speedy approach to helping people deal with their condition through the condition management programme extended to people who are in work and need help to stay in work. Will she support that proposal?

Miss Begg: I absolutely support that proposal. A mental health charity in my constituency, Momentum, has managed to obtain European social fund money to employ two specialist nurses, who go into GP surgeries and work with employees and employers to see what reasonable adjustments can be made before employees fall out of work. Very often, physical adjustments are not required, and it is a matter of talking to an employer because an individual is embarrassed to admit that they have a mental health problem, because they are frightened that their employer will automatically sack them. Working with individuals in health centres and in the workplace helps the overall situation. Momentum has got funding for next year, but it is looking for long-term funding, so I may write to the Minister and invite her to examine such projects. Such funding may not come from central Government, because it may already exist in the system and just need repackaging to go to such a worthwhile cause. Perhaps the Government should examine whether companies that can afford to pay for it should provide the same service for their employees, which would provide a funding stream for those whose employers do not have social or medical insurance. We are lucky in Aberdeen, because a number of large oil companies already provide medical insurance for their employees, which is one stream of funding that could be pulled down.

Social care is the responsibility of local government, and sometimes the easiest, simplest and cheapest options are not considered. For example, people who continue to live in their own homes face the problem of finding an accessible shower or bath. In some areas, the worst case scenario is that it will take six months before an occupational therapist turns up to assess the requirement for a flat shower area, when all that person needs is a £12.99 bath board from Argos. Sometimes the solution suggested by an occupational therapist costs £3,000, not including the £200 cost to the local authority of the home visit. Argos also sell a nice shower chair for £29.99—I know about those things, because I have just bought a new house that has not been adapted, and those purchases will work in the short term, until I can get the builders in.

That returns me to my point about the elite group of disabled people. I am lucky, because I have a job with a good income, so I do not have to wait for local government to come up with a grant, which may not meet the cost of a particular product. I can go out to source and pay for products myself, which means that I have a choice. That saves the state money, because it does not have to pay for those products, and it also saves time and effort. We should allow people to access a wider range of goods.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey—that must be the longest constituency name in the world—has pointed out that disabled people fall prey to salesman who provide fancy beds and other products at hugely inflated prices and use the hard sell technique. Such equipment costs an arm and a leg, but it does not serve disabled people very well.

Not only do we need enough specialist housing for those with profound disabilities, but we also need a register of those houses that have been adapted. Housing is probably the biggest barrier to people living independently. The creation of a disability housing register has been proposed, and I know that my local authority is examining the possibility of building a database of such houses.

Education is also important, and the Minister has discussed moving from childhood to adulthood. Disabled people often receive a lot of support at school, but once they leave school, that support seems to disappear. I pay tribute to an initiative in Aberdeen, "Moving on", which works with young people while they are at school and supports them when they move to college, university or into a job. People need specialist help to cross that divide.

[Miss Begg]

I have talked for long enough, because other hon. Members want to contribute, but I could have said so much more. However, I shall bring one Disability Rights Commission recommendation to the House's attention: the DRC has recommended that the Minister with responsibility for disabled people should be a Minister of State, and I hope to congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on her promotion in the future.

2.38 pm

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg). We disagree profoundly about a great many issues. Nevertheless, with her descriptions of her personal experiences, she brought to the debate a real flavour of what it is like to encounter some of the problems that disabled people face. She also brought it somewhat down to earth after some rather high-falutin' policy statements—I am not pointing at the Minister, but she is looking guilty—by talking about what life is really like for somebody who is disabled.

I currently experiencing, in a very minor way, what it is like to be marginally and temporarily disabled. The more observant Labour Members may have spotted that I am using a crutch. It is a self-inflicted wound in that I applied for a hip operation. I have experienced, albeit in a small way, people's attitudes towards disabled people. They do not know that I am on crutches only temporarily and that I shall, I hope, be throwing them away by October.

I am sorry that the Minister decided to be partisan on this issue, because there is a difference only of emphasis between what all parties in this House want for disabled people and how we wish to help them. This Government have done much good for disabled people, as did the last Conservative Government. The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South mentioned that she had not been refused entry into a cinema for 20 years. That must have been in 1986, when those wicked Tories were in power, so changes were taking place under them as well. We are all going on this journey, and we must continue it to ensure that disabled people do not have the disadvantages that the hon. Lady described. I think that we are all united in wishing to assist those less fortunate than ourselves. Personally, I think that we have a moral duty to assist all our fellow men, particularly those who are unfortunate enough to be disabled in some way or other. That means that we must get rid of discrimination and give everybody equal opportunities, in so far as we can. That is now happening, and I applaud the Government for that, as I applaud the last Conservative Government.

I want to speak briefly about two matters: first, the importance of attitudes and proportionality towards disabled people in the UK—I noticed that much was made of attitudes in the Government's report—and then about those affected by disability in the developing world, where we truly see how disability and poverty go hand in hand.

The report states:

"According to some definitions there are currently 11 million disabled adults . . . in the UK, equivalent to 24 per cent. of the adult population".

To be fair, it goes on to explain the different forms—heterogeneity is the word that it uses—of disability. Nevertheless, that assertion, by overstating the case, diminishes the case for assisting disabled people. Of course, if one has depression, diabetes or back pain, that is a serious matter, but to describe everybody who has such an ailment as disabled, or to say that 24 per cent. of the adult population is disabled, would raise eyebrows in most places in this country.

Mrs. McGuire: Is the hon. Gentleman seriously saying that a condition such as diabetes, which can result in death in the event of complications, is not a disability?

Mr. Robathan: The hon. Lady is putting the wrong words into my mouth. I said that there are great differences. The needs of people in wheelchairs or on crutches, or who are blind, are hugely different from those of people who have diabetes and can live a completely normal life. I am well aware that diabetes, if untreated, can lead to severe disability, blindness and all sorts of other things.

Mrs. McGuire: Is the hon. Gentleman therefore surprised to hear that a woman who had diabetes was recently sacked from her job on the grounds that she might have fainted on the shop floor? She won a case against the company that sacked her because of its ignorance about her condition.

Mr. Robathan: I am pleased that she won her case, but that rather proves my point. There are many different conditions and needs. Most people with diabetes are able to lead their lives normally, through the treatment of insulin, without the access and mobility needs of people in wheelchairs. If one said to most people outside this place that 24 per cent. of the British adult population is disabled, they would say, "I'm not quite sure that I agree with you." Nevertheless, I am delighted that the Minister was listening to me.

Leading on from that, I should like to discuss proportionality, which sometimes gives legislation in favour of trying to assist disabled people a bad name. I want to highlight two examples. The first is public transport. What is its purpose? In London, it is for the mass transit around the city of as many people as possible, as quickly as possible. It is difficult, though not impossible, to use buses when in a wheelchair—I am sure that the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South will bear me out. I suspect that it is not an attractive option in any case.

In my constituency, we have community buses—indeed, I have driven one—that assist people who are in wheelchairs and take them from door to door. One could describe them as taxis, which the community funds. I believe that it costs £1 a time. In London, the Routemaster bus, which is probably one of the best designs in the country and is much loved by everybody, has been scrapped. The Minister shakes her head, but it has been scrapped.

Mrs. McGuire: Yes, and I am glad.

Mr. Robathan: Not many people outside the House are glad.

Miss Begg: Every wheelchair user, every person with a fixed hip or who has difficulty in bending and every person who has difficulty getting upstairs in London is glad that the Routemaster has gone.

Mr. Robathan: I am surprised that the hon. Lady believes that she can speak for everybody because no one can do that. How many people who are in wheelchairs use buses in London? Would not it be much better to provide them with taxis that can take them from door to door?

Mrs. McGuire: With the greatest respect, the hon. Gentleman is stuck in a mindset that ghettoises disabled people. I believed that there was a general consensus in the House about the need to examine the barriers that stop disabled people taking a full and active part in their community. Although there is role for the community bus that he mentioned, many people who, as my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg) said, have mobility problems but are not necessarily wheelchair users and come to work in central London, welcomed the demise of the Routemaster. If the hon. Gentleman tries to get on a bus in his current condition, which he highlighted, he will find the existing buses far more attractive for meeting his needs than the Routemaster could ever be.

Mr. Robathan: The Minister makes my point for me. If we want joined-up government, public transport policy in London must include disabled people but is about more than that. It covers, for example, congestion and ease of getting on and off for the majority of people, who are not disabled, including those with diabetes. It is important to realise that rather than simply saying that we must continue to ensure that, for example, we get rid of Routemaster buses. Many people, including Ken Livingstone at one stage, backed the Routemaster bus because it was such an excellent way of swiftly transporting large numbers of people around cities.

I appreciate that the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South is not from London but I am sure that she reads the London newspapers. She will then know that many people in London dislike bendy buses enormously and do not travel on them because they do not have sufficient seats.

Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman believe that public transport should be made more accessible to disabled people? Is it a good thing or, as he appears to imply, a trivial matter?

Mr. Robathan: No, it is not a trivial matter and I am not implying that. Of course, it is a good thing to make public transport more accessible. That is not in doubt. The question is whether it was sensible to push out the Routemaster bus and I suggest that it was not. I am talking about holistic, joined-up government.

Roger Berry: Cliché, cliché.

Mr. Robathan: The hon. Gentleman speaks in clichés, so he should know. I am glad that I have stirred up Labour Members—they needed a bit of stirring up.

Let me consider my second example. I used to be a councillor in Hammersmith and Fulham. I do not know whether any hon. Member who is present knows Hammersmith town hall, but it was built in the 1930s on the main A4. The front entrance was therefore on that road. When the A4 became a six-lane highway, the front entrance was moved to the back. Cleverly, there was a lift installed at the original back entrance in the 1930s so that disabled people could go up and down every floor. When the entrance was moved to the back, people were faced with an appalling number of steps at the front entrance. In about 1990, the council decided to build a ramp that ran for about 100 yd alongside the steps to provide wheelchair access to the foyer. It cost about £100,000. However, as soon as the wheelchair users got into the foyer, they were immediately faced with steps, so they could go no further. But if they went round to the back of the building, they could take the lift to any floor and any meeting. I raised the matter with the Labour councillors there, and they said, "It's a statement." I believe that most people with mobility problems would prefer to be able to access the rooms than to live a statement.

Miss Begg: I would not wish examples of bad adaptations to be used as an excuse not to make buildings wheelchair accessible. I commend to the hon. Gentleman the publications produced by English Heritage that show some of the really imaginative ways in which buildings have been made not only wheelchair friendly but people friendly, even though they were built centuries ago.

Mr. Robathan: The hon. Lady thinks that I am disagreeing with her, but I am not. I am saying that there should be proportionality, and that we should help disabled people in the best possible way—thoughtfully and pragmatically—rather than making statements that cost a lot of money and do not help them.

I want briefly to talk about attitudes. In the past two weeks, I have learned about attitudes towards people on crutches. I have found the attitude of most people towards me to be pretty good. A man slammed the door behind me yesterday after I had scrambled into a taxi at Euston station. He was just walking past and decided to help me. That was excellent. As hon. Members might imagine, the Tea Room staff here could not be more helpful with carrying things for me. Occasionally, however, I have met people such as the minicab driver who tried to pick a fight with me when I was leaving the hospital. I would have thought that people who were on crutches or in a wheelchair were pretty safe from people trying to pick a fight with them for no reason at all, but apparently not. However, that is another matter, and it is one that I subsequently discussed with the police.

People's attitudes are important. I was appalled to hear the story related by the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) about someone being refused access to a bus. In 1991, I trained as a bus driver. I was not very good at it. Indeed, I had to become an MP instead. I hit a trader's barrow in the street market in North End road, actually. However, my point is that, when I was training to be a bus driver, the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee—DPTAC—already existed. I was shown films about access to buses—the Minister will remember that this was under the wicked Tories in 1991—and about the colour coding of handles and steps. I was amazed to discover that, some 15 years later, bus drivers are not so well trained and that they now refuse access to disabled people. Of course that should not be happening, and I am astonished that it did. Disabled people do not want warm words and statements; they want genuine assistance, so that they can lead their lives independently, as far as possible. I can understand that.

I want to talk about people in the developing world who are affected by disability. When we see people in the developing world who have very little, and who are also disabled because of disease, for example, we realise how poverty strikes the disabled the worst. Until last week, I was chairman of the Halo Trust, a charitable trust that clears landmines around the world. Indeed, it is the biggest mine clearance agency in the world. When clearing the landmines, we also see the disabling effects that landmines can have, especially when they blow off people's lower limbs.

People ask why we do not just leave the mines where they are. I know only a little about this, but I have seen villages in Cambodia in which anti-personnel mines have been laid underneath houses that people are still living in. The people must follow a particular path to get out of their houses, because if they stray from it, they will get their legs blown off. That helped me to understand how the mines impact on people's lives. But poor people who live in squalor in the developing world have to go out to tend their cattle and to hoe the ground. And they are subject to the most awful impact that disability can have. In the streets of Maputo, Phnom Penh in Cambodia or wherever, we can see what effect disability—brought on early, particularly by land mines—has on young people. They are then reduced to poverty and cannot raise themselves out of it. Their life chances are very slim.

Hon. Members might not know that 1 million people have been killed or maimed by anti-personnel mines in recent years or that 26,000 people a year become victims, which is 70 a day. Of course, such mines do not just injure or kill an individual; they create long-term costs to communities, and the most immediate problem is medical costs, which people often cannot bear.

I said that I would be brief, and I am glad that I have stirred up Members on the other side of the House. I wanted to check that they were listening and not going to sleep. Before moving on, I pay tribute to the Department for International Development, which has been extremely good in funding not only land mine clearance, but the victims of land mines—the disabled in the developing world. I suggest that, there, small investment pays huge dividends in a way that it does not here.

In conclusion, we should all care, and I hope we do, but we should not treat disabled people as in some way inferior beings. We should give them every opportunity to live their lives to the full. However, we should be not just offering warm words, but taking effective and concrete action in our policy development. The Government are doing much that is good here, but statements are not always enough. We need positive action that is pragmatic and helpful.

2.56 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill) (Lab): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan), whose remarks towards the end of his speech were particularly telling, especially from someone whom we know has a long record of being involved in international development. I am sure that we all wish him a speedy recovery as well.

This has been an interesting debate, opened robustly, as one would expect, by my hon. Friend the Minister. She is doing a first-class job, and is right to contrast our approach to disability, say, 10 years ago with the much greater urgency that we now see in the Chamber day by day. Under her stewardship, that is all the more clear and all the more profound. I am pleased to give her my support in today's extremely important debate.

I also welcome the hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) to his duties. During the period to which I am referring, I was the shadow Cabinet spokesperson on disability, working with the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague). I welcomed then, as I do now, the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, which was an important step forward. Because of the hon. Gentleman's style, I do not want to be particularly controversial, but I take the view that his right hon. Friend probably feels, on reflection, that the DDA would have been even better if he had accepted our proposal to introduce the Disability Rights Commission. With me, he will regret that we merely got within 13 votes of achieving that. In that spirit, I welcome the hon. Gentleman to this wonderful portfolio. I am sure that he will find great fulfilment in it.

When I initiated a debate just three years ago this month during the European year of disabled people, the Government's document, "Valuing People", was the main focus of our discussion. I realise that, today, the publication of the welfare reform Green Paper, "A New Deal for Welfare: Empowering People to Work", is the backdrop to our debate. That is inevitable.

I want to touch on a few issues, some of which have been dealt with, but primarily I shall discuss employment and then disabled children. As the House might be aware, I co-chair with Lord Rix the all-party group on learning disability. Not surprisingly, I want to deal with some of the issues that that group has discussed. There is considerable concern, as has been expressed today on both sides of the House, about employment. That concern makes sense: among people with learning disabilities, there is 90 per cent. unemployment. Even the 10 per cent. who are employed are mostly in part-time jobs. Seventy-nine per cent. of people with mental health problems also experience unemployment. Indeed, the employment rates for those two groups is less than half the overall rate for disabled people, which is itself less than satisfactory, as we have heard today.

Mr. Burns: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that great strides have been made in recent years to deal with the problems faced by people who suffer from disabilities? Does he also agree that, apart from continuing that work, the greatest challenge that we now face is to break down the stigma and prejudice against those suffering from mental illness, given that 20 per cent. of people in this country will at some time in their lives suffer a form of mental illness?

Mr. Clarke: I hope to touch on that important issue later, and I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I look forward to hearing the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry), who has made a remarkable contribution on these issues. I am sure that he, too, would agree that it is an important matter.

On employment, particularly with respect to those with learning disabilities, I am afraid that it must be recorded that we have not seen the improvement in the past three or four years for which we would have wished. We keep pushing for that, however, and rightly so. The situation is not helped by the fact that disabled people are twice as likely as non-disabled people to have no qualifications.

Mr. Boswell: Before the right hon. Gentleman leaves the question of the numbers of people with learning disabilities taking up employment, does he reflect on the fact that that rather poor performance is at a time when the Government claim credit for high levels of employment in the labour market? Is not the growing mismatch between people without disabilities who can apparently pick up a job easily, and people with learning disabilities who find it proportionately ever more difficult, especially worrying?

Mr. Clarke: It is not like the hon. Gentleman to make what appears to be a party political point, and if he does not mind, I shall resist the temptation to respond. If I may, I shall simply refer him to the speech that I made during the Budget debate on the Government's record on employment generally.

On the issue of disabled people—particularly those with learning disabilities—seeking employment, RADAR, like so many other disability organisations, has done a magnificent job. It has used the slogan that disability does not mean and should not mean "cannot work". It is right. It explains its view by saying that there are other factors besides a person's disability. Two people with the same condition may be in or out of work based on their own ability to manage their impairment, and based on the accessibility of their working environment and support provided to overcome barriers.

Whatever we might think about the proposals in the Green Paper, to which, on the whole, disability organisations have responded positively, our policies simply must take into account the obstacles that disabled people face in taking up employment; provide a fair, objective basis for establishing eligibility for the reformed disability benefit; and ensure that absolutely no one is labelled unemployable.

I believe that the Government should continue to focus their resources on those who face the most significant barriers to employment. The truth is that the targets set for Government programmes may not always encourage providers to work with people with learning disabilities, who may need more time and support to secure jobs. That is why the RADAR/Remploy task force—RADAR is the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation—which was set up last August to find new solutions to the problems, has already drawn clear conclusions. I congratulate it on its work.

The task force points out that individual support needs should be recognised in non-stigmatising ways, a point made a few moments ago by the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns). It also observes that work placements seem to work better than training courses, compensating for an individual's lack of confidence and inappropriate interview techniques. It is important to recognise the special needs of people with learning disabilities.

A significant number of people with moderate to severe learning disabilities need to be helped both into and in work. If they are to gain mainstream employment, tailored ongoing support must be available. According to anecdotal evidence, people with learning disabilities are not being helped by pathways to work to the extent that the Government would wish, owing to the emphasis on condition management and rehabilitation in the system. That emphasis is not appropriate or relevant to the support needs of people with learning disabilities, or other disabled people whose condition is lifelong. Specialist incapacity benefit advisers must have experience of learning disabilities: that is profoundly important in the context of the Green Paper. Niche providers such as Mencap do not have nationwide coverage, so it is crucial for Jobcentre Plus to provide the programmes and support that are appropriate to people with learning disabilities, rather than relying on external agencies.

I entirely accept that no Government can solve all those problems. We can create the climate, and I believe that this Government are doing exactly that, but employers have responsibilities as well. To be fair, there are examples of best practice among some small and large employers. More work must also be done to make the business case for employing disabled people, and employers who have seen the benefits of employing them are best placed to lead that work. The Employers Forum on Disability has done a first-class job, as has the Scottish Federation of Small Businesses. When I had an opportunity to examine the American experience, it seemed to me that American employers were the people who were explaining to the world how important it is—not just to jobs, and not just to disabled people—for society to accept its responsibilities to others, and to accept that the fact that a person is disabled does not justify the automatic discrimination that has existed in the past.

More could be done to ensure that disabled people can retain their current jobs when acquiring and/or managing impairments and fluctuating conditions. When people experience temporary setbacks after several years of managing conditions such as epilepsy or depression, that should not cost them their jobs or, indeed, promotion.

I note that the joint working group report of the Department for Work and Pensions and the Department of Health, on employment for people with learning disabilities, has not yet been published. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will tell us, when she winds up, when it is expected. She will be aware that although I accept the main thrust of the Green Paper, I continue to urge the need for the utmost sensitivity. The spirit of such an approach was impressively put by RADAR in its response to the Green Paper:

"Many disabled people have felt threatened by the Government's plans to impose sanctions on those who do not participate in work-focused interviews. The non-attendance rate for work-focused interviews amongst those currently involved in the Pathways to Work programme is less than 2 per cent. Given this low figure, RADAR sees no reason to place an emphasis on sanctions in the new system. To do so would mislead people into thinking that the driver behind the reforms is the reduction of the number of claimants, rather than helping more disabled people into work. Disabled people want to work, and if these reforms are successful then there should be no need to sanction people for non-participation in activities that will assist them back into the workforce."

[Mr. Clarke]

The DRC offered its views—it was not alone in doing so—on the Office for Disability Issues in its briefing for this debate. It said:

"The Life Chances report established the Office for Disability Issues ... to act as a co-ordinating body for disability policy across government. It reports to the Minister for Disabled People and must produce an annual report for the Prime Minister on the progress towards achieving equality for disabled people. The DRC supports this and the high level political recognition that it gives towards achieving equality for disabled people."

I also agree wholeheartedly with its view that the ODI

"also needs to ensure strong links with the Commission for Equality and Human Rights ... to ensure that disability is addressed in a concerted way as an issue of equality and human rights."

In turning to children with disabilities, I want to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Ed Balls), who recently introduced a ten-minute Bill entitled the Disabled Children's Assessment and Services Bill. It is supported by Contact a Family, the Council for Disabled Children, Mencap and the Special Educational Consortium, which have been working together for several years to raise awareness of the issues that the Bill addresses, and to press for change.

The reason for the Bill's introduction is the lack of entitlement to services on the part of disabled children and their families. It would give disabled children the right to local authority assessment and to receive services such as short breaks, respite care and accommodation. It would also help to deliver on the Government's commendable May 2005 manifesto commitment, which states:

"We will also ensure that services are designed to meet the additional needs of disabled children and their families".

I am delighted that the Bill is receiving all-party support.

The Bill's relevance is that some 770,000 children in the UK—7 per cent.—are disabled. Since 1975, there has been a 62 per cent. increase in the numbers of disabled children. That is due largely to medical advances, especially in the perinatal setting, that fortunately mean that more children survive. It costs three times as much to bring up a disabled child as it does to raise one who is not disabled. To their great credit, the Government have taken a huge number of children out of poverty, but 55 per cent. of disabled children's families still live in poverty.

As the DRC has reminded us, 84 per cent. of mothers of disabled children do not work, compared with 39 per cent. of mothers of non-disabled children. It has also said that two thirds of families in which neither parent works include at least one disabled parent.

I know that the Government want to resolve those problems. The Bill presented by my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton would make it clear in law for the first time that local authorities must assess disabled children and provide a range of services, such as short breaks and respite care, where they are deemed to be necessary. It would also encourage parents to ask for assessments, and for the services and support that they so desperately need. I welcome the proposals to encourage local authorities to think creatively about how to meet disabled children's needs, and the requirement that NHS bodies should work co-operatively with local authorities to promote the health and welfare of disabled children in England and Wales.

My hon. Friend the Minister may think that I am overlooking Scotland. However, I assure her that I have put down an oral question on that very issue, for answer by the Secretary of State for Scotland next Tuesday.

On the wider matter of children with disabilities, organisations of and for disabled people have argued consistently that adequate family support is crucial to improving the life chances of people with learning disabilities. They welcome the scrapping of the means test for the disabled facilities grant, which means that more families are able to make the vital adjustments to their homes that make it possible to provide appropriate care for disabled family members. However, other bodies, such as Mencap, want the limit for the grant to be increased from £25,000 to £50,000, in line with the recommendations of the review commissioned by the Government.

Again and again, hon. Members are reminded at our surgeries that a few alterations—such as a walk-in shower, a ramp or better access to a bedroom—would make a world of difference to the quality of so many people's lives. That underlines how even the limited resources available to local councils can genuinely improve our approach to community care.

The House would be surprised if I were to complete a speech on disability without referring to advocacy. Advocacy was at the heart of the Disabled Persons Act 1986, which I managed to steer through the House, and is especially urgent in respect of the needs of disabled children. The Children's Society has said:

"Very few disabled children and young people currently have access to an advocacy service. Local authorities are only required to provide advocacy for children and young people making a complaint under the Children Act 1989. In practice, the majority of disabled children and young people placed away from home are not aware that they have the right to complain."

It points out too that recent research shows that "only 5 per cent. of advocacy services targeted disabled children and young people".

That figure is clearly far too low, and much more needs to be done if disabled children are to experience the fulfilment that I know that the House wants them to have. However, I am sure that we all very much welcome the decision by the Department for Education and Skills to provide funding, with the aim of promoting advocacy, to the Children's Society's disability advocacy project, and that we all wish that project well.

I congratulate the Government on making that funding available, on their many other achievements in respect of disability rights, and on today's debate. As colleagues have often said, it may not be possible to add years to the lives of disabled people, but we have a chance to add life to their years.

3.19 pm

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke). In her opening speech the Minister paid tribute to Alf Morris, to whom the House owes a debt of gratitude. To paraphrase the late Iain Macleod, a debate on disabilities without the contribution or presence of the right hon. Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill would be a bit like a production of "Hamlet" without the gravediggers. [Laughter.]

Mr. Robathan: Was that a compliment?

Mr. Burns: It was.

The Government document on improving and enhancing the life quality of those suffering from disabilities ranges widely over many areas, but I should like to focus on two in particular. The first concerns education and children, albeit in a narrow and specific sense: children who suffer from dyslexia and dyspraxia. Dyspraxia, which is not as well known as dyslexia, is a neurological condition that causes children to suffer from varying degrees of short-term memory loss or concentration. It is becoming far more common place among young people, partly, I suspect, because it has only relatively recently been recognised and understood as a problem.

We have known about dyslexia for far longer. I find it staggering that I have been a Member of this House for 19 years—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—and that it was only after I had been here for three years that my county council recognised the existence of dyslexia. One shudders to think what happened to children who previously were told that no such condition existed. Logically, no help was provided to assist them and to minimise their learning difficulties.

Great improvements have been made over the past 15 years, but there is still a problem with statementing children and thereby recognising the problems that they are having with dyslexia. The problem is even more acute with dyspraxia and identifying the assistance that children need to secure the same opportunity to a full education as any other child. Such children need to be assisted with extra lessons and help from special needs teachers. When they are statemented, which sometimes can be a long and time-consuming process, the problem is ensuring that they receive enough time and help from the teaching assistants and specialist teachers who are best qualified to assist them.

Dyspraxia remains less well understood and less well known. The help necessary is more complex, which in itself is a problem. Is it in the best interests of children with dyspraxia to remain in mainstream schools or to be educated in special educational schools that are devoted, conditioned and organised to give direct help? I believe that the latter is better. One cannot generalise because each child must be judged on his or her individual merits, but it is most unfair on children to be kept in a mainstream school if they cannot cope.

I know a little boy who suffers from dyslexia and dyspraxia. He started his educational life aged five in a mainstream school. It was two years before anyone, including his parents, realised that he suffered from dyslexia and dyspraxia. For those who do not fully understand some of the manifestations of dyspraxia, a five, six or seven-year-old boy with a short-term memory will not necessarily remember what he is being told. If parents ask that child something, particularly a multiple-choice request such as "Go upstairs, put your pyjamas on, put your slippers in the bathroom and bring the towel downstairs," half an hour later when they go upstairs they find the little boy playing with his toys in his bedroom. Their immediate reaction is that he is misbehaving and being naughty, that he does not want to do as he was told because it is more fun and more interesting to play with his toys. In fact, because he had been given more than one instruction, by the time he got to his bedroom he had completely forgotten what he had been asked, so he did what he wanted to do. If parents and school teachers do not realise that the child is suffering from that condition they think that the child is misbehaving and not doing what he is told. The child will then suffer because he will be told off.

Thus, at school, because of the lack of short-term memory, the ability to learn to read and write and to take very simple instructions from a teacher is lost; the child's concentration goes very quickly and teachers and parents feel that he is misbehaving and cannot be bothered to concentrate on his work when, through no fault of his own, his concentration has long since gone.

Ritalin is one way to assist such children; on strict medical advice, under proper supervision it is a tremendous help for some children. I know that it is a controversial drug and that there are strong views on either side of the argument, but there is evidence that it can significantly help children, particularly during the school day, to concentrate and get on with their work.

One must recognise, however, that a mainstream school may not be the best place for those children and their education. The little boy whom I knew started off in mainstream schooling, but within a year his teachers felt there was a problem because he was slow in developing his reading and writing and recommended extra lessons at the end of the school day. He had the extra lessons, which were extended to extra lessons on a Saturday, but it did not make that much difference. By the end of the next year, the school told his parents that he was dyslexic, and might be dyspraxic, and that it was not in his best interests that he remain at the school because, although he was getting extra lessons, he was not getting the help that his condition and abilities demanded but was holding back the rest of his class.

I fully support the judgment of that little boy's teachers and parents. He was taken out of mainstream school and went to a specialist school—Fairley House, just behind the Tate, down the road from here—that looks after children who suffer from dyslexia and dyspraxia. The teaching ratio in some cases is 1:1 and the school helps children tremendously.

The boy is now 14. He left mainstream schooling with a reading age three years behind his age, although one is meant to have a reading age about 18 months ahead of one's age. His reading age is now 12 months ahead of his age. His writing abilities are still 18 months behind his age—they should, of course, be ahead of it—and his writing is poor, but he has developed computer skills, which are a great help. He can concentrate and read fluently and he is beginning to contribute to his education in a way that a 14-year-old boy should. He can now be taken out of the special school and placed back in a mainstream school where there are specialist teachers to assist children among the mainstream pupils who need help with dyslexia and dyspraxia, without holding back his classmates and colleagues.

That classic example shows that one cannot have a policy that says that all children who suffer from dyslexia or dyspraxia must be in mainstream schooling because that is inclusive. In theory, it might be a brilliant idea, but, in practice, it is too generalised and it is not such a brilliant idea. It can be harmful to both the individual child and other children, and the education of all of them can suffer as a result. Of course, in an ideal world, emphasis must be placed on as many children as possible, particularly with dyslexia and dyspraxia, being placed in mainstream schooling. However, in reality, either for the whole educational process or even just—

Mrs. McGuire: I just want to be clear what the hon. Gentleman is saying. I was following his arguments on dyspraxia, but is he now saying that children with dyslexia should be placed in specialist schools?

Mr. Burns: No, I am not saying that that should happen as a matter of course. Each child should be judged on his or her individual capabilities. For some children who have extreme dyslexic problems, a school that specialises in helping children with dyslexia and dyspraxia is a better option than a mainstream school. The degree of their problems means that such children suffer in a mainstream school, because they cannot get the 100 per cent. attention that they require during school hours. In a way, they also cause other pupils in their class to suffer, because they hold them back by placing a disproportionate demand on the teachers' time, at the expense of those other children. I am afraid that, in reality, that does happen.

Of course, I am not saying that a mildly dyslexic child should not be in a mainstream school, but in the case of certain degrees of dyslexia—depending on the individual child—such a school is not suitable. I want to make a plea that the idea of special needs schools should not be dismissed because people rightly want to have as inclusive a society as possible. However wonderful it sounds to be inclusive, it can be damaging, both to the individual and their peers in the classroom. There has been a view that there should be more mainstreaming of pupils, when, in practice, that is not that sensible.

I have three pleas. First, the statementing process should be far easier for parents to access. Secondly, when the statements have been completed, the analysis carried out and the recommendations made about what extra help a child should get, the help should be provided immediately—without a time lag. If one were being cynical, one could say that the longer the process of statementing, identifying needs and meeting them is strung out, the cheaper it is for the state. Thirdly, we should not over-concentrate on seeking to treat all pupils the same and insisting that they attend a mainstream school when, because they have an impact on each other's education, it is not in the best interests of individual pupils or their fellow pupils to be educated together.

The other area that I would like to discuss, which I mentioned when I intervened on the right hon. Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill, is mental health. This Government—and other Governments, albeit using different phraseology—have sought to promote social inclusion over the past nine years, and rightly so: no one would criticise that. The Minister and other hon. Members said that great strides have been taken in dealing with the inherent problems, attitudes and practical difficulties that people with disabilities face. There is more to be done, as every hon. Member has said, but steps have been taken and improvements are being made not simply because of legislation—important though that is—but because of changes in attitudes and mindsets.

Mental health, sadly, lags dramatically behind, in what is supposed to be a civilised century. In the past, to no one's credit, the mentally ill were put out of mind by putting them out of sight. That stopped, ironically, when Enoch Powell was Minister of Health back in the early 1960s. He made great strides in seeking to integrate many people who suffered from mental illness into the community, rather than having them locked up and hidden away. That has been the policy of successive Governments of every political persuasion, but there has been a knock-on effect, which is deeply tragic and a blot on a civilised society.

Of course, many people who pose no threat whatsoever to the community live in hostels or in homes that are converted into single-bedroom units, but as soon as a building in a residential area—it may be the house next to any of us—has been allocated for conversion into single dwelling units for people who have been or are still suffering from mental illness, we see the petitions, the uproar, the rumours, the speculation about what may happen and the rather unpleasant accusation that house prices will fall as a result. I am sure that many hon. Members have probably had that distasteful experience.

What usually happens? The proposal usually goes ahead, the establishment is created and people move in. They live good, meaningful lives there, and no one in the street ever has a single problem with the people who live in that house. All the scaremongering, all the petitions and the hot air prove to be totally erroneous. That shows the great fear in society about mental illness, part of which is due to people's total ignorance. They are fearful of something, so they stigmatise and attack it.

The House, the Government and the Opposition must do more, and we must do it faster, to break down the barriers. I was the Minister responsible for mental health 10 years ago. We were talking about it and we were doing things then. Health Ministers under this Administration have talked about it and have done something about it. The trouble is that the fear and stigma are so great that it is like chipping away at Mount Everest. All I would say to the Minister is that we must do more; we must accelerate it; and we must focus on it just as people who are interested and involved more generally with disabilities have concentrated and fought for rights and improvements in society. That is what we must do more with regard to mental health.

I make no criticism of anyone or any Minister over the past nine years or the past 29 years, because they have done a lot, but we must now put the spotlight on mental health. Instead of just talking about such things, we must bring them to fruition and ensure that people suffering from mental illness enjoy a life of comparable treatment to those who suffer from flu, cancer or appendicitis, because, quite frankly, there is very little difference between them in principle; the only difference in practice is that people are sympathetic to those who suffer from cancer or flu. People want to be around them, offering help and sympathy, but as soon as someone suffers from mental illness, people do not want to know, and hon. Members know the epitaphs and expressions that are used about those individuals. They are often so scared about what they are suffering from that they do not want anyone else to know, so that they do not get criticised or shunned as a result. That is a contradiction and an abomination, and we must do more about it.

3.40 pm

Roger Berry (Kingswood) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns). I congratulate him on his comments on people with mental illness, as his views are widely shared in the House. They are important, and we should all act on them.

I very much welcome today's debate, if not the date on which it is being held. In the foreword to the life chances document, the Prime Minister says that life chances for disabled people are not a marginal issue. I very much hope that the business managers will note that comment, and act appropriately in future. I strongly support and endorse the report's strategy. Its recommendations, all of which have been accepted by the Government, are of critical importance if we are to tackle the inequalities and exclusion experienced by many disabled people. I welcome the hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) to his new post, and I am genuinely pleased that there is great consensus on disability issues across the House. However, it was a Labour Government who, after their election in 1997, set up the disability rights taskforce, established the Disability Rights Commission, introduced the Special Educational Needs and Disability Act 2001, the new deal for disabled people and so on, culminating in the Disability Discrimination Act 2005.

The Disability Discrimination Act 1995 could have made provision for a disability rights commission. Indeed, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke) and many other Members will recall, that was precisely what some of us spent hours—nay, days—trying to persuade the then Government to do. It would have been possible for the DDA 1995 not to exclude the subject of education. The requirement not to discriminate on the grounds of disability in the provision of services could have been applied to education, but the Government decided not to introduce such a provision. Transport provisions that have since been introduced could have been introduced in the DDA 1995. That would have been perfectly possible, as such provision was not unknown. Hours were spent in the Chamber and elsewhere urging the Government of the day to do more in the DDA.

Miss Begg: I am reluctant to interrupt my hon. Friend while he is in full flow, but may I point out that while access to stations was included in the 1995 Act, in practice it is still not available?

Roger Berry: Indeed. The 1995 Act imposed a requirement on access to stations in theory, but it specifically excluded trains from any requirements whatever. The policy was, "We think that it's a good idea for disabled people to have access to railway stations, but we don't care whether they can get on the train or not." That was the nature of the debate. I believe passionately that if a Labour Government had not been elected in 1997, the DRC, the Special Educational Needs and Disability Act, and the report that we are debating today would not have been introduced. I am glad that things have moved on—I look forward to the new conservatism with excitement beyond measure—but we would not be where we are if the Government had not made progress.

I now move on to the welfare reform Green Paper, which is critical. Jobs are not everything, but jobs are probably the most effective way of enabling people to get out of poverty if they are able to secure employment. The subtitle of the Green Paper—"Empowering people to work"—shows precisely the right attitude. That is what I have always understood by welfare reform. I am pleased that that is the approach to welfare reform in the Green Paper. It must be said that that is in contrast to the approach set out in the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999. I am delighted that the contrast is great.

Anyone who is in doubt about whether the Government are going in the right direction on these matters has, as always, only to read the Daily Mail. I read the Daily Mail the morning after the Green Paper was published, and there was a shock, horror headline, "Crackdown?" The article went on:

"The 2.7 million on welfare won't lose a penny!"

I thought, "That's great. That's fine." I did not expect welfare reform to be about taking money away from disabled people, so it was good news. The fact that the Daily Mail was irate encouraged me enormously. I must add, in all seriousness, that we then had the usual diatribe about scroungers and people living on handouts.

I am delighted that no one in the Chamber today has resurrected the sort of language that not so long ago was used about people who were being asked to survive on incapacity benefit. I am sorry for the hon. Member for South-West Surrey, who speaks from the Opposition Front Bench, but the Daily Mail went on to say:

"Conservatives immediately accused the Prime Minister of backing away from radical welfare reform".

I am delighted that the Daily Mail got it wrong. The language today is entirely different from the sort of language that was printed in the Daily Mail.

Mr. Hunt: Will the hon. Gentleman explain what the contradiction is between "radical welfare reform", which we on the Opposition Benches would certainly welcome, and having a better benefits structure that helps more disabled people get into work?

Roger Berry: Well, nothing. The full quote from the Daily Mail was:

"Conservatives immediately accused the Prime Minister of backing away from radical welfare reform in the face of a threatened rebellion from Labour MPs."

Everybody knows that the concern was whether there would be benefit cuts. That is what the tabloids had been flagging up month after month. When we were told that the Tories had attacked my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister for not doing that, that was a point of some significance.

[Roger Berry]

Let us stay with the spirit of harmony and unity in the Chamber this afternoon. Let us accept that that to which I have referred is no longer Conservative party policy. I am delighted to hear that. I am sure that in due course the details of the Opposition's view on the benefits part of welfare reform, as opposed to the pathway to work part, will be interesting to observe. I hope in all sincerity that the focus is, as it is in the Green Paper, on tackling the problem by rolling out pathways to work, on giving people opportunities to work and on removing the barriers that prevent so many disabled people from working. This is not about taking away people's benefits.

The focus of the Green Paper is absolutely right. It is not that the state provides a generous benefit to people through incapacity benefit. The problem is that many people cannot secure waged employment because of illness or disability and require assistance to do so. When my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) was Secretary of State, he introduced the pathways to work pilot, which I warmly welcomed. That was exactly the right thing to do. I am delighted that the Minister and her colleagues have been building on that policy ever since.

There are issues that need to be addressed. There is the question of the financial resources that are necessary to deliver the ambitious targets in the Green Paper. I welcome the commitment that we already have to £360 million of new money, but I agree with those who observe that if we are to achieve the target of enabling a million people on incapacity benefit to secure employment in the next 10 years, we will almost certainly require more resources than that. As the Government have rightly pointed out, if another million people secure employment the Exchequer makes a substantial saving: people in work do not receive the benefits to which they were previously entitled, and instead pay income tax and national insurance contributions. The saving that has been mentioned in previous debates is £7 billion.

Others have alluded to the fact that joined-up Government should recognise that those savings would follow from an ambitious programme and could be invested in getting people back to work. I notice that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg) said, the life chances report was cross-departmental. Four Departments have been involved in drafting an excellent report. Not surprisingly, the one Department whose name is not on it is the Treasury. I say that not as a criticism—I am second to none in my admiration for the Chancellor—[Interruption.] Somehow I do not think that my view on regime change will determine any such outcome.

On the life chances report, as on similar cross-departmental reports, we do not have the Treasury's signature. That is understandable, but I hope that my good friend the Minister and her colleagues are having talks with the Treasury about ensuring that a substantial part of the savings in welfare benefit payments that come from people going into work will be used for further investment in achieving the target of a million people off incapacity benefit and into jobs. Some people speak of Treasury rules as if those drop from the clear blue sky. The Treasury makes its own rules. The Government make the rules. There is nothing to stop money being transferred in a sensible way. Not to make that transfer would be silly.

I have argued before, and others have made the same point, that there is in the UK a powerful case for spending more on labour market programmes for disabled people, not just because, as I suggested, those programmes pay for themselves to a significant extent, but because UK spending on such programmes is quite low. It is about a fifth of the European Union average. Other EU countries are spending more on labour market programmes to support disabled people. I very much hope that we can move closer to the EU average, as we are doing, happily, in other areas.

As my final comment on the finance issue, I shall take up what has been said about the access to work programme. I agree with the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) who spoke for the Liberal Democrats: the access to work programme is probably one of the best kept secrets in Government—so secret that 75 per cent. of employers have never heard of it. To the Government's credit—the Minister will correct me if I have the figures wrong—the spending on access to work has been quadrupled under this Government. It has gone up from a miserly £15 million to £60 million a year. That is a significant improvement.

Since the Department for Work and Pensions has noted—I almost said conceded, but I will not say that—that if it spends £1 million on access to work it gets £1.7 million back, because, as I said, people do not receive benefits but pay national insurance and income tax. The decision on any scheme that enables us to spend £1 million and get £1.7 million back in three or four years is a no-brainer. In that context, the £60 million does not seem very much. Recognising the simple economics of access to work, I join the Disability Rights Commission, and just about every other disability organisation, in saying, "Please, please can we consider putting more money into access to work?"

Some of my constituents illustrate the case. I remember a teacher who became a wheelchair user after a motorcycle accident. The reason why he returned to his classroom so quickly was the support that he received from South Gloucestershire council and the access to work scheme. Money was available to help him make some basic adaptations and he was back teaching in his classroom far more quickly than he ever anticipated and far more quickly than I ever thought possible. Access to work is a very important instrument, helping disabled people to get back to work.

As always, however, there is more to the issue than finance. When people require advice on employment opportunities and strategies for getting back to work, the advice that they receive from their personal advisers is critical, so there must be enough of them and they must be of good quality. There is a very ambitious target in the welfare reform Green Paper. Speaking as someone who visits job centres and voluntary organisations that assist disabled people to get back to work, I simply point out that, as of today, we are hardly suffering from an excess number of highly skilled personal advisers who fully understand mental health issues, access issues, the labour market and so forth.

Given the likely salaries, it is not surprising if the advisers do not have the experience that is now demanded of them.

We must ensure that our ambitious programme does not run into difficulties because of an insufficient number of skilled personal advisers. In that context, voluntary organisations play a crucial part. Many voluntary organisations that provide support for disabled people have contracts from Jobcentre Plus to do the work, precisely because they have the requisite expertise. I am not necessarily suggesting that it would not be better if more people in Jobcentre Plus appreciated the issues, but the important consideration is what delivers for the individual client—the disabled person seeking a job—and many voluntary organisations possess the expertise that many Jobcentre Plus units do not have.

There is a real problem here. I visited a voluntary organisation in Bristol recently and found that the people working there were, like many others, on one-year contracts. If we are to achieve the ambitions of the Green Paper, we should try to ensure that where voluntary sector organisations have proved that they are delivering a good service and are benefiting many people by getting them back to work, the funding that we secure for them is rather better than one-year contracts. I hope that the Minister will take account of that. When I visited that voluntary organisation, I found that many of the people who had delivered for the last nine months were busy applying for jobs elsewhere, because they were unsure about funding for the next 12 months. That is not a sound basis on which to build active voluntary sector involvement in such an important sphere of activity.

Other hon. Members have observed that, sadly, a large proportion of disabled people are still living in poverty, and I should like to add to the debate. Extensive studies—particularly the Joseph Rowntree Foundation research published 18 months ago, to which the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) referred—have demonstrated that disability benefits are not out of control: for some reason, I am thinking of the Daily Mail. The benefits, which are substantially below the level that would ensure a decent standard of living, are not generous.

There is also a danger of official Government statistics understating the extent of the poverty, because there are many costs of disability that obviously do not affect non-disabled people. The most expensive is probably the cost of personal assistants, interpreters for deaf people and so forth. Disabled people incur the costs of disability and, as the Joseph Rowntree Foundation pointed out, when we take that into account, we find that the proportion of disabled people living in poverty is higher. The statistics quoted in the strategy unit report—I have checked them carefully—suggest that 27 per cent. of households with disabled people are likely to be poor, compared with 20 per cent. of households without disabled people.

The Joseph Rowntree Foundation report shows that that seriously underestimates the true extent of poverty among disabled people. If we are talking about life chances, we must bear that point in mind. As I have said, we must also consider whether the cost of heating for people whose condition requires them to keep warm should qualify them for the winter fuel allowance. The Government are not responsible for and cannot control fuel prices, but they can make the winter fuel allowance, which is welcome, and which is currently available to people over 60, available to severely disabled people—for example, those on the middle or higher rate of the disability living allowance care component or the higher rate of the mobility component, who we know must spend more on heating than others.

A few days ago, the Minister and the Secretary of State attended a meeting with the all-party group on disability, where I pointed out that there is age discrimination in disability benefits. If someone secures DLA before they are 65, the benefit continues after 65, but if someone applies for DLA aged 65 years and one day, they cannot get it. It is an injustice that people who acquire a mobility impairment after the age of 65 cannot apply for DLA, which means that they cannot obtain the DLA mobility component. Without the DLA mobility component, they cannot apply for the Motability scheme, which means that they suffer because of age discrimination.

I am aware that to remove age discrimination for DLA completely would be an expensive business, and there is no point my standing here and pretending that I do not know that. [Interruption.] The last figure that I saw was £3 billion, which is a lot of money. We must acknowledge in principle that age discrimination in disability benefits is wrong and that the attendance allowance that people can claim after the age of 65 is not adequate compensation. If it is not possible to correct that injustice immediately, I hope that the Government will consider moving in that direction by, for example, finding ways in which people can access Motability schemes without being in receipt of the DLA mobility component.

Like several other hon. Members, I want to comment on independent living. User-led organisations are local organisations run and controlled by disabled people, and they are vital in supporting independent living. Recommendation 4.3 in "Improving the life chances of disabled people" states:

> "By 2010, each locality (defined as that area covered by a Council with social services responsibilities) should have a user-led organisation modelled on existing CILs"— centres for integrated living. Well, 2010 is only four years away. Will the Minister comment on that target in her winding-up speech? To my knowledge there are 35 CILs in this country, and some of them are losing local authority contracts, which is a matter for serious concern. I want to know how that recommendation will be achieved in four years' time, which will be a challenge.

I echo my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke) in saying how pleased I was when the Government removed means-testing for disabled facilities grants for families with disabled children. That was a major step forward. Constituents of mine have been pushed into debt because of means-testing, or have been unable to go ahead with making adaptations. The statistics clearly indicate that a large proportion of those who apply for DFG to try to adapt their homes so that their disabled children can access facilities better do not go ahead because of the means-testing involved. I welcome that change, and thank the Government for it.

[Roger Berry]

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill that the £25,000 maximum for the DFG needs to be updated. I support his suggestion that it should be increased to £50,000, as recommended in the Government-commissioned review undertaken by Bristol university. As a former employee of Bristol university, I naturally have to support its recommendations, but I generally do so in any case.

I strongly believe that the Government have an outstanding record on disability. We have seen nothing like it before, and it would not have happened had not this Government been in office. Ever since the Minister—who is, rightly, widely respected inside and outside the House—got the job, she has, with her colleagues, engaged in discussions with disability organisations and other interested parties on how to go forward. We had a year's consultation before we got to the welfare reform Green Paper. I congratulate the Minister on that. Making policy after lots of consultation is far better than doing it before consultation. The life chances strategy has been widely welcomed by all hon. Members. Now we need a speedy and effective implementation of the report's recommendations. I very much welcome the Government's clear commitment to that objective.

4.7 pm

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): It is an honour to speak in this important debate. I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry), who spoke with passion, eloquence, knowledge and detail about these important issues. I found myself immediately agreeing with him on two issues, the first of which was the consensus that we are sharing across the House. I hope that the Minister will be able to pick up on that. As some of my hon. Friends noted, her opening remarks were somewhat partisan and did not do justice to the contributions that have been made since.

Mrs. McGuire: I am astonished by the defensiveness of Conservative Members. Perhaps I could scotch this now, appropriately for a Scotswoman. I was seeking to pay them a compliment by saying that they had come a long way since 1995, when, with some honourable exceptions, they showed a disregard for the way forward for disabled people.

Mr. Ellwood: I am grateful for that clarification. If we misinterpreted the Minister's remarks, apologies are due. However, I hope that in her closing remarks she will take on board the fact that there is consensus, as was eloquently stated by the hon. Member for Kingswood. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman says from a sedentary position that he is in government.

Roger Berry: I apologise for speaking from a sedentary position. I actually said: "Yes, but you have to acknowledge that you were awful in government."

Mr. Ellwood: The hon. Gentleman will not be astonished to learn that I do not agree with those remarks. I was about to pay him further compliments on his speech but I do not know whether I should curtail them now.

There is consensus across the board. I fundamentally agreed with the hon. Gentleman about the date that has been selected for the debate. Our previous debate took place on 10 June 2004, when the European elections were held. Today happens to be the date of the local elections. The single Liberal Democrat smiles. It is a shame that not one other member of the Liberal Democrat team is present to contribute to the important debate. Perhaps the next debate on the subject will be held on the day of the general election and we might thus get an idea of when it will be. Hon. Members have passionately expressed the view that we need more debate on disability. The Government have proposed plans for the next 20 years, and we simply cannot leave the subject to a debate that we hold every two years. I am grateful that the Minister acknowledged that earlier

The subject is wide ranging. It covers everything to do with disability—mobility, manual dexterity, speech, hearing, seeing and memory. That definition is taken from the Government. I want to consider some matters that have not been discussed so far. I do not want to prompt the hon. Member for Kingswood to intervene again, but I stress that much was achieved in 1995 with the Disability Discrimination Act. Yes, more has been done since then, but it would be wrong to dismiss the Conservative Government by saying that they did nothing.

I am pleased that the latest publication from the Prime Minister's strategy unit, "Improving the Life Chances of Disabled People", includes evidence and contributions from several Departments. One Department alone cannot look after the issues, and evidence was taken from the Department for Work and Pensions, the Department of Health, the Department for Education and Skills as well as the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. I commend the report. I hope that it will affect the design of buildings, the workplace and transport, and challenge the outdated attitudes that limit the involvement of disabled people in everyday life.

It is fair to say that attitudes are changing and have changed. We have national role models who are disabled and are now recognised names. I was in the flat next door to Tanni Grey-Thompson when we were at Loughborough university. She excels at her sport and is a household name. She has done much to promote the opportunities available for those in a wheelchair and to allow those of us who are not disabled to understand and open our minds.

Adrian Adepitan is a basketball player who did well with his team and won several medals. He appears on the link clips between programmes on BBC television. That would not have happened 15 or 20 years ago and it shows the progress that has been made.

The hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg), who is no longer in her place—perhaps because she knew that I might embarrass her—is a role model. I was working in the House for Tom King, now Lord King, when she entered Parliament. Again, she is a fantastic example of what can be achieved, and of breaking down barriers and challenging identities that have been associated with disability. It is a two-way process—showing what those who are disabled can achieve but, more important, educating those of us who are not disabled.

Much remains to be done. The Government's report shows that approximately 50 per cent. of disabled people of working age are unemployed and more than 40 per cent. are of low skill. We all face those challenges, whoever is in government. We need to tackle them now.

Statistics also reflect the people who are caught in what could be labelled the disability trap. They find it difficult to work or find an opportunity of work and therefore lean on the benefits system to survive. Incapacity benefit payments highlight that. For example, since 1997, the number of claimants has increased as well as that of those claiming for more than five years. Perhaps the most astounding figure shows that the number of young people who claim incapacity benefit has increased by 70 per cent.

There are 2.7 million people claiming incapacity benefits, and it is a challenge for any Government to try to reduce that number and to get people back into work. Those who want to be economically active should be allowed to do so, and should be given the appropriate opportunities in life. I hope that the Government will be able to meet their target of moving 1 million off incapacity benefit. If we do not tackle these challenges, people with disabilities will resign themselves to being stuck on incapacity benefit for life. I commend the Government's report, and I hope that we shall have a further opportunity to debate these matters in the future.

I have done some research recently on disability issues in Bournemouth. As hon. Members will be aware, we have quite an aged population and an awful lot of care homes. However, the new regulations that have been introduced into the care home environment have, unfortunately, resulted in a decrease in the number of such homes in Bournemouth. Over-regulation and red tape are forcing some of the smaller homes to close because they cannot afford to meet the new standards of regulation being imposed on them. For example, in a care home with only six residents, every room now has to be en suite.

I understand the need for certain dimensions and standards in order for a care home to operate correctly, but I do not think that it was the Government's intention that the end result would be that homes would close. I would be grateful if the Minister could tell us what is being done to review the regulations, and whether there will be any changes to allow care homes, particularly the smaller ones, to continue to work without being threatened by closure because of the high costs that they are now incurring.

We are also concerned about schools, and my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) eloquently spelled out some of the issues facing specialist schools. Will the Minister tell us what are the Government's intentions in regard to specialist schools? Many have been closed as a result of reduced funding. What is going to happen to the integration of pupils? As the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South said, the important factor is choice. We should not force parents to send their children to specialist schools, or force children to be integrated into the main school system. A choice should be available. At the moment, with specialist schools closing, that choice is being reduced.

One of the drawbacks of the disability legislation is that it is so far-reaching that it affects every single classroom and hallway in a school. King's Park primary school in Bournemouth is in a very old building, yet it has managed to meet 99 per cent. of the requirements that have now been placed on it. That is entirely appropriate. However, one classroom on the top floor has three steps going up to it. The school does not have the money to put in a special short stair lift to allow wheelchair access to the room, but no one requires wheelchair access at the moment. Why cannot the school be granted a dispensation to be able to use that classroom, if no disabled people need to use it? Or, if necessary, classes could even be moved round so that the facility could be used. At the moment, it is standing empty, and the school has neither sufficient space nor the money to rectify the situation.

A recent Government initiative has involved the merging of three large bodies—the Equal Opportunities Commission, the Commission for Racial Equality and the Disability Rights Commission—into a single body: the Commission for Equality and Human Rights. I understand that the budget for the new body represents an increase on the budgets for the three former bodies. Where will the extra money go? How will it be accounted for?

I want to talk briefly about the mental health facilities in the Dorset Health Care NHS Trust. The budget for Bournemouth was £59 million in 2003–04, and it went up to £66 million in 2004–05. We should rejoice at that, because it was an excellent increase. However, when we looked at the figures for the staff costs, the heating costs and all the other costs, we realised that they had gone up so much that they overshadowed the increase that I have just mentioned. The net consequence is that the trust has had to make cuts of about £1 million. That includes the closure of a halfway house called Torch, based in Hahnemann house in Bournemouth. This popular facility has been used for those people who were in intensive mental care, but who wanted a stepping-stone to get back into the community. The facility, I am afraid, has been cut simply because Bournemouth cannot afford to run it. That is very sad indeed.

Dorset is one of the best performing areas in the country, as the statistics will show, but, unfortunately, it is now one of the worst funded. That is not an isolated problem, as I understand that about £20 million has been cut from the mental health care budget nationally. The Mental Health Foundation has called that a "cruel and insane" action by the Government. Again, I would like the Minister to comment on why there have been so many cuts to something so fundamentally important.

I also want to comment on the criminal injuries compensation scheme, which was mentioned earlier in relation to the terrorist aspects of 7 July. There has been a lot of media coverage of those who have asked for compensation but have yet to receive it, and I understand that the Prime Minister himself had to intervene to get the scheme to provide the funding for those who were caught up in that horrific disaster.

When I made that intervention, there were rumblings on the other side of the House, but whether we agree that the money should come from that scheme and whether we agree that those who are disabled should be receiving funds are separate arguments. It should not matter whether people are getting money from incapacity benefit, disability living allowance or the criminal injuries compensation scheme: if they deserve that money and are legally entitled to it, it should be provided. However, there is an inherent delay in the system. Worse, if people are affected by a terrorist bomb abroad, they receive absolutely no compensation, whether it be for prosthesis or for loss of limb. I hope that the Government will take that point on board and address it.

To conclude, I am glad to have contributed to the debate and I think we have learned an awful lot today. I emphasise the concern that we should be having such debates regularly. Much needs to be done to help those who are disabled to fulfil their potential and to provide them with the same opportunities that we all have. Disabled people continue to be more likely to live in poverty, have fewer qualifications and experience a poorer standard of living.

I hope that today's debate focuses minds on what is required. While the actions referred to in the report from the Prime Minister's strategy unit are welcome, 20 years is too long to wait to see whether they work. I would like the Minister not to ask me to bring these matters up during business questions, but to say, "Yes, I endorse the idea of having an annual debate to see what progress has been made," rather than leaving it two or three years or until enough pressure has been applied for her to be called to the House. I am sure that she shares those sentiments, although I would like that to be confirmed.

Mrs. McGuire: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ellwood: I was about to conclude, but I am delighted to give way.

Mrs. McGuire: In light of the hon. Gentleman's comments, I take it that he will put pressure on his business managers to use Opposition time for such a debate. The Opposition have days on which they, too, could introduce a debate on disability issues, if they are as crucial to Opposition Members as they appear to have been today.

Mr. Ellwood: I am saddened by that comment because, first, Opposition-day debates are for the Opposition to hold the Government to account. The concerns expressed today show that there is a passion for this issue, and we should not have to use an Opposition-day debate to raise it. It should be a regular theme for debate.

The right hon. Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke) introduced a private Member's Bill to get the Secretary of State for International Development to come to the House once a year to give account for what his Department does with regard to spending international development money. The right hon. Gentleman has also managed to secure the development target of 0.7 per cent. of gross domestic product.

That will be an annual event—we have all been involved with it—and it is a fantastic move forward to show the accountability of the Government. I would very much like them to endorse that. They should not be forced to do so by the Opposition, but should take the initiative and say, "Yes, we would be delighted to come to the House to debate those issues annually."

4.29 pm

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): I listened with great interest to the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood), who obviously researched his contribution carefully. As someone who also represents a seaside area, I was listening for similarities between our areas. Interestingly, his reference to care homes reflects that as we get older we are more likely to be disabled. Sometimes, it is difficult to disentangle issues of the elderly from those of people with disability, which complicates matters for everybody.

I open my remarks with a degree of trepidation, as the Minister referred at the start of her contribution to the fact that the debate in 2004 centred on civil rights. It is important, however, to start off with a reference to human rights and the universal declaration of human rights, which says:

"All are equal before the law and are entitled ... to equal protection of the law."

I believe that human rights and civil rights underpin today's debate. All the interesting and well-informed contributions made by Members are based on the point that people with disability should enjoy the same rights that everybody else enjoys. That should be the template against which we measure any initiatives from central Government, local government and community groups.

Before I consider the detail of the strategy unit report, I want to examine some of the definitions of disability. The Disability Rights Commission produces some helpful facts and figures and lists the many disabilities and conditions that people expect to be included by the term "disabled", from visual impairment to arthritis, cancer, multiple sclerosis, heart disease, depression—interestingly—and diabetes. Recently, the case of a man who is so obese that he finds it difficult to get through doorways or get into a bath—and who cannot bathe himself at home and therefore must go into a hospital setting for basic care—was brought to my attention. That illustrates that we must have an open mind about what constitutes disability and consider how it impairs people's everyday lives in relation to the social model.

We have already heard some statistics about the number of disabled people. As I said, disability increases with age, and as the population is ageing, we need to be aware of that. The World Trade Organisation predicts that depression will be the leading cause of disability by 2020, which links to some of the comments made about the welfare to work Green Paper. An increasing number of sick notes have depression or mental health issues on them rather than physical conditions. Only 50 per cent. of disabled people of working age are in employment compared with 81 per cent. of non-disabled people. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg), I am a member of the Work and Pensions Committee, so I shall not comment on that issue—Members will have to wait for our report, which is to be published shortly. Disabled people are unable to use 70 per cent. of buses and 40 per cent. of the rail network. Almost 50 per cent. of disabled people list transport as their main local concern, and feel that their employment opportunities have been reduced because of poor public transport. Sixty per cent. of disabled people have no car in the household, compared with just 27 per cent. of the general population.

We all have access to a range of statistics highlighting the nature of the problem and the importance, as well as the complexity, of addressing it. However, I do not want to underestimate or gloss over what has already been done I want to refer to some of the extensions of disability rights since 1997, of which I am immensely proud, and pay tribute to the Minister and her colleagues for all their work. Civil rights for disabled people have been strengthened in terms of access to goods and services and also public transport, although there is some way to go in that regard. We have seen the establishment of the Disability Rights Commission and, in October 2004, the extension of employment provisions in the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. That will protect an additional 600,000 disabled workers from discrimination.

Many people are involved in those developments, and many people have benefited. Most recently, there have been the amendments tabled to the Disability Discrimination Act 2005, requiring public authorities to provide equality of opportunity for disabled people. All that has culminated in the strategy unit report. For a document of its size it is very readable, and it contains some very good recommendations. As other Members have said, it presents an ambitious 20-year vision, but we must start somewhere. We must also set an end date so that we can establish targets and measure successes. Otherwise, we shall have only warm words with no result at the end.

The first key area identified in the strategy is independent living, which is the central issue of our debate. It involves the human rights of people with disabilities, who should be able to make choices. Members on both sides of the House have reiterated that services should meet the needs of individuals rather than individuals fitting themselves into services.

The strategy unit's report, entitled "Improving the Life Chances of Disabled People", deals with that issue. It also states:

"Historically, disabled people have been treated as being dependent and in need of 'care', rather than being recognised as full citizens."

In a recent speech, the chairman of the Disability Rights Commission, Bert Massie, took up the same point. He said

"society still sees its best response to disability as care, welfare and charity—rather than equal rights, opportunities and citizenship.

Our instinct is to protect.

But in 'protecting' people we deny humanity rather than liberating it."

I could not agree more.

In a previous incarnation, when I was chair of Lancashire social services, I saw the best social work in practice when it took risks and extended boundaries instead of cocooning people, but there are questions to be raised about that as well. Liberating people is not just a matter of what is provided by local social services departments, or indeed of what the Government enshrine in law; it is a matter of bringing the whole community and the whole family into the debate.

When I was chair of social services and trying to change things, and more recently over the past nine years as a Member of Parliament, I have discussed with parents the needs of their disabled children. Even when a disabled child is 40 or 50, a parent will often want to protect that child. It is understandable and I do not criticise such parents, but the challenge is to give the disabled person freedom to go out into the world, to explore and to make his or her own decisions. That is not an easy task for anyone. As we change the law here and as local authorities and other providers respond, we must bring people with disabilities and their families with us. We should all be working together, and recognising the basic rights of people with disabilities to make choices, to be given freedoms, and not always to be cocooned.

I am proud to be chair of the all-party parliamentary group on social care here at Westminster. We changed our name this year from the all-party social services panel, but given what has been said about care, perhaps we should think of changing it again—possibly to something incorporating the word "independence". In any event, we should all be working together to improve the life chances of people with disabilities by promoting independence rather than dependence on care.

In enabling independent living, we should focus on four key values: choice, control, freedom and equality. That way, we will improve life chances. I welcome the move to direct payments, which will enable people to make choices, and I am looking forward to the assessments of the individual budget pilots. Bringing together sums of money from various different budget heads will give people with disability more freedom and flexibility in determining their own care packages. They will be able to purchase a package that responds to their individual needs.

Danny Alexander: I agree very much with what the hon. Lady is saying about the importance of individual budgets. Does she agree that, for those budgets to be truly effective, the full range of services has to be available at a local level, so that the budgets can be used to obtain the services needed? A number of Members have referred today to the inadequacy of services in certain areas; unless they are adequate, the individual budgets cannot be fully effective.

Mrs. Humble: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. We need to think outside the box, instead of simply focusing on the services currently provided, and to enable providers to come in with new services and to be responsive to the requests of individuals. In fact, that has already been happening in some parts of the country. For example, Lancashire's vibrant and enthusiastic private sector has responded to changes in legislation and in service provision over the years. There are difficulties, however. Funding often comes from the local authority, so in trying to be innovative, the private sector has to rely on traditional local authority purchasing patterns. However, as individuals start purchasing their own services, there will be opportunities for outside providers to be responsive. I am an optimist—I am looking forward to these changes.

Miss Begg: Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend on this point. It is perfectly possible to buy a bath board for £12.99 from Argos, which suggests that many disabled people do not need a bespoke service. Sometimes, only very simple things are needed that can be bought on the open market. Having their own funding stream would enable disabled people to go out and buy such things, thereby giving them the advantage that I already enjoy, as someone in work with a reasonable salary. We need to provide the flexibility to enable those on benefit to have the same level of choice that everyone in this Chamber takes for granted.

Mrs. Humble: My hon. Friend is absolutely right; indeed, an increasing number of organisations sell community care products in their catalogues. Giving money to the individual will open up great new possibilities for them. As I said earlier, I am looking forward to the results of the pilots and the subsequent roll-out to other parts of the country.

I come now to three issues: children, learning disabilities and advocacy services. I endorse many of the remarks that colleagues made about the particular needs of children with disability, but we should consider an issue that has not been touched on thus far: the new Childcare Bill. For the first time, the Government have produced a strategic document for child care provision, but it also recognises the very special needs of families with children with disability, and their difficulties in accessing suitable child care.

The Childcare Bill focuses on providing child care to enable parents to go out to work, but in some instances child care is an end in itself for the child—they learn to socialise, for example. If we are to educate the community about the needs of disabled people, we should start with children and ensure that disabled children mix with other children from the very earliest age, and that their parents get used to such contact. I look forward to the Bill providing more child care for disabled children and support for their families.

The question of quality has come up in the debate on the Childcare Bill. We must ensure that the services provided are of the highest possible quality, which means that staff providing child care are trained to the highest level so that they understand the special needs of children with disability.

I also pay tribute to the Government for abolishing the means test for families with a disabled child who apply for the disabled facilities grant. Families have told me that they are thrilled about that, although often they have worked through the old system and are pleased that others will not have to go through what they went through. People have also asked about the cap on capital expenditure and, given that some alterations on houses are major, that needs to be looked at again.

Other problems arise as children grow up. Thankfully, more children who are born with profound disabilities now live longer, but that can cause difficulties in the family home. Altering the house once is not always the end of the matter, as other alterations may need to be made as the young person grows older.

I am sure that the whole debate could be devoted to disabled children, so I shall merely say to my hon. Friend the Minister that more respite care and specialist equipment should be made available, and that parents need to have access to more support and advice. Above all, we should listen to the voice of the child. Usually, that is the most instructive approach: children know what they want, but sometimes their voices are not heard.

I move on now to people with learning disabilities. Recently, I had the pleasure of speaking at a conference for learning disabled representatives on the learning disabilities partnership boards. The representatives came from across the whole of Lancashire, and they were very pleased at last to be part of the policy-making process determining the services available for them. However, they told me about some of their concerns, and emphasised that they need support if they are to enhance their life chances.

Too often, the eligibility criteria applied by social services departments are so tight that people with moderate learning disabilities find it very difficult to access services. I spoke to one man at the conference who had moderate learning disabilities. He was a member of the partnership board, but he told me that he could not get the help with transport that would allow him to get to meetings. If we are to involve people with disability in the decision-making process, we must help them and look at whether they are being excluded by the eligibility criteria set by local authorities.

I used to be a county councillor, so I fully understand the pressure on local government budgets. A line has to be drawn somewhere, but people with learning disabilities can sometimes feel disadvantaged and we need to listen to what they have to say.

Another matter to come up at that conference was that, sadly, people too often still see the disability rather than the individual. I am sure that all hon. Members are aware of that, but I was surprised to hear how often it happens across a range of services, including health and education. I am pleased to say that it is less common in social services, as I hope that people with disabilities would be seen as individuals at least by those who work in social care. Educating people to see the individual and not the disability is a major task, especially when it comes to people with learning disabilities.

I was very pleased that the Mental Capacity Act 2005 enshrined in law the fact that we are all able to make decisions, and that it must never be assumed that someone is incapable of doing so. Whether or not a person is capable of making a particular decision must be tested. I meet people with learning disabilities and they are often capable of making a whole series of decisions. There may be a complex financial matter that they cannot deal with, but many people without learning disabilities have difficulties with complex financial matters.

All too often when I visit a home in the community for a group of people with learning disabilities, the care staff—I am sure with the best of intentions—make decisions on their behalf instead of asking them what they think, what the care staff can get for them and what they want out of something. Staff will require a lot of training on the Mental Health Act so that they understand that they can no longer do that. They have to carry out functional tests and respect the decisions of people with learning difficulties.

People fail to listen to those with disabilities, so it is important that there are independent advocacy services to speak on their behalf. I have the grand title of president of the Blackpool advocacy. It is an excellent organisation that provides information, support and representation to enable individuals to access services. Advocates accompany people to meetings and, importantly, explain the procedures and processes to them and what they will find. Sometimes they make sure that there is appropriate access to the meeting. Sadly, it still sometimes happens when people with a disability are invited to a meeting that either they cannot get in or, if they are hearing impaired, there is not a loop system, or, if they are visually impaired, there is not the necessary equipment for them to read documents. An advocacy service can help them throughout all that, ensure that information is presented in the right manner and that the setting takes into account the particular disability of the individual.

Recently, the community learning disability nurse made a presentation to the Blackpool advocacy. She highlighted some of the barriers for people with learning disabilities to access services. They can forget appointments, are often afraid to go to the doctor, dentist or nurse and can have transport problems or communication problems. In those circumstances, sometimes they do not attend the appointments or meetings that they should, or cannot communicate their concerns. In those cases, an advocacy service is essential. Certainly in Blackpool, the advocacy service also provides support to children. Children's advocacy is important for some of the reasons that I outlined earlier. Sometimes the wishes of a disabled child are not the same as those of the parent or those of the professional. Again, it is important that the voice of the child is listened to. An advocacy service can provide support and ensure that that happens.

The Children's Society runs a disability advocacy project in London. It, too, gets positive feedback from the young people who use its services. Of course there are no guarantees of good advocacy services around the country. When I describe to colleagues what happens in Blackpool, they say that that does not happen in their locality. I urge the Minister to consider establishing a national framework for advocacy services. There is a national organisation for advocacy services, but the services have been set up individually around the country, have different funding mechanisms and provide different services.

The Mental Capacity Act 2005 offered an opportunity to promote advocacy services and I argued the case for them during its passage. The Government have acknowledged the need for legislation on advocacy services for people who lack capacity and have no family or friends. I want advocacy services to be provided much more widely, although I welcome the Government's consultation in relation to the Act.

National standards are being considered, under the legislation, to improve the life chances of people with learning disabilities in a broader setting. I urge the Government to put independent advocacy services on a much more secure financial footing, and to give them a statutory base. Sadly, the chief executive of Blackpool Advocacy, like many chief executives of charities, spends most of her time chasing funding instead of delivering vital services.

Direct payments have been implemented. Individual budgets have been developed. The health and social care White Paper has made proposals to improve preventive services. The Equality Bill will set up a new commission and we already have the Human Rights Act 1998, the Mental Capacity Act and the improving life chances strategy. Together, all those measures provide an excellent framework in which to develop and improve services for people with disability, to enhance their future life chances.

The Care Standards Act 2000 has not been mentioned so far. It set a framework for service quality and introduced three important bodies that can help us in our campaign to improve life chances. The Commission for Social Care Inspection not only supervises and inspects services, but produces interesting discussion papers on their improvement. Recently, it issued a document on brokerage schemes, which help people with learning disabilities access individual budgets. The Social Care Institute for Excellence has amassed much excellent information and data about services, about what is available and what should be available, which is useful for Members of Parliament and service users. It provides excellent support for the all-party group on social care. Its research can be used to enhance services and to help people work out what should be provided in their area.

The third organisation is the General Social Care Council. Earlier, I drew attention to the role of social care staff who support people with disability. They are an important group and we should acknowledge the special role of social workers. We are all asking for improvements in the process for assessing children, carers and adults with disability, but the social workers who undertake that vital work need support and recognition of their position. Their job is often difficult; they tread the mine field of the competing—sometimes conflicting—interests of the disabled person, their family, their friends and other people who offer them advice and support.

Many care workers provide care in individuals' homes or residential settings. Sadly, all too often they are not very well paid. People who are trying to recruit high quality care workers are competing with supermarkets, which pay more. There is an issue about raising the profile of the social care work force and making such employment a real choice for individuals. At the end of the day, such people can do so much good in supporting people with disability and providing them with the right level of care.

I began with a quote about human rights and I will finish with another—this time from Eleanor Roosevelt. In 1958, she said:

> "Where, after all, do universal human rights begin? In small places, close to home—so close and so small that they cannot be seen on any map of the world. Yet they are the world of the individual person".

In improving those small places for people with disability we will make a huge improvement to their lives. I am looking forward to that.

4.56 pm

Gordon Banks (Ochil and South Perthshire) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in today's debate and am happy to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble). I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg), who is not in the Chamber at this point. I found her contribution and her first-hand experiences extremely valuable and the debate has been all the better for them.

I want my contribution to be quite brief. The objective of any Government strategy on disabled people must be to focus on improving those people's quality of life and opportunities. We have heard of many achievement of which we can proud, but they must be viewed as a stepping stone towards more challenging, but hopefully more rewarding, reform.

We have already heard from my hon. Friend the Minister and from other Members that, before my time here, the House passed the Disability Rights Commission Act 1999, which gave rise to the commission and its statutory duties to promote equal opportunities and eliminate discrimination in this area. The Disability Discrimination Act 2005 amended and extended the 1995 legislation. In addition, while in government, Labour has introduced the new deal for the disabled, which has resulted in more disabled people being in work than ever before—about 750,000 more than in 1998. Working tax credits for disabled workers have delivered further support to many people once they have returned to work.

The experience, however, is not always good. Difficulties are still evident as some disabled people seek out the necessary support. I would like to take this opportunity to bring to the Minister's attention instances in which people have come to me with first-hand experiences of cases in which wheelchair users and those with sight problems are not benefiting from even good advice, let alone the best advice. That can create additional damage and further isolate and demoralise the people on the receiving end of that poor advice, and it does nothing for us as a society in general.

I encourage my hon. Friend the Minister to meet the small group of people who have contacted me about their difficulties so that she can hear for herself, at first hand, where there are still gaps in the system that we can address. In addressing them, we would improve the quality of life of many more people, as well as the economic and social condition of our country. It is only by listening to the people who are affected by disability that we can best deliver the help and support that is required.

The Government are removing a significant number of boundaries. The DWP document, "A new deal for welfare", to which the Minister and other hon. Members referred, sets challenging targets for increasing employment opportunities for disabled and incapacitated people. One of the aims is to reduce the number of employees who leave work because of disability. That is very important, but it is a role that employers must approach responsibly. We have heard some disturbing comments today about the role of and experiences provided by some employers.

Employers must see the value of the person, not the disability—a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood. I agree with the Government that employers, local authorities and health professionals and the Government need to come together to deliver the best results, but employers must have a much better understanding of our objectives and expectations and the role that they will play in delivering the objectives, and I say that as someone who has been an employer for 20 years.

The Minister will remember attending a recent meeting with me on the very subject of support for the disabled, and I am sure that she will have been heartened by the general response of most of the people present that night—whether disabled or able-bodied—and the recognition that we have done a lot and that we are planning to do even more. However, in bringing my brief contribution to an end, I urge the Minister and the Department to be aware that we must always keep listening to the experts in the field—the individuals who live with disability every day in life.

5.1 pm

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Ochil and South Perthshire (Gordon Banks). I was in the Chamber when he made his maiden speech, and he has just made a very good short contribution. Certainly, one of the aspects that he brings to the debate is his business experience. I hope that the Minister will meet his delegation and take on board what he said about the role of employers.

We have had a very constructive, wide-ranging and positive debate, and I have always maintained that both parties have a good record on disability and disabled people. The previous Government had an excellent record, as was pointed out by the shadow Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt). The late right hon. Nick Scott was a quite superb Minister for the disabled. Indeed, as my hon. Friend also pointed out, my right hon. Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) was a very distinguished holder of that office. It is a pity that in the past—not so much today—Ministers and Government Members have been somewhat grudging and patronising in their view of the Conservative party's record on such matters when in government. The time has come to accept that our record in government was good. This Government's record is also good, and I certainly welcome what they have done. I give credit to them for the Disability Discrimination Act 2005, for the welfare reform Green Paper and for the report, "Improving the life chances of disabled people". They have been working hard. They have had a series of very imaginative and hard-working Ministers. Indeed, the current holder of that post is no exception.

There is a very long way to go indeed. When one looks at some of the statistics, one sees that disabled people have a lower employment rate than any group. Only about 50 per cent. of disabled people of working age are employed. Furthermore, disabled people who are working earn 30 per cent. less than non-disabled people. More than 40 per cent. of disabled people are low-skilled. About 25 per cent. of disabled people of working age are over 50. More than 50 per cent. of families with disabled children are in or near child poverty—so there is still a long, long way to go.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) mentioned one of my concerns when he referred to the life chances report. According to the report, the target is that

"By 2025, disabled people in Britain should have full opportunities and choices to improve their quality of life, and will be respected and included as equal members of society."

That is a very long way off, and we must all have the ambition of ensuring that we achieve those goals well within the 19 or 20-year framework that has been laid down. Any Government should have ambitions to achieve those targets before 2025, so we must try to do so.

Her Majesty's Government are right to advance a programme to tackle welfare reform, but that is largely a debate for another day. I applaud the Minister, however, on her comments on the transition to adulthood. I think that she used the words, "cliff edges", to characterise the position of young adults who suddenly find that the support that was in place suddenly disappears: they have nowhere to turn, as there is no provision for them. I am pleased, too, that hon. Members on both sides of the House drew attention to the serious problems faced by parents who have children with learning difficulties. My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) has a great deal of experience in this area, and he pointed out that the statementing system for children of school age is onerous, bureaucratic and in dire need of reform. When those children become young adults and take part in training schemes, many of them live at home with their parents, but often things come to a crunch when they reach another cliff edge and they have to move out, perhaps because their parents have to go into a residential home or they pass away. I have dealt with many constituency cases in which young adults with learning difficulties become middle-aged adults with learning difficulties. Often, the support system does not offer them anything once their parents pass away. The Government should look at that problem very carefully, and I hope that the Minister will address it in her winding-up speech.

We heard some good examples of initiatives that are under way in hon. Members' constituencies. I pay tribute to the West Norfolk disability information service in my constituency and its director, Jonathan Toye, who works tirelessly to ensure that disability rights are always at the top of agenda of local authorities and other Norfolk bodies. King's Lynn and West Norfolk borough council and Norfolk county council have an excellent record of doing all that they can to help disabled people and ensuring that their service provision takes into account the rights and interests of disabled people. Both councils have a long and distinguished record of doing their level best and achieving very high standards indeed.

I asked Jonathan Toye to update me on facilities for disabled people in my constituency and the immediate priorities. Overall, the picture is encouraging. Most local businesses have responded to the challenge, and are doing exactly what they should. It is not just a question of helping disabled people and of providing facilities for them but of making the right business decisions. He cited a couple of food outlets in my constituency. Pauline's Pantry is a small sandwich bar in King's Lynn that has recently invested in disabled facilities and has gone from strength to strength. It is very disabled-friendly, and it has been awarded an accolade by the Eastern Daily Press. He cited a larger delicatessen/restaurant called Norbury's, which has recently undertaken a major refurbishment programme and has taken on board the requirements suggested by WNDIS. Both those businesses should be congratulated. I visited one of them recently, and I know that both are going from strength to strength.

Mr. Toye said that there is a slightly larger business in King's Lynn, the Duke's Head hotel, which has not listened entirely to the advice that was put to it. He hopes that some of the larger businesses will take on board exactly what he and his colleagues have said. As I have said, it is good for businesses to be disablement friendly.

Mr. Toye mentioned also the dial-a-stop bus service, which collects people with limited mobility from their homes and is working well. Unfortunately, the space that has been allocated for the service is quite a long way away from the main part of the bus station. Most of the people with limited mobility who come into the centre of King's Lynn want to shop at Sainsbury's. They want to visit the shops and the services in the middle of the town. It would be a great deal easier if they could be set down near to King's Lynn museum, where there is an available stop. Unfortunately, the county council is not being as helpful as it might be. I have written to the council and I hope to have a positive reply.

At the margin, life for disabled people can be made a great deal easier where authorities put a certain amount of imagination and common sense into the equation, think first about disabled people and work out whether taking a small step in the right direction could make a significant difference to people's lives.

I will not speak for much longer because I was not in the Chamber for the entire debate. However, I think that we have had a constructive debate. It has brought into focus several key issues. I hope that the Minister and the shadow Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell), will touch on other points, such as the role of carers and the problems that many disabled people face not because there are not enough benefits, but because accessing the benefits is extremely complicated. Quite often, disabled people are given different opinions and advice.

Carers, as my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Surrey said, are saving the Government £57 billion a year. I hope that the Minister will touch on respite care. I hope also that the Minister and the shadow Minister will take up the serious problems that we are all facing in our constituencies because of the added burdens and regulations that are placed on small care homes. It is a sad fact that many of these homes are closing.

The UK has come a long way in its treatment of disabled people. It has come a long way also in how it has opened up many new horizons for disabled people. I hope that we will achieve the aims laid down by the Government long before 2025.

5.13 pm

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): I, too, welcome the debate and the tone of the contributions made to it on both sides of the Chamber. There is a common message coming from this debate, that although we have made progress there is still a great deal more to do.

I thank the Minister for setting the tone of the debate. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt), who made his first appearance at the Opposition Dispatch Box to make a full speech, for his kind personal remarks about both my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) and myself. If I may say, without any patronising whatever, my hon. Friend has a fantastic grasp of the subject, which he displayed both in principle and in detail.

The House would also expect me to thank—and I do so genuinely—my hon. Friends the Members for Blaby (Mr. Robathan), for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), for

[Mr. Tim Boswell]

Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood) and for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) for the interesting and challenging contributions that they made, sometimes grainy and sometimes not without criticism, but always well meant, well spirited and to the point. I do not exclude Members on other Benches, but if in the interests of time I do not go comprehensively through the list, I think that the House will forgive me. I hope not to be invidious if I single out the right hon. Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke), who is always extremely interesting. We did have a little flurry, but I found myself in agreement with nearly everything that he had to say.

I shall also mention the hon. Member for Kingswood (Roger Berry), who has done more about this subject than almost anybody else and made an interesting contribution, including his comment about the role of the voluntary sector and its relationship with the statutory sector, and the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg), who made a remarkably eloquent contribution. What emerged from it, if I may say so, is the one attribute that persons who have disabilities must have—a very strong will, or a pair of elbows to push aside the difficulties. She has the articulacy, the ability and the passion to do that. Sadly, many people lack the resolve, spirit or capacity to argue for themselves, or to access the services that could do so on their behalf.

The debate has been largely constructive. I shall touch briefly on two aspects that might have caused a flurry or a certain difficulty in the exchanges across the Benches, then I shall touch on four general themes and end with a personal comment.

On points of difficulty, we probably ought to move on from history. There will always be a difference of emphasis—it would be slightly unhealthy if there were not—between the parties as to their relative contribution. It was acknowledged by the Minister, who said that she was trying to pay compliments to the Opposition, that a fairly substantial contribution was made by the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. However, that was not the first thing to be done by a Conservative Government. Having been a Minister in the Department for Education in 1992–93, I happen to recall, modestly, that we legislated for special educational needs and the new tribunal, for example. The historic record over the years shows that Governments have begun to see needs, have become sensitive to them and eventually have begun to respond to them.

As for the attitudes of people in my party, there may have been some coded messages about individuals. All I would say for myself is that it is almost seven years since I assumed Front-Bench responsibility for my party on disability issues, and three years since I passed that to others. I do not think that in the whole of my time, my attitude to these matters has changed very much. I certainly do not intend it to have done. It may just be—to draw an analogy from the sun now streaming through the windows of the Chamber—that one can see the issues in a clearer and sunnier light than one might have done seven years ago.

On the second possible cause of prickliness, I have allies across the Chamber. From the remarks made by a number of hon. Members, it is clear that the Government and the business managers must not get into the habit of using disability issues as a convenient filler on election days. It would be difficult to send a more eloquent signal of the marginalisation of disability issues. As a final challenge to the Minister, she will have heard the requests for an annual debate, and I would be glad to hear her concede that principle tonight. If she feels unable to do so, all I can do, with allies across the Chamber, is to point out that the all-party disability group will be queuing up in Westminster Hall every year to debate the subject. So we should. Disability issues affect large numbers of our constituents—nationally, perhaps one in five of the adult population, their families and their carers. We should respond generously and appropriately to them.

On the four themes that I promised to deal with, first, I welcome the general shift in the debate towards outcomes of disability policy. That is intended not to sideline or downplay the rights-based approach, but to emphasise that that is a necessary but not a sufficient condition for improving the life chances of disabled people.

I look forward with interest—an interest that I have developed since I first became engaged in these matters, and so in wider equality issues too—to the results of the inquiry that Trevor Phillips is leading in the equalities review. In the end, what our disabled constituents and their families want is, as far as possible, equality of outcome or a greater approximation to equality than we have had hitherto. To those who raise the other equality issues of race and gender, I should say that it has taken a very long time in those strands, too, and we are still not yet there.

I cautiously welcome the Government's tendency to promote the empowerment of disabled people to take their own decisions. It is set out—rather inelegantly, in my judgment—in the terms of reference for the independent living fund review published yesterday, as a "more person-centred and coherent support for disabled people".

I do not much like the language, but I like the theme. What we must do now is carry out the pilots in good faith and evaluate them carefully, for two reasons. First, any appropriate help that may be required for disabled people to take decisions should ensure that such people function as their own best purchasers. I believe that they can. Secondly—and this amounts to a warning—we must ensure that the whole exercise does not become a cynical one of shuffling between different budgets resources that are inherently inadequate to meet the needs.

Beyond that, I shall mention three specific issues. One was touched on by many hon. Members in the debate, and may be described broadly as access. Part of the issue is a matter of compliance by service providers and owners of premises with their full legal obligations under the whole suite of disability legislation, including that on access to premises. Recent correspondence with one of my constituents suggests that, despite the efforts that the two district councils in my constituency have certainly made, she is profoundly sceptical about what is available. I am wheeling her in to meet the town council so that she can give it the benefit of her advice. I do not believe that there are many public or private sector organisations whose performance in this area is wholly satisfactory.

The new arrangements for the Office for Disability Issues have also been touched on, but the relationship between that organisation and the Disability Rights Commission has not yet been fully explained. I hope that the Minister will be able to tell the House how she sees those two bodies working together to monitor achievements. One of the difficulties is that the DRC deals with complaints, legislation and legal challenges, while the ODI will be examining outcomes. Their different philosophies may not make it easy for them to work together. As part of the reporting process, we need a proper account—some samples, surveys or mystery shopping—of what is actually happening on the access agenda. I am pleased to see that the Minister is responding positively to that point.

The second part of access is access to work and several hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Kingswood, have spoken eloquently about its importance. Part of the problem is about the readiness of employers to meet their own obligations not to discriminate and to make reasonable adjustments. A great deal also hinges on access to work. It is, frankly, a hidden treasure and I fear that that is so because if it were not, it would cost too much on ministerial budgets. That is not a satisfactory or stable outcome. If it is that good, we ought to use it. As the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) said, it would save money in the end. I shall say more in a few moments about spending to save in a different context.

I also want to mention housing, which I am pleased to say is now taking on greater importance. From the work that I did some years ago on the valuing people initiative, I remember the concern about the sufficiency of accommodation for people with learning disabilities, which a number of hon. Members have touched on. However, the issue goes far wider than that, because it covers adequate housing for people and families with all kinds of disabilities, and I welcome the recent changes in the disabled facilities grant.

In its briefing, the DRC specifically calls for more action to build adaptable and accessible housing by adopting the lifetime homes standards for new housing and using existing housing more efficiently by ensuring the more widespread use of the accessible housing register. It goes on to say that it believes that the code for sustainable housing was a missed opportunity in that respect. Many housing authorities currently judge disability issues to be peripheral to their main duties, but, as the DRC has rightly pointed out, in December local authorities' disability equality duty will kick in, which means that they must handle the issue more positively.

Technology is not a substitute for effective care or services, but it can enhance care or services. It clearly relates to housing, and I was fascinated to visit the demonstration house in Northampton, which is a joint project between the borough and specialists in social services. The house draws on expertise to develop technologies for people with deteriorating mental capacity to enable them to stay in their own homes safely for longer. That technology is also invaluable in the context of work—for example, in helping visually impaired people to operate computers. However, we must accept that it creates a crunch in attitudes, and sometimes results in public authorities having to make particularly difficult decisions. A better piece of equipment means the imposition of an up-front cost; that also applies to analogue and digital hearing aids, and manual and electric wheelchairs. It is likely that the capital costs will be substantial, and public authorities may have to adjust their budgets to spend to save, and to benefit the life chances and employment chances of users.

My deepest area of concern across the whole field has not been touched on today as much as I expected. Public administration in general, and the benefits system in particular, are driven by rules made in the interests of fairness and clarity. That need for precision inevitably conflicts with the practical experience of disability issues, where conditions may be complex and, above all, fluctuate from day to day. At best, even if someone's condition is stable, it may show either an improving or deteriorating trend. It is very difficult, and also rather invidious, to fix a disability in time and for ever.

I am pleased by the emphasis that a number of hon. Members have put on mental health conditions, which account for a striking 40 per cent. of all new incapacity benefit claims. The benefit system is understandably based on yes or no answers to questions such as, "Are you at work?" "Should you be at work?" "Could you be at work?" and "Are you qualified for this benefit or not?" Even if the original decision on, for example, a personal capacity test is correct, it may very soon be obsolete. Moreover, in spite of recent welcome changes in the linking rules and the greater sympathy, which I acknowledge, shown by Ministers to this issue, the fear still remains among disabled people that if they go back to work, if they try work and break down, or even if they find that they cannot work for a full week at a time and need a shorter working time, they will somehow have surrendered their benefit and be left exposed.

I say that particularly in the context of any change in welfare reform and the safeguarding of historic incapacity benefits. If somebody goes back to work, the question will arise as to what happens if they then find that they cannot carry on and run the risk of losing their old benefit or having to re-enter at a lower rate. I do not have a precise prescription in this area. We must simply keep plugging away collectively at making the whole system more flexible—without, of course, devaluing it.

I want to close on a rather more personal note. The broad facts about inequality of outcome for disabled people are pretty well known, certainly to all participants in this debate. They are not contentious, but they are alarming. For young people, the position is particularly depressing, with disabled 16-year-olds twice as likely not to be in education, employment or training as their non-disabled contemporaries. Furthermore, a study carried out in 2002 estimated that a quarter of disabled young people with learning disabilities will have left compulsory education with no transition plan in place. There is already a pre-existing legal obligation to provide transition planning, but that seems not to have been done—certainly in relation to education, but also more widely.

There is always a need to be sober and remember that even if we have legislated in the past, the things that we legislated for may not be happening because of the pressures on local authorities, inadvertence or lack of attention. As we have heard, the position is hardly better for disabled adults, with research for the Joseph

Rowntree Foundation showing that about a third of disabled adults of working age live in income poverty. Incidentally, that is a somewhat higher proportion than 10 years ago.

The issue for us all—the reason why we are here this afternoon when we could be electioneering—is what we are going to do about it. I think that there is a common will that we should do something about it, and that there is for us, and indeed for the country, a fork in the road in terms of attitude. We have the chance to say yes or no in tackling these issues. Some columnists in certain newspapers, most of which we could predict, will say from time to time that we should not take this too far. In fact, they usually have something of merit to say, at least in challenging us before we pick up this agenda too comprehensively or glibly. In my view, if we were to turn away from this and say that it is not worth it, that political correctness has got out of hand, or that the resources are not great enough, we would be letting ourselves and our constituents down.

At the extreme of that attitude, I suspect that quite a number of businesses, particularly but not exclusively small and medium-sized enterprises, and not a few public authorities, would do nothing about this unless and until they were forced to. I happen to know of a recent employment tribunal case—because it involved a constituent of mine—in which the Department for Work and Pensions itself was found to be not compliant, and had to pay compensation to one of its staff. I am not saying that that happens often, but it clearly happened once. It is more likely that public authorities will pay lip service to the new disability equality duty, and then do the least that they can. For example, they will shift budgets to somebody else wherever possible, and take the line of minimal compliance with standards. That, in brief, is what I call the no approach.

I believe that we cannot leave it there. We must be prepared to say yes to disabled people. First, a large part of the population has one disability or another, or a family member or someone for whom they care in that position, or know that they may be in that position in the future. Secondly—and perhaps more positively, given the wonderful concept of reasonable adjustments—disabled people can, are prepared to and want to make a significant economic and wider contribution to society. Finally, there is the moral case. We should be in the business of building a more inclusive and confident society. Nobody should knowingly or wilfully be left out.

5.35 pm

Mrs. McGuire: First, I thank—

Mr. Robathan: With the leave of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The Minister moved the motion, in which case she is entitled to reply to it without seeking the leave of the House.

Mrs. McGuire: I am sure that you would not be surprised, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to know that, as a former Whip, I knew that I had moved the motion to adjourn the House at 12.20 pm, a few hours ago.

I was about to thank the hon. Member for Daventry (Mr. Boswell) for his thoughtful comments in winding up the debate. I shall deal with the specific issues that he raised shortly but his speech illustrated what I tried to say about the Opposition on various occasions this afternoon. I shall embarrass him, but, led by people such as him, the Opposition has come a long way on disability rights. That is worth stating. Although I scratched at a bit of a sore earlier, the road that the Opposition have travelled must be acknowledged and I wanted to do that.

I thank all hon. Members for their contribution today. I agree with the hon. Member for Daventry that the debate has been thoughtful, with some fantastic contributions, regardless of whether it is the right or wrong day to hold the debate. I thank especially my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang), my hon. Friends the Members for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg), for Kingswood (Roger Berry), for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble), of course, my hon. Friend and neighbour the Member for Ochil and South Perthshire (Gordon Banks) and last, but not least, my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill (Mr. Clarke). All those contributions were valuable, together with those from Opposition Members.

I should like to comment on some of the major issues that were raised and, hopefully, answer some of the specific questions. In some instances, although they were related to disability and disabled people, they are matters specifically for other Departments. I shall ensure that ministerial colleagues' attention is drawn to those matters.

I congratulate the hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) on his first speech from the Dispatch Box. We will give him the card that specifies the difference between incapacity benefit and disability living allowance so that he is well aware of it.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned Scope's publication about access to polling stations, which was a very appropriate subject for comment today. He will not be surprised to learn that we have not been able to verify the accuracy of some of Scope's findings. However, we have taken action to improve disabled access to polling stations. Returning officers are now required to display a large version of the ballot paper, for example. Each polling station must also be supplied with a tactile voting device to assist blind and partially sighted electors, so that they can vote without the need for assistance. For some time, blind voters have been able to take a companion into the polling station to assist them with casting their ballot, rather than having to rely on the presiding officer—a stranger—to help them.

The hon. Gentleman also spoke about a young woman who was injured in the 7/7 bombings in London. I hope that he will understand that it is inappropriate for me to get involved in individual cases; indeed, I am precluded in law from doing so. However, the subject was also raised by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Ellwood), and I want to place on record that, as of 21 April, about £2 million-worth of compensation has been paid out. Some of those compensation payments are interim awards, for the understandable reason that complex issues relate to the injuries and disabilities caused by the bombing.

We are not complacent about this matter, and the young woman whose case the hon. Member for South-West Surrey raised is a reminder that we cannot afford to be. I hope that her case has also highlighted to hon. Members and to the country the sheer tenacity and bravery shown by many people when they become disabled, even in such horrible circumstances as the 7/7 bombings. The hon. Gentleman also spoke about the man from Buckinghamshire with a learning disability. Obviously, I cannot comment on that, because it is an abuse case that is currently being investigated by the police.

The hon. Gentleman raised a number of other points, but I would like to concentrate on the transport issues that he mentioned, in particular aviation. He will be aware that the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 does not cover aviation and shipping services, but both industries have voluntary codes of practice on meeting the needs of disabled people. The Department for Transport, in conjunction with the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee, is monitoring compliance with the codes, and that work is due to report shortly. The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) also asked a question about that. We are committed to legislating if the voluntary approach proves ineffective.

Several hon. Members mentioned aviation, and pointed out that it involves an international market. In airports, the ground side is covered by our own disability discrimination legislation, but the code of conduct on planes is effectively part of an international discussion. I think that it was the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and wherever who highlighted that fact that we raised this issue during our EU presidency.

I do not, however, want to lose sight of the changes that have been made in transport. More than 4,000 accessible rail vehicles have already been introduced into service, and 46 per cent. of our buses are now accessible. I know that that might not be an acceptable statistic to the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan), but there we have it. That figure is now rising to 80 per cent. in some of our urban areas.

Taxis are also now getting more accessible. I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South has left the Chamber, because I remember trying to get into a London taxi with her and other colleagues in 1997. I am not sure whether the Whip, my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell and Wishaw (Mr. Roy), was there, but my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South eventually decided that the best way for us all, including her, to get a taxi was to hide her. That is exactly what we did until the door was opened, and before we could say Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey, we were all in the taxi. I hope that the hon. Member for Blaby appreciates that there has been movement.

To come to the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey, we do need to get a shorter constituency title, although I appreciate that he represents a wonderful part of the country and I do not want to insult it. On the independent living centres, which were referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood, the issue of funding was highlighted recently at their own conference in Southampton, which was run in parallel with the Local Government Association and the Association of Directors of Social Services. They are working on a funding protocol, and the Department of Health is linking closely with those developments.

The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey also raised the issue of the driver refusing to take a disabled passenger. That is unacceptable and there is no excuse for it. I can assure him that the Department for Transport is funding driver awareness videos and the extension of the DDA part III duties will impact on transport in December. That will start to encourage companies to raise awareness.

I want to thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East in relation to a couple of points. First, he said very kind words about my late father, who was much involved with promoting disabled rights when he was chairman of social work in Strathclyde. Specifically, he prompted some support for BlindCraft in the Glasgow area. I am aware of the work that has been done to turn around the BlindCraft factory outlet in Edinburgh, and I know that my right hon. Friend has been very supportive of it.

My right hon. Friend also made the important point that, for some disabled people, sheltered employment might be necessary. We must look at it as part of the overall menu of opportunities for disabled people. I want to tell him a wee bit of personal history. When I was born, a good number of years ago, I was put in a BlindCraft Moses basket, and very good Moses baskets they were. As a matter of fact, that basket was so old it was probably made by Moses. Thirty years ago, I put my own second born into another Moses basket, because that was the tradition in our part of the world.

I come now to the hon. Member for Blaby. What can I say about him? I think that his motivations are honourable and his instincts are probably right, but—how can I put this nicely?—there are still some steps that he has to take along the road to where some of his hon. and right hon. Friends have already parked themselves.

I fear that the hon. Gentleman tried to imply that there is a hierarchy of disability, although I might have misinterpreted him. I think there are some issues that he needs to reflect upon. However, I welcome his remarks on the work that DFID has done in the developing world and I take very seriously his comment that we need action, not just statements, in that respect.

Mr. Robathan rose—

Mrs. McGuire: All right then, I give way.

Mr. Robathan: At the risk of breaking up the love fest, might I take the Minister back to the issue of the Routemaster bus? She seems shocked that people might like the Routemaster, but I would like her to tell me what research was done to find out the opinion of the people of London on whether they thought the Routemaster was good. While it was totally unfriendly to wheelchairs, it had a conductor who could help people with other mobility or sight problems on to the bus. Furthermore, it was a great deal safer for cyclists than the bendy bus. I can tell her that it was much more popular with the people.

Mrs. McGuire: The hon. Gentleman needs to realise that the Routemaster bus, in spite of its historical significance, was not just inaccessible for wheelchair users; it was not particularly friendly to people with other disabilities, and in many respects was probably unfriendly to most of the population. I know that it is a kind of historical icon for him, but I understand that the Mayor of London has said that it can still do heritage tours. I hope that the hon. Gentleman, when he recovers fully from what he said was his temporary disability, will be able to enjoy the Routemaster bus on tourist routes.

I thank the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) for his comments on children with dyslexia and dyspraxia, as I am aware of the issues in relation to getting statements for such children. I congratulate him specifically on his comments on mental health and the scaremongering about the development of projects relating to mental health conditions. I have had some experience of that, and I know exactly what he was alluding to. We all need to work together to recognise that having a mental health condition does not make someone a danger to society, a criminal or any less a good neighbour. The most telling fact is that many people in this country think at this point of time that they will never have a mental health condition, but they may develop one. We need to think in those terms. I hope that he will accept that we extended protection under the DDA to people with mental health conditions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South apologised earlier for that fact that she could not be here for the winding-up speeches. She made an eloquent speech, which came from the heart, as it came from her experience. As I have said, I have had experience of trying to get into taxis with her in London, and I know some of the daily difficulties that she had to face, not just here but in other parts of the country. One of the significant changes down here is that there will no longer be parliamentary receptions, certainly for Scottish MPs, that do not have an accessible venue, because the rest of us will not go to any company's or organisation's parliamentary reception to which she cannot get access.That has changed the mood and the attitude of organisations and companies towards disabled people. I was delighted that she mentioned the devolved Administrations, with which we are working closely, as disability rights is a reserved issue and cuts across all parts of the United Kingdom. I also compliment her on mentioning the Scottish Federation of Small Businesses, which does a significant amount of work promoting the disability agenda among its members.

I was going to compliment my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood on being another warrior of the 1995 campaign, but in the new consensual environment that I hope that I have established, perhaps that would be inappropriate. I know that he still wears the campaign medal secretly under his jacket. As always, I recognise his valuable contribution to these debates and his continuous promotion of access to work, which, we all agree, is one of the great success stories of the Government. We have quadrupled the amount of money going into it. Yes, we inherited that programme from the previous Government, but in our opinion it was underfunded. Let me say to hon. Members that we do not hide the access to work programme—we spend a significant amount of money promoting it through local medical practices and our disability employment advisers.

I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood mentioned disability employment advisers. We are trying to ensure that DEAs have the training that is essential to do the work that we want them to do in supporting disabled people into employment.

My hon. Friend made various other points, one of which related to whether the contracts for voluntary sector organisations in programme delivery should be for one year. I assure him that Ministers in the Department for Work and Pensions are awaiting a report on the issue, and acknowledge the importance of some of his comments.

The hon. Member for Bournemouth, East raised issues relating to care home standards. He gave the impression that it was all about bureaucracy, but I would like to think that it is about improving standards. He also referred to specialist schools. We have never said that parents do not have the right to send their children to such schools—there is an understanding that every disabled child should be offered a place in mainstream education—but it is not a case of either/or. The Department for Education and Skills has been trying to develop joint campuses where children can still be given specialist training if that is what their parents want, while at the same time benefiting from the full educational and social experience of being at school. We should bear in mind that years ago children who were taken away from their local communities were not given the rounded education that many deserved, and some of the social interaction that comes from education was not part of their experience.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood made some telling comments about human rights. I know that she is a doughty fighter when it comes to issues relating to disabled people. I shall be interested to see whether she does encourage her colleagues to change the name of the all-party parliamentary group on social care, but the point that I shall retain from her speech is that we should listen to the voice of the child. I agree that that is very important.

I shall be delighted to meet the group from the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ochil and South Perthshire.

I welcomed what was said by the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham), not least his suggestion that we should parade the message that making reasonable adjustments is good for business.

I have left my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge, Chryston and Bellshill until the end, not because of how I ranked his speech but because I want to pay a special tribute to him. He was a distinguished spokesman on disability rights when we were in opposition. He too is a battle-scarred warrior in the campaign, and I am delighted that as a result of work that he did along with others in the House and outside, we have arrived at a general consensus on disability rights. While there may be subtle differences between us, much of the present political consensus is largely due to people like my right hon. Friend who continued the battle when it was not always easy.

I welcomed my right hon. Friend's comments about the disabled facilities grant and the Employers Forum on Disability. He is right: the best advocates for employers' taking on disabled employees are employers themselves. In my experience many employers have seen the value of stability in their work forces, and have made the necessary adjustments either to retain a member of staff whom they value after that person has developed a disability, or to recruit disabled people. My right hon. Friend has a special interest in people with learning disabilities, and I share that interest with him.

I thank the House for a very worthwhile debate, and leave Members with the words of the chairman of the Disability Rights Commission. When people say to him "I am not disabled", he always responds "Not yet." That is the message that we should all take from today's debate—

It being Six o'clock, the motion for the adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Adjourned accordingly at Six o'clock.

United Nations Reform

Motion made and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Coaker.]

9.30 am

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mrs. Dean. The request for this Adjournment debate arose from the visit a number of hon. Members made in January to the United Nations headquarters in New York. I thank the Minister and his officials for arranging that visit and supporting us so effectively. The purpose of the visit was to learn more about the UN and to consider the challenges that it is facing. It was also aimed at increasing our knowledge of the importance of UN reform and how the process of reform is developing.

At the outset, it is worth saying that the visit was extremely useful. The group decided on our return to do what we could to raise the profile of UN reform with our fellow MPs; hence today's debate. It is always important for MPs to learn more about the UN, but the timing seemed particularly acute because of the proposals for reform agreed at the world summit in September 2005—an important year for the UN as it saw its 60th anniversary. Obviously, that gave added impetus to the process of reform.

In broad terms, the summit agreed that reform should happen across a number of fronts simultaneously. The first tranche covered institutional innovations, such as establishing the Peacebuilding Commission and reforming the Security Council. There was then a second tranche about management and secretariat reform, such as reviewing existing financial and human resource rules, and budgetary review. A third tranche concerned policy co-ordination.

The wide-ranging reform package is intended to make the organisation more fit for purpose for 21st century needs. The role of the UN is a changing one, and has been changing especially in recent years. Kofi Annan, the Secretary-General, has summarised the changes thus:

> "In the 16 years since the cold war ended, the Organization has taken on more than twice as many new peacekeeping missions as in the previous 44 years . . . Over half of its . . . civilian staff now serve in the field—not only in peacekeeping, but also in humanitarian relief, criminal justice, human rights monitoring and capacity-building".

That is the background, but there are other reasons for the need for reform. We look to the UN to prevent conflicts, broker solutions to disputes, lead the fight against world poverty, disease and malnutrition, and tackle environmental issues, especially climate change. There are also concerns about the UN's past failure to respond effectively to crises such as Bosnia, Rwanda and Darfur, not to mention the thorny issue of Iraq.

In order to respond to these issues and challenges, the Secretary-General put together a high-level panel to consider reform, which published a report in December 2004. The reforms were outlined at the world summit, and they largely followed the report but with some changes. We can conclude that the expectations of the role that the UN can and should play have never been higher. The reform programme is essentially about trying to deliver a UN that can meet current and future expectations.

Opinion about whether the reform programme goes far enough is varied, with probably about 191 versions—one or more for each member state. The Secretary-General has expressed his unhappiness that it has not gone far enough, especially in tackling the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons and other weapons of mass destruction. That is pertinent at present, given the situation with Iran.

In general, there seems to be a degree of agreement that with so many different—and often competing—agendas at the UN, it is perhaps surprising that reform has got this far and that it is so wide-ranging. There is even a website that documents the process of UN reform. Our Library has put together an excellent briefing, which I am drawing heavily on in today's debate. I am also relying on the report put together by my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker) on behalf of the group who attended the UN in July.

Where are we now with the reforms? I hope that the Minister will ultimately answer that question, but I have a few issues to throw out for consideration. First, I want to centre on the tranche of work on institutional innovations. That sounds as though it could be quite a minor task, but it is absolutely huge. It includes putting together the Peacebuilding Commission, the human rights council and the central emergency response fund and tackling Security Council reforms, the mandate review and the General Assembly review.

I will turn first to the Peacebuilding Commission, which was created in December 2005, just before our visit. It aims to fill a gap in bringing together relevant actors and resources to advise on and propose integrated strategies for post-conflict peace building and recovery. That is an enormous task. Negotiations are continuing about representation on that, and I would appreciate an update from the Minister. It is fair to say that the group saw the establishment of the commission as an important step forward for the UN. We were a little surprised to find that 18 peacekeeping missions are taking place.

In the many meetings on the topic that we attended, there was complete agreement that security and development needed to go together hand in hand. It was hoped that by co-ordinating post-conflict work more effectively in a country through the Peacebuilding Commission, some of the issues underlying conflict might be addressed, which might reduce the likelihood of conflict erupting again.

It is worth looking at Sierra Leone as an example of a country that the UN is due to leave in the near future and where the Peacebuilding Commission may have a role. We discovered when we were at the UN that there was some uncertainty about what the UN's leaving would mean for Sierra Leone. The ambassador was unsure not only of the possible consequences, but of the time scale. A ministerial update would be helpful, in particular a comment about how the Peacebuilding Commission could help.

[Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods]

Most importantly, the Peacebuilding Commission is seen as a vehicle for reconstruction post-conflict, to co-ordinate the multiplicity of institutions that can become involved in reconstruction. It would be interesting to know whether other agencies, including non-governmental organisations, are willing to co-operate with the Peacebuilding Commission's activities.

I move on to the human rights council. When we visited New York, one of the issues that was causing greatest concern was the establishment—or rather, the lack of it, at that stage—of the human rights council to replace the largely discredited UN Commission on Human Rights. The issue was raised by a number of countries, and it was clearly divisive. The establishment of the council was eventually agreed on 15 March 2006. The new council will be smaller than the commission, with improved status as a subsidiary of the General Assembly rather than the Economic and Social Council.

The human rights council's membership is still being debated. Notably, the United States opposed its formation because members will be elected by simple majority rather than the two-thirds favoured by America. Elections are scheduled for 9 May. America argued for the two-thirds majority because a simple majority vote for membership would enable rogue states to become members, and the presence of rogue states in the membership of the commission had been responsible for eroding its credibility. Despite that view, some changes have been made, however, and members that commit gross or systematic human rights violations can now be suspended by a two-thirds vote, although we shall have to see whether that happens. However, there is probably some relief that the US is still on board to the extent that it is applying for membership and giving financial support. I am sure that the Minister's comments on how he sees the human rights council developing will be interesting.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I hope that the hon. Lady and other colleagues concur that it is welcome indeed that the original muted suggestion of automatic, universal council membership has been abandoned. Would she also agree that it is important that neither geography nor the principle of Buggins's turn should determine the chairmanship, which should be determined at least in part by the behaviour of the state involved?

Dr. Blackman-Woods: I absolutely agree and I shall come to some of those points when I discuss the appointment of the new Secretary-General.

The idea for the central emergency response fund was very much pushed by the United Kingdom Government. Incidentally, the group got the impression at the UN that the UK Government were very highly regarded because of their efforts to push forward not only the central emergency response fund, but the reform agenda more generally. The aim of the fund is to improve the UN's ability to respond rapidly to humanitarian crises by ensuring that critical funding is available immediately, and I am sure that all hon. Members would welcome that. The fund was officially launched on 9 March, and the Secretary of State was much involved. The fund can receive donations from corporations and individuals, as well as Governments, although the UK Government are currently the largest donor.

As we saw during our visit, the issue of the new human rights council led to heated debate, but that pales into insignificance beside the debates and competing views about Security Council reform. Indeed, so many different views were expressed that I hardly know where to start summarising them. None the less, I shall try, and the Minister and others can add to, correct or amend what I say, as necessary. There seemed to be little consensus about the number of new permanent members and who they should be, whether new permanent members should have a veto, whether current permanent members should maintain their veto, what the number of permanent members should be, whether there should be new non-permanent members, and if so, how many. The list went on and on; there was very much a lack of consensus, with many competing and contested views. Currently, about six different draft resolutions for increasing the number of permanent and non-permanent members are on the table for discussion, and we shall have to see how the international debate on them plays out. Again, the Minister may be able to give us an update.

One positive point to arise from reform of the Security Council is the extension of the mandate to include a responsibility to protect. Establishing such a responsibility addresses the anti-genocide clause in the world summit report of September 2005 and recognises the need for the international community to act if states fail to protect their populations from war crimes, mass abuse of human rights, genocide and other crimes against humanity, such as ethnic cleansing. It is also intended to respond to some of the UN's previous perceived failures in handling crises in Bosnia and Rwanda. Again, it is very much to be welcomed.

On mandate review—

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): Before my hon. Friend moves on, let me say that I am particularly interested in that aspect of the visit undertaken by her and her colleagues. Did she sense that there had been any movement on the debate about the appropriate moment for the UN to act when it perceives that the population is not being properly protected or is being abused?

Dr. Blackman-Woods: We had some discussions about that, but the view at this stage is that it is important to put in place the principle and the recognition that the UN must be able to intervene in countries before there is mass starvation or ethnic cleansing. To my recollection, however, we did not discuss the exact trigger for that intervention, although other hon. Members might correct me on that.

On the mandate review—

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving way, because the Minister has raised perhaps one of the key points about the issue of UN reform. Our group discussed the responsibility to protect, which features in our report, but the whole matter was encapsulated in our discussions with the Kenyan permanent representative to the UN. Leading him on, I asked, "Should we have intervened sooner in Darfur?" and he said, "Yes." I asked, "Should we be intervening in the possible dispute between Ethiopia and Eritrea?" and he said, "Yes." I then asked, "Should we have intervened earlier in the Zimbabwe situation?" and I got a great deal of waffle. In the middle of it, however, was the word "solidarity", and that is the problem with the UN organisation: there are too many vested interests, so it is difficult to achieve agreement between 191 nations.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that most helpful intervention. Those discussions did indeed take place.

Let me move on, however, because I am anxious for other hon. Members to have an opportunity to participate.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving way, particularly because I must go to a planning inquiry in my constituency and cannot stay to the end of the debate. Does she agree that the difficult cases that my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) rightly mentioned should not prevent us from trying to agree internationally about what should have happened in cases where the international community clearly failed? We could then start to make significant progress more often in more places, and such action would be necessary on fewer occasions.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: I absolutely agree. The group concluded that the duty to protect was an important step forward for the UN. It is important that there is continued discussion about how best to intervene and that there is dialogue with some of the countries that are affected so that we can find a way forward.

I shall not dwell too much on mandate review. It is a bureaucratic task, but we came to see it as increasingly essential in terms of reform. The remit is that all mandates that are older than five years should be reviewed.

John Bercow: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Lady for giving way, because I know that she wants to make progress, but can I press her a little on the responsibility to protect in relation to Darfur? Does she believe that there is now a challenge to show whether the responsibility to protect is a serious attempt to prevent genocide or simply a rather vacuous exercise in moral posturing? Surely, the purpose of intervention should be not to minimise casualties, but to stop violence and, where necessary, to enforce peace.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: I absolutely agree. Again, the group's view was that the responsibility to protect was an important step forward for the UN. Our collective view was that it will not get us anywhere if is just words; it must be backed by action, and that means taking some tough decisions. Indeed, our view of the whole reform process was that it should enable tough decisions to be taken more quickly and readily.

I know that mandate review is boring, but perhaps I can return to it for just a moment. Not only does the UN have too many mandates, but those mandates do not have time scales, and they are continually added to—or are not removed. In a sense, they clutter the UN agenda. In his preliminary report, the Secretary-General said that the reporting mechanisms were burdensome, that there was too much overlap and an unwieldy and duplicated architecture for implementation, and that there were gaps between mandates and resources.

Straightforward as the task may appear—it would seem to be a bureaucratic tidying up—we were again surprised at the suspicion that the process engendered in some member states. I understand that some progress is now being made, but we were genuinely shocked at how even that fairly bureaucratic process was being contested.

The second main problem is with the overhaul, oversight and audit arrangements. Almost every element of that aspect of reform produced suspicion in some quarters. For instance, we might think that forming an ethics office would be fairly straightforward. We would be wrong. It was as much bound up in conspiracy theory as major reforms, such as that of the Security Council.

Nevertheless, and despite the tensions, an ethics office has been established and a whistle-blower policy has been agreed, as have policies on preventing fraud and corruption and so on. There will also be a review of existing financial and human resources, although as a recent review in The Daily Telegraph by Francis Harris demonstrated, there is still some way to go. Staff reacted angrily to Kofi Annan's proposals to overhaul the secretariat, and an update on that from the Minister would be useful.

The last main area is policy co-ordination. In February, the Secretary-General put together a high-level panel to tackle the problem, so it was very much the topic of conversation while we were there. It will lay the groundwork for a fundamental restructuring of UN operational work. The panel is expected to complete its work in the summer—it is good to have such a short time scale—and its recommendations will go before the General Assembly in September. It is a 15 member panel, and the UK is ably represented by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

I turn briefly to development. Undoubtedly a great deal of reform was geared towards delivering on the millennium development goals. However, getting development agencies such as UNICEF, the World Food Programme and the UNDP to work together more closely seemed to be fraught with difficulty. Again, I hope that the Minister can update us on that. We were pleased to see so much emphasis being placed on delivering on the millennium development goals. The hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous), who was with the delegation, pushed strongly on climate change, and I am sure that he will want to say something about that.

An important challenge will be the appointment of the new Secretary-General. The dilemmas facing the UN in that respect were excellently summarised in a recent article in the Financial Times by Lord Hannay of Chiswick, who stressed the need for transparency, the need to get the best person for the job regardless of region and the need for that person to have a policy platform. One innovative idea was that the Secretary-General should serve one seven-year term rather than two terms, so that he did not have to pander to the needs of particular sections or blocs to get re-elected. Some of those ideas are worth discussing.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving way so generously, especially as she initiated the debate.

It seems to us that reform is fraught with controversy because of vested interests—for instance, Brazil being blocked by Venezuela. Does the hon. Lady agree that, when we come to budgetary talks, there is a great need for more nations to contribute to the UN? How can they be expected to contribute more to the UN if they are not allowed to participate in greater numbers at the Security Council?

Dr. Blackman-Woods: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. It underpinned our discussions with a number of countries that feel left out of that core group, and the reform process will have to address that point.

I turn to our overall conclusions. At times, we saw the process as being very much like a huge tanker with ships attached to it trying to turn around against a gale force wind. That might be an exaggeration, but progress seemed at times to be frustratingly slow.

We also felt that bloc prejudices got in the way of rational discussion. I know that it is politics, and that one should not let the facts get in the way of a good argument. However, it seemed to us that such prejudices were preventing important discussion on key issues. We certainly witnessed the playing out of the starkly based divisions on north-south and east-west lines. That was evidenced in our discussions on such matters as ethics, human rights reform, peace building, Security Council form and mandate review.

Amid all the suspicion and contestation, progress has taken place. That leads me to wonder whether, underneath the posturing and rhetoric, there is a deep understanding that if the reform progress were to fail and the UN failed with it, it would be not only a missed opportunity but a catastrophe for humankind's ability to tackle global issues and concerns such as climate change.

Time and again, we heard that if the UN failed it would have to be reinvented. However, it seemed that the precious nature and fragility of the institution was not always fully appreciated, and with that comes the recognition that the UN needs to change if it is to survive. That will doubtless mean that the various blocs and factions will need to change.

I do not want to end on a negative note. We saw much in our visit to inspire, and dialogue is at least taking place. Improvements are happening, albeit slowly, and in the current climate that must count as progress. We saw a number of ambassadors during our visit, and I thank them. I also thank everyone who contributed to our discussions and information-gathering tasks, particularly Tony Kay of the Foreign Office and Emyr Parry Jones, our ambassador to the UN, for his effective support.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mrs. Janet Dean (in the Chair): Order. Before I call the next speaker, I remind Members that I intend to call the Front-Bench spokesmen at 10.30 am.

9.58 am

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to contribute to this debate. The debate is long overdue, and I hope that I am not alone in thinking that it should be an annual fixture, and held more properly on the Floor of the House. Every year, we debate our relations with European Union, and it is right and proper that we should do so. It is an important international organisation, and we are part of it.

As a permanent member of the Security Council, and with the United Nations taking such incredibly important decisions, I would certainly welcome an annual debate on the UN on the Floor of the House. Judging from the nods that I see from all sides of the Chamber, I think that we might seek that through the powers that be. We could ask the Leader of the House whether that can be brought about, because it would spread an interest in and a greater knowledge of the UN among all Members. That would help bring pressure on the Government of the day to ensure that the UN moves forward, as it must. Reform is being examined closely across the organisation. It is absolutely right and proper, so that the UN can focus on what it needs to do and to do it as well as it can.

A one-page sheet of all the different UN organisations was helpfully given to those of us who visited the UN earlier this year. There are quite a number of them, many of which, I suspect, most of us have never heard. For example, there are regional commissions that report to the Economic and Social Council. Were Members present aware that there is a UN Economic Commission for Europe, which is known as the ECE? I wonder whether it has ever come into the consciousness of anyone present from a news report of something that it has said or because of any useful contribution that it has made to debate on economic affairs in this continent of ours. I confess that the first I heard of it was when I looked down the sub-divisions of the regional commissions, of which there are four across the world, with a budget of $50 million or so. We need to question the value of such parts of the UN organisation, and whether that money would be far better spent on the front line of development or peacekeeping work, where it is really needed and would really make a difference. I hope that every part of the UN structure is considered in the reform.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I intervene before my hon. Friend moves on from the subject of regional commissions, as I had hoped that he might mention the UN Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia, which is based in Damascus. It has a budget of $50 million per annum and the tallest building in that city, but has never, to my knowledge, produced a single report. That is an example of where the UN is in desperate need of reform.

Andrew Selous: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He adds further evidence to my point. I think that the commission's headquarters may be in Beirut, rather than Damascus, but his point is absolutely right none the less. There is a sense that such organisations exist just to give jobs to senior UN diplomats, or to reward certain countries which believe that it is their turn, or right, to have an important international post. It is right and proper that there should be international parliamentary scrutiny of such organisations, so that we can get rid of them if they are not justified. If they are justified, let us see what they are doing and make use of their reports, but if they are not worth the considerable sums that go into their budgets, they should properly be got rid of.

The UN gets a bad press from time to time because of issues of malfeasance and financial irregularity, on which it is right that there should be a spotlight. I understand that the financial reporting limit for gifts to UN staff members is $10,000, which seems extraordinarily high. Certainly, for this country and many others around the world, that is a considerable sum. The UN should focus on small points such as the need to clean up its act and make sure that it is properly immune from charges of acting in an irregular manner. I hope that the current review will look into that.

Dr. Howells: I am intrigued by the hon. Gentleman's point. Is $10,000 the limit on the value of a gift, or the point at which the UN representative must notify Kofi Annan that he has received the gift, in which case it could be much more expensive?

Andrew Selous: The Minister is right to press me; unfortunately, I cannot give him further detail. The five of us who visited the UN were given that figure by the assistant United States ambassador to the UN. Feeling quite moral and upright, I replied that the limit in the UK Parliament is only £250 per gift, but I had the ground cut from under me when the American deputy ambassador replied that it is only $250 for American politicians—so, in America, they have even higher standards than us. I am sure that the Minister can find out further details through his officials and our excellent mission to the UN in New York, and ensure that the UK lobbies on that point as part of our reform negotiations.

I shall address the three areas on which the UN concentrates. On the first page of the UN charter, its purposes are helpfully laid out, the first of which is peacekeeping—or maintaining "international peace and security", as the charter puts it. For all the criticism that comes the UN's way, it is not well known that it has 85,000 personnel—troops and military support staff—deployed across the world, keeping the peace in 18 different operations. By any yardstick, that is a formidable achievement, which the UN would do well to speak of more. If people knew that it has that level of commitment across the world, they would be extremely impressed.

Will the Minister tell us, in his reply, whether the UN has ever, to his knowledge, been short of either the number of troops that it needed on the ground, or of specific types of troops to mount peacekeeping or other UN operations? It has occurred to me from time to time that it is a slightly chaotic system, given that despite the UN's significant military presence in many countries, it does not have the ability to call, in some systematic way, on military support. Will the Minister tell us whether that has caused difficulties for the UN and is an issue? Does he think that there should be a formal mechanism to ensure that it has under its command the troops that it needs to mount such operations, or at least at its disposal the ability to call on them in a fairly ready and easy manner?

John Bercow: Does my hon. Friend agree that a particularly apposite example of an inadequate force, in terms of both mandate and numbers for the task that needed to be fulfilled, was that in Rwanda in the early 1990s? That was an indictment beyond expression of the world as a whole. If he has not yet read "Shake Hands With the Devil" by Lieutenant-General, Roméo Dallaire—I rather suspect that he has—I tell him that it is a very good and searing read.

Andrew Selous: My hon. Friend is more than generous, as always, and credits me with having read a book that I am ashamed to confess that I have not yet read. It will have to be summer reading, as it has obviously escaped my Easter reading pile. Hopefully, there will be time to make up for that.

My hon. Friend again makes an important and serious point. What happened in Rwanda is a scar on the conscience of the whole world, and is something that we must never allow to happen again. I know that the horror of what happened there motivates my hon. Friend and many others in keeping a beady and watchful eye on what is happening in Darfur. Indeed, I am interested to know whether he thinks that the UN has all the necessary troops on the ground in Darfur to ensure that things run there. He indicates that he does not think that it has, which, perhaps, makes my point. I am, of course, aware that there are political considerations: the UN might be able or want to put more troops in, but might be prevented by the political situation on the ground or arguments within the African Union.

The second main purpose or pillar of the UN is human rights. That was achieved only by the considerable efforts of a very doughty lady—Eleanor Roosevelt—in the late 1940s and 1950s. She fought passionately to ensure that the promotion and safeguarding of human rights across the world was a fundamental and principal part of the UN's remit. It is surprising that the money spent on human rights has only just gone past 1 per cent. of the UN's total budget. Last year's summit brought about the responsibility to protect, which is a step forward in philosophical and political terms. It puts an obligation on Governments across the world to prevent genocide and to look after their own people rather than abuse them. The question is how to enforce it on the ground.

One of the most disappointing meetings that we had in New York was with a senior official of Mrs. Arbour, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights. When we pressed him about how the responsibility to protect would be enforced on the ground the response was vague. I, like most Members present, did not come away from that meeting with any confidence that there were real teeth to this measure, that it could be enforced and would mean something, and that there were mechanisms in place. We were unsure whether a ratchet effect would occur if a Government ignored the responsibility to protect. My hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), who accompanied us on the trip, put his finger on that in his intervention on the hon. Member for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods). There was talk about a sense of solidarity, particularly among some African countries.

It is high time that we started to name and shame some of the countries in the United Nations who are voting against resolutions on human rights issues. The European Union has done good work trying to raise several such issues at the United Nations; it has recently done so on Iran, Burma, North Korea and Uzbekistan. The United Kingdom played an important part in getting the issue of the house clearances in Zimbabwe raised at the United Nations not so long ago. All credit to the Government and to our staff in New York for bringing that about. I understand that nine countries voted for in respect of that in the Security Council. None the less, five—Russia, China, Algeria, Benin and Tanzania—voted against. In addition, Brazil abstained, even though it would like to be a permanent member of the Security Council.

[Andrew Selous]

It is high time that the actions of countries in the United Nations such as those are well known and well publicised. Every time a delegation of parliamentarians, sports people or business people from those countries comes to this country it should be asked why its Government have voted against protecting the human rights of some of the most downtrodden peoples in the world.

Things can change, albeit slowly. Governments are not immune from pressure from their own people. We must get the facts more out in the open. They need to be much better known, so that we can bring pressure to bear on such Governments. It is high time that that was done. I hope that our Government can do their part to publicise how some countries are acting in the United Nations.

The third pillar of the United Nations is humanitarian development. The start of the charter of the United Nations talks about its purposes and puts this in rather roundabout terms. It talks about "international problems" whose nature is

"economic, social, cultural or humanitarian".

International development rightly falls within that phrase. The United Nations properly devotes a considerable amount of its resources—for example, its personnel and management time—to development work.

It seemed to us all that there is a proliferation of UN organisations. It is not necessary to have a massive cull of them, because there are small or specialist organisations that it is right to keep. One such example would be the World Health Organisation. Such organisations are internationally respected and do an extremely good job. However, the case for some form of rationalisation and for some form of proper reporting structure at least is clearly overwhelming.

There are currently 12 different UN agencies working in Tanzania—to name but one country—all of which have different reporting lines and so on. If one talks to UN staff at headquarters in New York about the development work that they are doing, one finds that they sometimes despair about the separate fiefdoms that the UN maintains. One former UN Secretary-General referred to the heads of the main UN agencies as being barons in respect of the power that they exercised over their organisations. There is no doubt that the UN's work would be better focused if there were better co-ordination and clearer reporting lines. Less developed countries should have a clear head of all UN operations within the country accountable to the Government as a whole. I hope that our Government will press for that.

I shall discuss climate change in relation to the purposes of the UN and the reform programme that is occurring. It should come as no surprise to any of us that climate change does not feature at all in the UN charter, because it was not an issue when the UN was being founded in San Francisco in 1946, shortly after the second world war. The UN is the only organisation in the world with the international scope and moral authority to take all countries to task on the issue. We asked senior UN officials about it when we were there.

The UN, to some extent, has a role in tackling climate change; the recent Montreal meeting was known as the 11th conference of the parties to the UN framework convention on climate change. However, no one would pretend that tackling climate change is a central core purpose. There is a principal thrust to what I want to say. The UN currently has three pillars: international peace and security, human rights and development. They should be in place, but the case is overwhelming for adding a fourth pillar and making tackling climate change and safeguarding the future of our planet a principal and primary purpose of the UN.

No other organisation will have the moral authority in that area. The G8, and the Kyoto protocol and other international agreements, have some merit in this respect, but the UN has an unparalleled and incredibly privileged position to speak with amazing authority to every country. It can monitor what is going on, rank how countries are performing in this area, encourage the development of technologies, and name and shame countries that are emitting carbon way above limits agreed on on an international basis.

Among the many UN organisations is the World Meteorological Organisation, which is based in Geneva. I was alerted to its existence by someone who is shortly to move into my constituency. He is something of a climate expert and he suggested that that organisation should be given greater prominence and should take the lead as the key UN body to take us forward on the issue of climate change. I hope that the Minister will give us some comfort that the Government are seized of the importance of this issue.

10.20 am

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): I shall be brief, as I arrived late, for which I apologise to my hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods). I congratulate her on securing this debate.

I shall begin my brief contribution by referring to some words of one of the first Secretaries-General of the United Nations, taken from his spiritual treatise "Markings":

"Never look down to test the ground before taking your next step. Only he who keeps his eye fixed on the far horizon will find his right road."

However, it is important that we also look at the steps in front of us, and the reform process that my hon. Friend was outlining as I entered the Chamber is absolutely to do with that.

I was particularly taken with my hon. Friend's reports on her recent visit to the UN. I visited it in 2000; I was similarly struck by how it had grown like Topsy, and there seems to have been no pruning in the intervening years. However, I admire the work of Kofi Annan and the high-level panel. Members have been a little critical in this debate, but appendix 1 of part E of the very good Library briefing lists various areas of reform: "Institutional Innovations", "Secretariat/Management Reform/Oversight" and "Greater Policy Co-ordination". Therefore, a range of things has been achieved in short order compared with how things have historically happened in the UN, so we should not be too down-hearted about the progress that has been made.

I wish to make one key point about the Peacebuilding Commission, which I hope will provide much of the framework for ensuring that the UN's reform process delivers on the ground. Now that it has been established, will the Minister tell us what he thinks are the prospects for it doing robust work in this area? It will set out benchmarks and help things to happen over time in a way that, perhaps, has not been built into the work of the UN before. In the past, when a crisis has emerged and the response has been made, many parts of the UN have kept tabs on what has been going on, but not in a coherent way, and not at the top level. I hope that the Peacebuilding Commission will help us to do that. We can commend the direction of travel that has been identified and mapped out.

Harking back to the contribution of the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous), I agree that many aspects of what the UN currently addresses, such as the environment, are to do with scientific matters that were not envisaged at the time when the UN was set up. That is particularly the case in respect of the way in which the environment can impact on poverty and development across the piece. Can the Minister tell us what we are doing to ensure that good advice is available when and where it is needed? I understand that the Department for International Development has appointed a scientific adviser, and that the UN agencies, the World Health Organisation and UNESCO are now doing a bit better in this regard.

I shall now conclude, because I know that at least one other Member wishes to make a contribution.

10.24 am

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale) (Lab): I am surprised at your choice of the order of speakers, Mrs. Dean, as I was present from the start, and I have been left with little time to say what I want to say about this delegation to the United Nations, of which I was a member.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker) for organising the trip. It was an eye-opener for me. I had taken considerable interest in the UN, but I had not seen it at first hand, and I count it as a privilege to have been a part of the delegation, which visited it in January.

As I must truncate my remarks, I will first refer to the work done on our behalf by the ambassador, Sir Emyr Jones Parry, and Mr. Tony Kay of the Foreign Office. They put together a fabulous programme. I might be corrected on this, but I think that we had 14 meetings in four days—which was a very light and moderate programme. If anybody wants to go to a restaurant in mid-Manhattan I recommend Positano—a rather economical restaurant, where the prices might even surprise the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown).

While we were there, we managed to meet three and a half permanent members of the Security Council: Sir Emyr Jones Parry, Mr. Denisov, the Russian ambassador, the Chinese ambassador, and the deputy ambassador of the United States. The only people we did not get to meet were the French. I do not know whether that says something about our relations with France.

Our meeting with the ambassador for China was the most unbelievable meeting I have ever attended. It was led by the leader of our delegation, my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling. The ambassador referred all his remarks to us via him. We were interested to know what the UN was going to do on reform of human rights, because that is an important issue. One of the basic human rights is the right to self-determination, which is, of course, denied to the people of Tibet. That is a pressing issue. I asked the ambassador for China about his views on extending democracy to Tibet, and he told me that it already had it, which was a surprise to me, because I did not think that the Tibetans had self-determination. The recent decision to erect a massive statue of Chairman Mao in Tibet is also, perhaps, an affront to the Tibetan people.

We did not get a chance to address the issue of Burma. The UN has a great deal of work to do on human rights in that country. That is a serious matter, and I know that our Government have made great efforts to take it forward.

I have three remaining minutes, and I wish to press the Minister. I know that the UN charter was drawn up 60 years go, but even in its reformed state following the crisis where it failed to follow up UN Security Council resolution 1441 on Iraq and subsequent developments in the 21st century, I do not think that the UN is a panacea for all the global problems that we currently face. It has been mentioned that there are 18 zones of conflict, with 80,000-plus UN military and civilian personnel active across the world. Ten years ago, $9 billion was spent; now, $18 billion is being spent, primarily on trying to involve them in conflict resolution. What we need is a proactive—rather than a reactive—organisation that gets into countries and regions where there are crises.

It is in that regard that the African Union must deliver, by playing its part in attempts to resolve conflicts in Africa, where we face huge problems to do with AIDS, the lack of education and the achievement of the millennium goals. I have been extremely disappointed in the role South Africa has played in trying to resolve the conflicts in that continent. It should have done much more over Zimbabwe, and it could certainly be more active now in respect of Kenya.

In the middle east, Hamas made ridiculous statements yesterday welcoming the Tel Aviv suicide bombers. We have a new Israeli Government who will try to determine their borders without negotiation, which is a backward step. We have real problems with Syria and Lebanon. We have problems to do with Iran and North Korea, in terms of their attempts to establish a nuclear energy policy or a nuclear weapons policy. We also have UN representatives in Afghanistan and Iraq. We have problems in Chechnya, too, and we have had problems in Niger. We face serious issues, some of which the African Union needs to address. It ought to try to exploit the activities of the Egyptian Government—a secular Government of a Muslim country that has good relationships with both sides in the middle east. It can speak to Iran about its actions in respect of nuclear weapons; that is how it could help to take this agenda forward. We need to redefine the UN—to state what its proactive role is in its global activities.

I will finish on climate change. We arrived in New York on a sunny spring day; the day after, there were sub-Siberian weather conditions. After that, there were hurricanes and monsoons, and then it returned to being quite nice weather. There are those changing conditions in the United States; there are floods in the Balkans; and there is drought in Africa. If the United Nations does not think that climate change should be on the agenda, it really ought to think again.

Mrs. Janet Dean (in the Chair): Before I call Mr. Michael Moore, I should say that although there is no absolute need for Back-Bench Members to give a note to the Chairman requesting to speak, the only one from whom I had a note was Linda Gilroy. That is why I called her before Mr. Mike Hall.

10.30 am

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): This has been an important and impressive debate. Like others, I pay tribute to the hon. Member for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods) for securing the debate and setting out the issues so comprehensively at the outset. I extend that tribute to those who went on what was clearly a worthwhile visit to the United Nations. I echo the comments made about the value of going to the UN to see for oneself its range of activities and its complexities. I certainly gained enormous benefit from going there myself a few years ago. In common with others, I pay tribute to British diplomats and officials in the UN for the excellent work that they do, day in, day out. The fact that Britain punches above its weight is in large part due to the skills, expertise and approach of our diplomats in important places such as the UN.

I shall pick up on a point made by the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) about the prospect of an annual debate on the UN. I have recently returned to the foreign affairs brief, but I recall that just over a year ago the current Minister for Higher Education and Lifelong Learning pledged that there would be such a debate—and, indeed, for two years we have managed to secure one, albeit usually in Westminster Hall on a Thursday afternoon. Nevertheless, that is important, and I hope that today the Minister will confirm that it is still the practice and the intention of the Government to provide such debates.

The United Nations matters more than ever because of the uncertain nature of our world; collective security is vital to us all. It also matters because, as contributors have said, there is still the huge issue of the lack of human rights and democracy across the globe; that remains an absolute disgrace. The inequalities of wealth and opportunity in different continents is, to borrow a phrase already used once this morning, a scar on the conscience of us all.

The hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire was slightly critical of the prosaic language in the UN charter about the different pillars of the organisation. I refer him back to the preamble, in which the lofty ideals of the representatives in San Francisco are set out in slightly better language, which says,

"to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war . . . to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights . . . and . . . to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom".

Those ideals are still relevant today, across the world. Recent debates about reform of the UN have brought them into even sharper focus.

In a recent speech to the British Council, Mark Malloch Brown—the new deputy Secretary-General of the organisation—stressed the centrality of security, development and human rights to the reform programme that is now under way, following the world summit last autumn. He emphasised that reforms had to be underpinned by radical change in the organisation and in the management of the UN itself—a strong theme in our debate this morning.

The oil-for-food scandal undoubtedly rocked the UN, and it lapped uncomfortably close to the Secretary-General himself. To his immense credit, he has not shied away from facing the weaknesses and rot that were exposed by that scandal and others referred to this morning. He will need strong support from Governments such as ours if he is to carry out the painful processes that he has outlined and now seeks to implement.

It is always pretty easy to set out a list of the failures of the UN, or the differences between its high-blown rhetoric and the often grubby reality. On security, there have been failures in Rwanda, the Balkans, the Congo and now Darfur; on human rights, there is the embarrassment and disgrace of the old commission's having Zimbabwe and Libya as members; on development, there is the horrible reality that we are barely on track to meet the millennium development goals—the basic targets set in a flurry of good intentions five years ago—by 2015. Also, as contributors to the debate have stressed, there is a worrying lack of attention to perhaps the most important challenge for all of us, climate change, which we need to tackle with great urgency.

The attempts at reform are well documented. The high-level panel and the world summit last year got that process firmly under way. The world summit was a mixed bag, perhaps reflecting the mixed motives of the participants. However, we should recognise the achievements, not least of which is the fact that a debate was started on intervention for humanitarian purposes—the so-called "responsibility to protect". Also, a peace-building commission was set up, and—not at the time, but subsequently—there was agreement on the human rights council. Also, a new emergency development fund was created; the UK has led the way in terms of its contributions to it. I pay tribute to the Minister and the Government for that.

Alongside those strengths of the summit, there was a worrying failure to tackle the issue of the proliferation of nuclear weapons, or to make any mention of disarmament. Even the Secretary-General himself branded that "a real disgrace". Also, the issue of pre-emptive strikes—which have undermined the United Nations since the war in Iraq started some three years ago—was not referred to. Although there was unqualified condemnation of terrorism, there is as yet no working definition of it. Those are serious disappointments, but it is not time to give up. It has been said that we get the United Nations that we deserve. Sometimes there is a risk of our treating the UN as if it were a fully autonomous and independent organisation. The reality, of course, is that the UN is very much a creature of its individual member states.

The UN is not beyond meaningful reform or irredeemably damaged, as long as there is the political will to sort it out. It is unlikely that we will have a "San Francisco Moment" in which to put it all right, but effective and deep reform is possible if a coalition of democracies, the United States placed centrally among them, perseveres in the development of an effective United Nations. That means that we need a more open approach to the UN from the United States. Its ambassador, John Bolton, has characterised his approach as "muscular diplomacy", but was recently rebuked by the International Herald Tribune, which said that there have been plenty of illustrations of the muscle, but not many of the diplomacy. We need to rebalance that approach. Britain has an important role in persuading the Americans of that.

As others said, we need to recognise the realities of the 21st century, and not only the post-war realities of 1945. We need to consider seriously Security Council reform to bring others such as Brazil, Germany, India, Japan and a representative from Africa into the Security Council, if they meet the high standards that we should all expect of them. It is in nobody's interests for the impetus for United Nations reform to fail. The world needs a strong UN to face the complex challenges of the 21st century. However damaged it is, and however marginalised it has been in recent times, no other organisation can compete with it as a source of global legitimacy. At a time of worrying developments in Iran and the middle east, and of catastrophe in Darfur, the world needs a United Nations that works.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): It is delightful to serve under your chairmanship, Mrs. Dean. I congratulate the hon. Member for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods) on securing this debate and on her excellent contribution to it. She is obviously a fast learner; I have no doubt that she will go far in her party.

Much has been said about the importance of UN reform. Excellent speeches have been made not only by the hon. Lady, but by my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) and the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy). I congratulate the hon. Lady on her courtesy in cutting short her speech so that the hon. Member for Weaver Vale (Mr. Hall) could make his contribution, which was particularly about human rights but also ran the gamut of world problems. His contribution was valuable and it would have been a pity to have missed it.

As has been mentioned, the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker) led an excellent delegation, which included Members present today, to the United Nations in January. However, we missed the presence of any Liberal Democrat Member; that party would have benefited greatly had it been able to send one.

The members of the delegation learned a huge amount, and the hon. Gentleman, aided by contributions from other members, has produced an excellent document that summarises the totality of UN reform as encompassed by the summit, and particularly by the fifth committee and the budget reforms that led right up to 23 December 2005 and were a great tribute to all the nations that participated. That had to be done by consensus. It is fitting to pay tribute to our permanent ambassador to the United Nations, Sir Emyr Jones Parry, and Tony Kaye, whom I see here today and did so much organisation during our visit.

Members have referred to the fact that in 1941 it was Churchill and Roosevelt's vision that led to the founding of the United Nations as we know it today. After the catastrophe of the second world war, that was an important vision. However, the weakness of the League of Nations was one of the contributory factors that led to the second world war, and we have to grasp the nettle of that same spirit of Churchill and Roosevelt in 1941. My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire came out with one of the most apt phrases that I have heard in a long time. He said that the UN had the international scope and moral authority to take nations to task, and that was precisely what Churchill and Roosevelt had in mind in 1941.

Unless we take the opportunity to reform the United Nations so that it becomes competent, we shall see more global catastrophes and problems. In my view, the UN failed on Iraq. Diplomacy is always preferable to war. With the 28 April deadline set for Iran, we now have the next low-water mark for the UN. If we fail on that as well, we are heading for deep trouble. Reform is particularly important today, and I hope that the Minister will take that message back to the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister, and that the British Government will use their special relationship with the UN.

The UK Government are now the second largest contributor to the UN; the USA is by far the largest contributor. If the largest and second largest contributors cannot effectively push this reform, particularly given their special relationship, I do not know what will be able to. The Prime Minister has a special relationship with President Bush; we hear that they speak for half an hour every week. Let us hope that some of those conversations can be directed towards achieving some real and positive UN reform.

Mention has been made of a number of reforms; perhaps the most important is the budgetary reform, to which I referred in my opening remarks. On 23 December, the fifth committee decided that each tranche of the half-yearly budget would be released only if progress on reform was made. During my meeting with him, John Bolton was adamant that the United States would not sanction the next half-year's budget unless progress towards reform was made. I hope that the British Government will support the United States on that, because only through budgetary discipline will reform be forced through. Given that a nation as small as the Tuvalu islands has the same vote on the General Assembly as the United States, it is difficult to get reforms through.

The contribution of the United States is massive at $24.2 billion and it therefore has a right to have a say in how the UN should be reformed. We need to pay great heed to Ambassador Bolton's words. I hope that there will be reform on the budget and the other areas that I am going to talk about.

[Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown]

Budgetary reform is vital and has been highlighted by the oil-for-food programme scandal. During the seven-odd years of that programme's existence it dealt with $64 billion-worth of potential aid for food. When we think that Saddam Hussein skimmed off up to $10 billion of that, we see the scale of the scandal. We must never allow that extent of fraud to happen again. Such things require proper safeguards and external audit.

I turn to the issue of Security Council participation. We cannot expect nations to contribute more to the UN unless there is some enlargement of the Security Council. The issue of the G4 group is fearfully controversial; Venezuela does not want Brazil in it, Pakistan does not want India in it and other African countries do not want South Africa in it. It is difficult, but we have to try to make progress on Security Council reform, especially given that Japan is the second largest contributor to the core budget and one of the major aspirants to becoming a member of the Security Council. It is perhaps the most deserving of them all.

Time is limited and I shall skate over much of what I was going to say. The UN needs to concentrate more than anything on two areas: first, the transformation from the Human Rights Commission to a human rights council. We have to make sure that the human rights council is more effective; the commission failed too often in the past. In 2003, it was under the chairmanship of Syria; other nations with poor human rights records such as Zimbabwe, Cuba and Sudan have been members of that three-nation commission. Any nation that fails in implementing at least basic human rights should not be a member of the council, and certainly should not be able to influence its role.

Peace building and whether there should be pre-emptive action has been mentioned. That issue is important and the UN needs to address it. I quote Ambassador Bolton:

> "Some member states are attempting to engage in 'mission creep' by redefining the scope of the Peacebuilding Commission and attempting to involve it in pre-conflict situations or long-term development. We do not believe this should fall under the purview of the Peacebuilding Commission, which needs to have a clearly defined and specific mission and mandate in order to maximise its effectiveness."

The issue of whether the United Nations should have a more pre-emptive role is difficult. Currently, there is a potential conflict between Eritrea and Ethiopia. Whether the UN should intervene to stop those nations, among the poorest in the world, going to war is a big question.

I have almost come to the end of my time. We face some difficult world threats. Terrorism is on a scale that we have never known before. If we fail on United Nations reform, the world will suffer—we will all suffer. Today, one nation's problem can well have consequences for another nation on the other side of the world. Environmental reform has been mentioned; a lady using hair spray in Australia will affect global warming in America. It is no good the Americans standing aside on the environmental issues of the day. We need to bind them in to what is happening in the international community and the world today, not only on the environment but on peacemaking, peace building, conflict resolution, terrorism resolution, human rights and all the other ways in which the UN gives assistance.

I learned the other day that in Uganda between 2001 and 2004, the figure for poverty—the number of people living on less than $1 a day—rose from 30 to 40 per cent., yet millions of pounds-worth of aid were poured into Uganda in that time. The world needs to wake up when it comes to how it helps poor countries. It needs to link aid with better government and a move towards democracy.

I conclude with this phrase, which is what the issue is all about. It comes from Kofi Annan, the Secretary-General of the United Nations. He says that the reform is a

> "once-in-a-generation opportunity for the world to come together and take action on grave global threats that require bold global solutions. It is also a chance to revitalise the United Nations itself. It is in short, an opportunity for all humankind."

If we fail, the world will suffer.

10.51 am

The Minister for the Middle East (Dr. Kim Howells): I reiterate the comments of the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) by saying what a pleasure it is to serve under your chairmanship, Mrs. Dean. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham (Dr. Blackman-Woods) for initiating the debate and for her comments. I welcome the interest that Members of both Houses take in the United Nations and in the crucial reforms that that organisation faces. What a pleasure it is to follow such fine contributions from the hon. Members for Cotswold, for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk (Mr. Moore) and for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous), and my hon. Friends the Members for Weaver Vale (Mr. Hall) and for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy).

The Government are a strong supporter of the United Nations. We have been a staunch ally of the Secretary-General in his reform efforts. We want those efforts to result in a more effective and efficient UN, better able to meet the interlinked challenges of development, security and human rights. My hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham drew us a vivid picture when she said that reforming the UN was like trying to turn around a huge tanker with several ships attached to it. As someone who once had a shot, unwisely, at using a ship simulator and managed to sink a 100,000-tonne coal carrier, wreck the navigation pier at Avonmouth, block the Severn navigation channel and cause a major pollution hazard, I know exactly what she means. We need to communicate vividly the importance of reform, and the hon. Member for Cotswold explained its importance very clearly.

We continue to work hard to achieve the objective of reform. I am pleased that several colleagues present at the debate were able to see for themselves, when they visited New York in January, the challenges that the UN faces and the energy that we are devoting to help it to meet those challenges. I agree with the assessment of our team working in New York. Sir Emyr Jones Parry has a superb team and is one of our best diplomats. No doubt hon. Members can play a role in furthering the good work in which they are engaged on the reform agenda.

Debates such as this are welcome and important. With regard to the comments of the hon. Members for South-West Bedfordshire and for Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk, I will take that valid message to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. The issue is hugely important and I believe that this needs to be a regular debate.

The reform debate of the past few years culminated in the 2005 UN world summit last September, which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister attended along with 152 other Heads of Government. Some people expressed disappointment at the outcome of the summit, but it was a significant step forward for the UN and delivered an essential package of reforms and commitments by the international community. We have heard about those this morning. We must try to channel that energy and enthusiasm so that our representatives and those of the EU and other progressive forces in the UN can take the reform agenda forward.

The UK, when it had the presidency of the EU, played a crucial role in the negotiations leading up to the summit. The Government intend to lay before Parliament a Command Paper on the United Nations shortly. That will include our assessment of the progress made on implementing the reforms agreed at the summit and on the outstanding issues to be addressed. Hon. Members might welcome a brief assessment of where things stand on the implementation process.

The agreements reached in New York on development and climate change—I was glad to hear hon. Members mention those issues—reflected several important Gleneagles and EU commitments. Those included the need to accelerate progress towards the millennium development goals, to address the special needs of Africa and to create, as my hon. Friend the Member for City of Durham said, a new central emergency relief fund to strengthen the UN's ability to mobilise quickly and effectively resources to tackle humanitarian crises.

The challenge now is to ensure that those commitments are fulfilled. We continue to lead by example, as shown by our recent commitment to spend at least £8.5 billion on aid for education over the next 10 years. I was glad to hear my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire mention the discussions that have been held on the role that the UN should play in seeking to fulfil environmental commitments. At the world summit, there was an agreement to explore the possibility of a more coherent UN institutional framework, including a more integrated structure built on existing institutions and instruments. I was glad to hear the hon. Gentleman point out something that we do not think about enough, which is that no other organisation in the world has the ability to speak to all nations as the UN does. We are pleased with the raised profile that the General Assembly president, Jan Eliasson, has given the issue. I shall consider carefully the interesting examples of possible intervention by the UN that the hon. Gentleman suggested.

We hope to make progress on the EU's goal of transforming the UN Environment Programme into a specialised agency with a revised and strengthened mandate and improved financing. That will enable the UN's environmental pillar to tackle better developing countries' needs, to strengthen the scientific basis of decision making, to focus on emerging priorities such as the environment and security, to improve co-ordination at policy and operational level and to ensure sustained delivery in respect of environmental priorities.

The world summit invited Kofi Annan to launch further work to consider how all the UN operations that we have talked about this morning could be managed more tightly around three pillars: development, humanitarian assistance and the environment. The development, humanitarian and environmental efforts of the UN have become increasingly fragmented, with multiple agencies competing for donor funds, different agencies occupying the same policy space, and overlap and duplication at both headquarters and country level. As many hon. Members pointed out, that is inhibiting the UN from making as significant a contribution as it could make to the achievement of internationally agreed development goals.

The Secretary-General's panel on system-wide coherence in the areas of humanitarian assistance, the environment and development is therefore crucial. It heartened me to hear many hon. Members mention that. I am proud of the contribution that the UK made to the world summit's success and of the continuing efforts—

Mrs. Janet Dean (in the Chair): Order. We must move to the next debate.

Territorial Army Rebalancing

11 am

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): May I say at the outset of my contribution on the future of the Territorial Army within the Army structure what a pleasure it is to see you in the Chair this morning, Mrs. Dean? I believe that this is the first time that I have served under your chairmanship.

I am delighted to have secured this debate. It could not have come at a more appropriate time, bearing in mind the Minister's statement on 24 March concerning the rebalancing of the TA and, hot on its heels, the National Audit Office report of 31 March on reserve forces. I have been following the changing role of the TA for some time, not least because of its position at the base of the pyramid that will form the future Army structure.

One could describe the TA as the bedrock of the Government's policy. For several years, successive Ministers have clarified what is expected of it. It will play nothing less than a vital role in future operations and will be fully integrated with regular forces in all types of military and, in the case of the TA infantry, civil operations. There is nothing to criticise in that ambitious objective, as long as the limitations of the arrangement are fully and clearly understood.

The words "territorial" and "reserve" hardly seem appropriate these days, as the TA is operating as nothing less than infill. By its very definition, a reserve force is one that is held back from the line of battle to be used to assist where necessary, or that is called up in an emergency. I do not believe that the Government's present objective for the TA falls into either category, as the TA undertakes all the roles of the regulars without being on the permanent payroll.

The key difficulties in the Government's present strategy for UK armed forces personnel are to do with recruitment, retention, integration and, especially, maintaining morale. As the Minister knows, my initial interest in the infantry stemmed from the recent changes to my local regiment, the Cheshires, and from the strategic defence review, which proposed a 55 per cent. cut in infantry TA. We now face a further reduction of 900 personnel—or, to be accurate, 910. It is not clear whether they are to come from present strength or from establishment. If that further cut is to come from strength—this is based on figures from 1 April last year—the infantry will be the same size as the logistics, have the same establishment as the medical services and be not far ahead of the Royal Engineers. It is fair to say that the backbone of the Army, the infantry, which has the greatest experience of command in the British Army, is in terminal decline.

I did not understand the part of the recent statement that dealt with medical services, and the Minister's replies to questions did not make it any clearer. Have the Government given up trying to get strength up to establishment in that area? What is the meaning of combat medical staff? Surely all medical staff are combatants to some degree or other; if not, what do they do? For the Ministry of Defence not to know the time span between deployments of regular and TA medics to Iraq is just not good enough. I know one medic in the regulars who will shortly be going to Iraq for the third time.

It is also puzzling when the Ministry says that 13,450 personnel are available for deployment as at 1 June 2006 from all TA units, yet the Department cannot or refuses to give exact numbers of unit availability. Does the Department genuinely not know the number? If it does not, how did it arrive at the figure of 13,450? It has been stated that the figure excludes those who have exceeded the MOD's limit on mobilised service of a total of 12 months in every 60. However, most deployments in Iraq have been for around 10 months. Technically, with two months of obligatory service yet to be served, those soldiers could be counted as part of the force of 13,450. I also suspect that the personnel who are available are those such as officers and non-commissioned officers, who are not in particularly short supply, rather than privates, who are the soldiers most needed in such deployments and who operate under the most pressure.

What are the recruitment figures for individual TA centres? I suspect that those that have low recruitment have high retention, as recruits are told openly that, after completing basic training, they will be called up within a year for a 10 to 11-month deployment. Why does the Ministry not know the figures for those who have completed basic training? That is a vital piece of information for understanding what is happening on the ground in respect of recruitment and, thereafter, availability for deployment.

On the basis of information straight from the horse's mouth, I know that infantry privates are not only in great demand but are being put under considerable pressure. That was the subject of a written question that I tabled in January but to which I have not yet received a reply. I remind the Minister that my question asked which main areas of the TA were identified as undermanned and which required increased recruitment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) recently mentioned that the present strength of the university Officer Training Corps stands at 5,750 and is 2,250 over establishment. Those personnel are, of course, non-deployable. The OTC is an excellent organisation for students and an extremely successful tool for future recruitment, but should not those figures be kept separate from figures for deployable troops? It seems dishonest to bulk up the overall figures with those who will not be available in an active sense for a considerable time.

From the figures that I have been given in response to written parliamentary questions, it appears that the TA consists of a hard core of as few as 17,000 to 20,000 personnel, which is far short of the establishment figure of 42,000. In 2003–04, the number of TA bounties paid for classification year 5 was 14,585. The figure was 2,288 for year 3 and only 2,098 for year 1. We need to know the latest figures, as it appears that there is high turnover. I cannot believe that the Ministry does not know how many have left the TA shortly after returning from deployment in Iraq. That is another crucial piece of information that is missing—at least, it is not in the public domain.

I suspect that some of the numbers in respect of the stated TA strength of 31,680, excluding the OTC, are what I call paper figures: the personnel do not exist in reality but are figments of creative number crunching. As the Minister knows, TA centres are under tremendous pressure to keep numbers up at all costs, and some are not efficient in clearing from the statistics those who have fallen by the wayside.

Many TA centres are fearful of being downgraded or closed down completely because of reducing numbers. It is a fact that a small number of units will be disbanded and a handful of underutilised TA centres will be closed. However, it is nothing but a joke to say that displaced personnel will have the chance to transfer to other units. Does anyone really imagine that they will make a round trip of some 50 miles to go to another unit? In that way, TA members' service will end involuntarily for logistical and practical reasons, yet we cannot afford to lose even one person, as numbers are so low at present.

Many civil servants who were told last June that their TA units would be downgraded and that further information would be given in October still do not know their fate. When will they be informed about their future prospects, and is this not a case of bad man management? Nothing erodes confidence and motivation as quickly as uncertainty.

Another concern is that the TA is required to contribute to the civil contingency reaction force, which is another creation of the European Union and part of its continuing regionalisation policy. If there were a long-term crisis in the future, the requirement of 12 out of 60 months' service for TA personnel would soon be used up for the simple reason that most would have already served between 10 and 11 months. Surely, therefore, more people would be excluded from long-term CCRF service. I find it extraordinary that the Department cannot respond to the query concerning how many personnel from each TA infantry regiment are signed up for CCRF duties. Does the Department know the answer or does it not?

That brings me to the terms of service: a legal requirement of one year in three, possibly extended to five, which translates into a six-month deployment. That can be compared favourably with the USA equivalent of a 12-month deployment in three years. It is true that the United States is running into difficulties with recruitment, retention and morale in the national guard. How can anyone have a successful civilian career when they may be required to disappear for such long stints, especially those in the specialised professions, whose expertise and career advancement may be adversely affected?

I know that the Minister appreciates the contribution of employers, especially those in smaller businesses. The work undertaken by SaBRE—Supporting Britain's Reservists and Employers—is excellent, as are the holiday training packages offered to TA personnel after deployment. As the Minister knows, that requires a great sacrifice of both time and finance for those left at home holding the fort.

Let us not forget that those in the TA are, first and foremost, civilians, and although it may be true, as the Minister has stated on more than one occasion, that the TA cannot be distinguished from regulars on active duty, it has to be recognised that its members are in a totally different category without many of the services or the back-up available to members of the regular forces. I understand fully that the Government are trying to create a smaller, high-tech, medium-weight Army, backed up by a highly professional and well trained part-time force, but the integration process is nevertheless fraught with difficulties. Integration between territorial and regular forces is working well in the run-up to Operation Telic 8 because a well established system has developed, not least because the situation in Iraq has gone on for so long. It would be a different story should a war-fighting mission develop, and the difference in capability and experience would then become obvious.

I note the Minister's statement that recruitment has been changed to incorporate regulars and TA, although I doubt that the present financial commitment to recruitment can be maintained. That is the subject of another written question that has remained unanswered since January, when I asked the Secretary of State for Defence

"what spending has been allocated to Territorial Army recruitment for

a) the last three quarters of 2005,

b) the first quarter of 2006 and

c) 2006–07?"

I also feel that the TA does better when undertaking its own recruitment. I welcome the commitment to allow TA volunteers to undergo short deployments that will give them tremendous experience when working with the regulars, but care must be taken not to produce a small mercenary force.

We must ensure that the new infantry TA battalions linked directly to their equivalent regular regiments work well in the integration process, but we must fully involve the local communities upon which they rely for recruitment. Sometimes those developments, which are part of the plan for the future Army structure, overlook the small details that create good morale and good working relationships. If recruitment can be maintained only by a massive level of funding and it falls when the foot is taken off the accelerator, we have to ask what is wrong with the conditions of service—the cause of the recruitment and retention problem. We know that there is a manning crisis because units go into deployment undermanned. Are falling numbers a direct result of long deployments? If the TA is continually expected to fill the gap, we should ask why people are not attracted to recruitment into the regulars. The differentials between pay and conditions play a part in that.

The TA is no longer seen as the reserve force to be called up in an emergency, but as a continual front-line force instead. However, whatever civilian skills the TA can bring to the Army, it is not the equivalent of the regulars. Its officers do not have the same in-depth training and experience, and it is a tragedy that so many Sandhurst TA places remain unfilled each year.

Although the TA does an excellent job, it should never be expected to be equal to the regulars. Instead, it should be considered a very capable back-up, trained to the highest degree, bearing in mind the limitations in the hours of service volunteered. When the TA is on deployment, including on second or further deployments, those involved are paid their equivalent civilian wage or salary, which is often far in excess of that of equivalent ranks in the regular forces. It has been drawn to my attention that some TA personnel working alongside regulars have bragged about the differentials in pay rates and remuneration. It has even been alleged that they have rigged their civilian wages in order to get higher pay, and a recent example of this happening in Belize was pointed out to me. I am sure that that situation could be checked out through cross-referencing with the Inland Revenue, but the point is that care should be taken when dealing with soldiers on two different pay scales—without which, I hasten to add, there would be no volunteers or recruits. The regulars should be informed about the pay procedures of the TA, and those in the TA should be briefed not to damage morale on deployment by flaunting superior pay rates.

The continuing problem of overstretch has been raised many times in debates and it is one of the reasons why the TA is in such demand. Understandably, regulars like to be deployed where there are varied tasks, which is one of the reasons why they signed up in the first place. I suspect that some of the more boring operational requirements are down to NATO and European Union commitments. I understand that the Gurkhas, who were recently in Bosnia, were deployed to check on illegal logging and undertook patrols without arms, which seems to me to be quite extraordinary for an infantry regiment. At present, the TA in some regiments is being deployed to a far greater extent than its regular cousins, which is another factor that can cause friction and which needs to be monitored.

I cannot stress enough the importance of good morale to the retention of our armed services personnel, who are undoubtedly respected and admired by the British people. With numbers in the regular forces shrinking, the TA is carrying out a greater variety of roles today, although numbers available for deployment are decreasing, as the Minister knows. With so much change taking place, the impetus is to consider the big picture, but it is important not to overlook the small details that, if forgotten, can quickly damage morale.

There are many serving in the Army today who feel resentful because their cap badges have been taken away—although obviously not from those in the Scottish regiments—and they have been forced into different regiments or re-roled into different functions. Will the Minister respond today to the written question I tabled in November 2004 about the progress of the re-roleing of the three regular infantry regiments that were being disbanded? The same situation is now occurring in the TA infantry.

One of the purposes of this debate is to emphasise that armed services personnel are people who, in this day and age, are not compelled to do what they do on behalf of us all. They should not just be pushed around. They need to have a strong inner conviction to be able to serve and they need to know what this country stands for and what it expects of them. We are immensely proud of their achievements, but it has to be recognised that when an army is downsized it is difficult to manage that downward spiral and it is essential that morale is maintained, often by attending to the small details that can make such a difference. We must listen to those who serve at the base of the military pyramid, and I hope that the debate will highlight some of the issues that most concern them.

We live in times of great political and military change, do we not? The Government are walking a tightrope with a huge future financial and technical commitment to the field of defence. The whole package has to be delivered if it is to be successful. As financial constraints kick in, as they surely will, the choice will be between cutting the number of personnel, obtaining new, up-to-date and expensive equipment, or pushing back further the dates of implementation. Quite honestly, it is a frightening scenario for the Government who will be in office between 2010 and 2020.

Although no one will admit it, I believe that the UK is heading quietly and stealthily towards participation in a fully integrated European Union force. The Minister will, however, be relieved to learn that that is not a subject to pursue this morning, although I intend to return to it.

I shall listen with great interest to the Minister's contribution and to others who catch your eye, Mrs Dean. I am grateful to the Minister for listening so carefully to what I have had to say.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) on securing this debate. Having served with the infantry in the Guards and, during the latter part of my military career, in the Royal Army Medical Corps, I wish to discuss the two key areas highlighted by my hon. Friend as being severely overstretched.

The integration of the Territorial Army with the regular forces has changed beyond belief in the past 20 years. In the 1970s when I served with the infantry in the Guards, the TA was, to be frank, a laughing stock among the regular forces. The two never worked together or integrated, and they rarely trained together, apart from an annual two-week exercise in Germany—and we usually ran out of fuel, bullets and everything else, because we were so badly funded.

I congratulate the Government, because in the past 10 years, the integration and training of the TA have worked fantastically. Thank goodness they have. The armed forces are now so small that without the TA—which comprises civilians who, as my hon. Friend said, work with the armed forces—how would the infantry and the Royal Army Medical Corps cope when serving this country so brilliantly throughout the world?

I have two concerns about the way in which the Government propose to deal with the cuts in the TA, and they are cuts; there is no argument about what is happening. We can put as much spin on it as we like, but they are cuts, especially to the infantry and to the medical corps.

First, I fear that we shall use and abuse the TA even more. I have raised that issue many times with the Secretary of State and the Minister on the Floor of the House. There is no shortage of volunteers, but each time they are the same volunteers—guys and girls—who are keen to serve their country and gain experience. They are not the people who are leaving in their droves. In my constituency, TA recruitment is suffering. One reason is that TA centres locally have been closed and there is a huge distance to travel between centres.

Another reason is the pressure on married serving TA members as well as regulars. People want to be with their families, and such people tend to have the experience in that they have served in the armed forces and now serve with the TA. They want to serve and to be deployed but they do not want to go back time and again. The people who tend to volunteer time and again are single and without the experience and training that are desperately needed.

By deploying so often, there is a massive problem with training. One reason why there are so many problems with the bounty is that people can be deployed with the TA to Iraq, but when they return, they are not guaranteed the bounty, because they have not done the training. At first, I thought that that was wrong, but the jobs that TA members undertake on deployment do not form part of the training needed for deployment elsewhere. TA members undertake not only long deployments, but further training on their return. That puts even more pressure on their relationships, job prospects and careers. That is why so many people are leaving.

I am not surprised that the Government have not answered the questions tabled by my hon. Friend, because I think that they are embarrassed about the problems with recruitment and retention levels in the armed forces as a whole.

For my sins, I am taking part in the armed forces parliamentary scheme this year by serving with the Army. I know that I am getting a bit long in the tooth to be wearing uniform, but having been around some units, I have been shocked at the age of some of our NCOs and their lack of experience. Everybody needs to be made up and given responsibility. I was lucky: I joined the Army as a junior guardsman and just about made guardsman, so I have no experience of promotion in the armed forces. However, the people who commanded tended quite rightly to have the experience and, within the regiment or battalion, the necessary kudos to lead. I have been to Iraq twice and seen the training regiments and some of the people who are training our armed forces. They are very young and they have limited experience, partly because we are losing so many experienced people.

My second concern is about pay and morale. My hon. Friend highlighted an interesting point when she said that there are two types of unit: those made up of regular soldiers, whose pay is better than it was when I served, although we would all accept that it is still not great; and, often embedded with the regulars, those made up of the TA personnel who match their civilian salary.

There is a third category, however, about which I was surprised to learn. I have raised this matter before with the Secretary of State and the Minister. Agency staff are brought in to supplement units in Iraq, especially the Royal Army Medical Corps field ambulance units. The regulars are on their set pay, the TA units are on theirs, and then agency staff are brought in to fill the gaps in the TA medical units. When I was in al-Amara in Iraq just before the election, I witnessed that situation and its damaging effect on morale within the armed forces.

I compliment the bravery of agency people who have gone in to such environments as untrained civilians. However, the effect on the morale of the armed forces is phenomenal. Without high morale, we do not have armed forces. We cannot deploy them throughout the world and ask them to do what we ask, week in, week out, if morale is low. Morale is low in certain parts of the Army, and particularly in the infantry, partly because of the reorganisation and abolition of regiments, and partly because of the sheer size of the deployment. That issue must be addressed.

I cannot see that the shortfall in the Royal Army Medical Corps will be addressed by cutting back the TA medical services. It seems illogical. If the Government have admitted defeat in their attempts to recruit people to the medical services, perhaps we need to consider how other countries have recruited successfully. The Americans have an excellent system. Their medical services are some of the best in the world, because they encourage people to undertake commitments as part of their civilian and military career structure. If one moves on in the US civil guard medical services, one moves on in one's civilian career. It is a twin-track approach, and perhaps it is something that we need to consider.

We have a fantastic Territorial Army. Without it, we should never have been able to do any of the things that we have done in the past 20 years throughout the world, from the Falklands, through the two Gulf wars, to Afghanistan and so on. We must not use and abuse TA personnel. We must not assume that those people will volunteer every single time. They are young and enthusiastic, but sometimes common sense must prevail. I hope that we can consider that issue, and I look forward to the Minister's answers to the debate.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) on securing the debate and on the research that she has put into preparing her speech. I congratulate also the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning), because he brought to the debate not only a sense of what is happening today, through his participation in the parliamentary armed forces scheme, but his experience as a soldier in times past. The most important aspect of his contribution was his reference to the way in which the Territorial Army has changed in the past 20 years. The change is positive rather than negative, because it used to be said unfairly of the TA that its members were the SAS—the Saturday and Sunday soldiers. If it were ever true, and I doubt that it was, it is certainly not true today. I place on record my appreciation of all the reserve forces and, as it is the subject of today's debate, the TA in particular.

Ann Winterton: I welcome what the hon. Gentleman said about the professionalism of our TA and reserve forces. However, would he not agree that we have perhaps been over-reliant on them? In the future, that subject must be addressed by the Government of the day or else we will not be able to deploy the troops that we need for the roles that we undertake throughout the world.

Bob Russell: I was going to come on to that, but the hon. Lady has made the point well in both her speech and her intervention that we must not become over-reliant on our reserve forces, the Territorial Army. The situation has changed. The reference to it being used as an infill to perform all the duties of the regular forces should be taken as a compliment rather than a criticism. That is exactly as it should be.

I was a member of the Armed Forces Bill Committee, and we visited Iraq only a month or so ago. Some time into a conversation with a group of four young soldiers, we realised that they were from the Territorial Army. Indeed, their immediate officer was a university student who was taking a year out. Spending two back-to-back tours in Iraq must be the most interesting gap year experience ever. We were so proud of and impressed by those young men, who were serving their country. They had been called up, but it was clear that they had volunteered for that. There is a system in the Territorial Army, which we need not go into, whereby its members are not necessarily pressed into service in Iraq but they let it be known that they are content to be called up.

Yes, the Territorial Army should be rebalanced, and its role is changing, but we should be proud of the fact that its soldiers are performing duties along with the regulars. However, I take on board the point that we should not become over-reliant on them. The Government need to address the point that both our regular and reserve forces must be of a size sufficient to deal with the commitment that the Government of the day wish them to perform.

Not for the first time, the Minister will have heard the phrase "under-strength and over-stretched". That is certainly the case for the regulars and, in many cases, it could also be said of the TA. Many of those young men and women—I want to stress the increasing numbers of young ladies in the regular forces and the Territorials—provide a large part of that strength in Iraq or wherever they are asked to serve. Without them, we would be in even more of a difficult state. We should also place on record our appreciation of the increasing number of young ladies in the forces.

The footprint of an Army presence in the United Kingdom is important. I can say that with some degree of detachment, because I represent one of the four super-garrisons and the Army is there from day to day. Not only do we have a strong TA unit, the Royal Signals, but the rebalancing means that Colchester will get two more TA detachments, one at the military corrective training centre and the other for medics. I take on board the hon. Lady's point and ask the Government seriously to consider the matter. The footprint of TA bases, as well as Navy and Air Force bases where relevant, is for many people the only visible presence of the Army in the United Kingdom. That is an important part of recruitment into the regulars as well as the TA, and can be a route into the forces in the same way as the Army cadets.

I was also impressed in Iraq with the brigade commander in Basra, who told us that he had written personally to the employer of every TA soldier who he had serving to thank them and inform them of the excellent job that their employee or employees were doing. I know that the Government, and previous Governments, have shown appreciation to employers. Perhaps we should collectively do more. Many employers take the view that having one or more of their staff serving in the reserve forces is of benefit to their company, because of the managerial skills, team leadership and participation required. The employer also benefits.

Ann Winterton: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. The point that I sought to make, which is important and valid, was that medium to large companies—certainly big companies—can afford to have one of their key personnel away for lengths of time because they can cover what that person does. However, it is a tremendous loss to smaller businesses, especially if the person goes on a second deployment fairly quickly. In such cases, it is absolutely critical. I commend the commanding officer who wrote to the employers. That is an instance of the small detail that is extremely welcome.

Bob Russell: Obviously, the smaller the firm, the greater the impact will be if a member of staff is deployed, or is not at work for whatever reason. Members of the House have, of course, been called up to serve in Iraq. Far be it from me to say whether the House suffered from their absence, but it is fair to say that the House is the richer for those hon. Members, on their return, informing us of their experiences. That is something that we should also show appreciation of.

It has been said that the establishment figure for the Territorial Army is 42,000. It is not unreasonable for the Government to say what the shortage is, if any, within that 42,000 establishment. It should not be too difficult for the Ministry of Defence to ascertain the number of recruits, the number of people who leave, the length of time that recruits stay in the Territorial Army and their reasons for departure. I assume that, as a good employer, albeit of a volunteer force, the Government and the Ministry of Defence would seek to establish such figures so that they could learn why there are shortfalls and why recruitment is not going as well as it might, as well as what can be done to encourage retention. The same questions also need to be addressed for the regular Army.

I ask the Government to up the praise of the Territorial Army. I am sure that they praise it at every opportunity, but sometimes one has to keep saying it so that people appreciate it. Employers need to be encouraged and be shown the appreciation of the nation for allowing members of their work force to be called up. The Government also need to look seriously at whether they expect too much of our reserve forces. I know that the young people we met in Iraq were keen volunteers, but I question whether, if they are asked to return there next year or the year after, that enthusiasm will wane. That also goes for members of the regular Army.

Ministers need to ask whether they have cut the regular Army too much, whether the rebalancing and reconfiguration of the Territorial Army has struck the right balance, and whether there is a case to encourage the voluntary ethos by seeking to retain as many TA centres across the country as possible. Indeed, they should consider population shifts to see whether there are some places where the establishment of a new TA centre might be in everybody's best interests.

11.39 am

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) for securing this worthwhile debate. I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning) for bringing to the House his experience both on the ground and as a member of the armed forces parliamentary scheme. Finally, I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) for bringing to the debate his knowledge as a constituency Member for a garrison town—one that will be more prominent with Territorial Army personnel—and his interest in the subject generally.

One of the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton ably made related to the change that the Government have brought about in the role of the Territorial Army, which they have moved from being a reserve to being a much more regularly mobilised force. That has some advantages, and my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead drew attention to the training and the better integration between the reserve and regular forces. Those developments are welcome, but there is concern that the Army is being asked to do more and more with less and less, as full-time regular forces are reduced, and that the reserves are taking some of the strain.

The recent National Audit Office report on the reserve forces said:

"In the future, the Territorial Army will primarily be used to augment the Regular Army for a large-scale operation. For smaller operations, the Department is planning on the basis that a fully-manned, restructured Regular Army should be able to provide most of the necessary capability on its own, supplemented by a small number of specialist Territorial Army units. The Territorial Army will continue to be mobilised for small and medium-scale operations, including enduring operations"

this is the key point—

"when Defence Planning Assumptions are exceeded, as they are at present."

One risk highlighted by the National Audit Office is that exceeding defence planning assumptions for the foreseeable future might put too much of a burden on the reserve forces, and those assumptions have been exceeded in every year but one since 1999. Given the state of the world, with the continuing challenges that we face in Afghanistan and Iraq—who knows what might happen there?—and the pressures on humanitarian forces in Africa, our defence planning assumptions are likely to be exceeded, thus putting pressure on our regular and reserve forces. The time might have come for the Ministry of Defence to revisit those assumptions and reset them for the world in which we live.

The National Audit Office report highlighted one further risk, which is worthy of comment from the Minister. It relates to the effect that the regular deployment of reserve forces has on the number of forces available for deployment. If the Ministry wants to keep to its guidelines and deploy such forces only once every five years, it must realise that the more we deploy reserves on operations other than big war-fighting operations, the fewer will be available to be deployed. If we also take into account the fact that new reserve forces are not yet trained, we see that a shrinking percentage of the available forces is available for deployment. If we needed reserve forces for a war-fighting operation or a civil contingency, they might simply not be there, or the Ministry might have to resort to the legal position under which it can call such forces out once every three years.

Let me touch on the civil contingency aspect of the reserve forces. The new chapter of the strategic defence review, which was written post-9/11, stated that the reserve forces would be part of the civil contingency reaction forces if something happened at home. Sadly, as we know from the events of last year, such things do happen at home and need to be responded to. In 2001, the then Secretary of State for Defence, who is now Leader of the House, said:

"The role of the Reserves could be crucial, as we do not want to be committing significant numbers of our Regular Forces that might be required overseas".

In other words, regular forces might be required for overseas operations, as they have been, and the reserves would have a significant role to play in being available for reaction forces at home.

As to the resources that that might require, the new chapter of the SDR states that a reaction force would, on average, contain 500 volunteer reserves in each region. In principle, that would give about 6,000 volunteer reserves nationwide. As my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton said when she discussed the actual and paper numbers available, those 6,000 reserves represent half the Territorial Army strength available for deployment. I have significant concerns that if, God forbid, something happened in the United Kingdom requiring those reaction forces to be called out in significant numbers, we simply would not have the numbers available to react, which would leave us significantly weakened at home. It would be helpful if the Minister said how many members of the Territorial Army have volunteered for civil contingency reaction duties as part of their Territorial Army role, because they regularly have to do so.

Ann Winterton: Does my hon. Friend not believe that what he says about reserve forces at home being called up—he mentioned the numbers involved—flies in the face of the current policy, which has been to ensure that integration works well? Indeed, although I highlighted the difficulties, that policy is working well, but does this change not go against what is being undertaken?

Mr. Harper: My hon. Friend makes a good point. There is a balance to be struck in these things. My hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead made some good points about the advantages of better training and better integration between the reserves and the regular forces. Indeed, as the hon. Member for Colchester said, the Territorial Army has played a critical role in supporting our regular forces on deployments overseas. However, we can have too much of a good thing and take such deployments too far, and if we do, we miss out on the benefit of having reserve forces. There is supposed to be something in reserve to cope with unexpected situations; indeed, a key issue in defence is that threats often come from unexpected quarters, and few people would have predicted some of the challenges that we now face.

Bob Russell: Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that the Territorial Army still operates as a stand-alone unit and that it integrates only when it is called up? For example, the young soldiers whom I mentioned are all members of the West Midlands Regiment. They operate as a self-contained Territorial Army regiment in this country and join and integrate into the Regular Army only when they are called up or volunteer. Are those not already stand-alone units, which integrate as the circumstances require?

Mr. Harper: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. The point that I was making is about the availability of forces—although it might be obviated somewhat by the extent to which members of the reserve forces volunteer—and the data in the National Audit Office report. Given the number of reserves being used on operations, the turnover among such forces, which I shall discuss in a minute, and the number of those who are not yet trained, the strength of the Territorial Army is little more than 30,000, and only about a third of that number are available for deployment. If we keep deploying reserve forces regularly on operations, we may be lucky, and members of the Territorial Army might volunteer for further operations, but, legally, the Government will not be able to call them up. That might leave us short of resources if we needed them in an emergency.

A second, related point involves the personal pressure that we put on those in the reserve forces and on their employers. If we regularly use reserves for operations and then need them for something unexpected, we will put a considerable burden on them and their employers, which might have an impact on the time that some are willing to serve.

I turn to the motivation of those who serve in the Territorial Army. Like those who have spoken so far, I am proud of the role that the Territorial Army plays and of its professionalism. The fact that people who are in the reserves, and are not therefore full-time soldiers, can go on operational deployment and be indistinguishable from their full-time colleagues is a tribute to those involved, to the training that they receive and to the armed forces generally. However, there is one issue that we must consider. If we increase pressures on them—one reason cited by those leaving the Territorial Army is its effect on their relationships and personal life, as well as the lack of support that they receive—we will risk increasing the rate at which people leave. That is the conclusion of the National Audit Office.

The Government, in their report "Operations in Iraq: Lessons for the Future", note that the risk of using reserves solely to plug shortfalls will increasingly affect recruitment. The annual outflow of personnel from the Territorial Army is about 10,000 a year, or a third of the force. That has two impacts. First, we are losing all the skills and training that were so hard won, which will have to be regained at a cost in time and money. Secondly, even if the numbers on board remain the same, the high turnover will reduce the number of deployable people. Although there will be an inflow of new volunteers, the fact that those troops cannot be deployed until they are properly trained reduces by a significant margin the number available for deployment.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton said, if we put the Territorial Army under too much pressure, we will increase the rate of departure, increase training needs and reduce the number available for deployment. We return to the central problem that the Territorial Army is being asked to do more than it can with current manning levels.

I turn next to medics. The subject has already been drawn to our attention by my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead, who served in the Army medical corps.

Mike Penning: The Royal Army Medical Corps.

Mr. Harper: I apologise to my hon. Friend. The subject was drawn to our attention also in a recent statement by the Minister of State on Territorial Army rebalancing. The volunteer reserves, especially the Territorial Army, have been used to supply the Regular Army with a significant number of specialists, particularly medics. The specialist Territorial Army units, such as Army Medical Services, have a shortfall of more than 40 per cent., which was drawn to our attention by the National Audit Office report. Reserves will continue to be crucial in providing deployed medical capability, and we see how valuable they are when we realise that 88 medical specialists were deployed more than once in the past five years. That demonstrates our need for them.

The problem is that there are significant pinch-points with medical personnel. Indeed, the requirement for medical consultants is stated to be 110, but manning can be as low as 10. In a statement on Territorial Army rebalancing, the Minister of State said:

> "As fewer volunteers will be required as signallers, logisticians and combat medical staff, there will also be reductions in a number of other arms and services."—[Official Report, 23 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 427–28.]

That did not seem to stack up with the shortage of medical personnel. Indeed, the Minister of State was pressed on that point by my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) and by the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for North Devon (Nick Harvey), but he did not satisfactorily answer them. He said that one difficulty in recruiting medical personnel for regular and reserve forces is increased recruitment to the national health service.

This is not banter, but a serious question: given the changes in the health service and the consequent redeployment of personnel and resources, would it not be sensible for the Ministry of Defence to consider whether some of those being let go from the NHS would like a role in the armed forces—or, if they are changing career, whether they would be interested in joining the Territorial Army?

My hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead made a very good point about integrating career structures. Medical personnel in the United States are employed in the private sector, but they can better integrate their career progression in the private sector with being in the armed forces; that gives the forces better retention. In this country, where medical personnel are employed primarily by the NHS, joined-up government would mean that we could much better integrate career progression in the NHS and in the armed forces, and thus enable more of our medics to serve in our reserve forces.

I return to what I said at the start. It is clear why we use the reserves. It is probably good that people should join the Territorial Army in the expectation that they will be mobilised at least once, and it is right that we should use the Territorial Army to support our regular forces. However, a balance has to be struck. If we push that balance too far and put too much pressure on the Territorial Army, it will not be able to support our armed forces and we will not be able to use it at home.

I conclude on that note. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton for initiating the debate and look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say in response to the wide-ranging questions that have been asked.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): As this is the first opportunity that a Defence Minister has had to appear before the House since the break, I hope that you, Mr. Caton, will think it appropriate for me to pay tribute to Lieutenant Richard Palmer of the Royal Scots Guards, who was killed in Iraq on 15 April. I am sure that all who have read the comments in the press over the past few days will know that this young man was committed to his job. He was greatly loved by his family and he will be sorely missed. I am sure that our thoughts and prayers are with him and his family at this time. I doubt whether any of the 600-odd Members of Parliament could think of a better epitaph than the one that appeared in the Daily Express today, which said that this young man was trying to make lives better for others. He demonstrated a hugely moral and wonderful commitment. I have no doubt that his loss will be greatly felt by his family and his colleagues.

I take the opportunity to congratulate the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton) on securing this debate. I am in regular correspondence with the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) on the Armed Forces Bill; indeed, when we have finished with that Bill, there will be a huge gap in his life and mine. If the day comes when the hon. Lady stops sending me questions about reservists, there will be a similar gap in our lives. She is certainly assiduous in pursuing such matters.

I have no doubt that the hon. Lady understands the nature of the changes to the Territorial Army that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, who is responsible for the armed forces, referred to in his statement of 23 March. I apologise again for his absence; he is abroad at present. The changes that he spoke of are essential to maintaining a British Army that works as well in this century as it did in the previous one.

The job that our soldiers do today is every bit as important as the job that their predecessors did during the first and second world wars. However, the challenges that they face are, as we all know, very different. Today's soldier must not only engage in combat, but must play the part of peacekeeper and sometimes peace enforcer. The modern British soldier may be fighting to overthrow a dictator one day, keeping peace the next, and rebuilding schools, bridges or power stations the day after. Those are all potentially hostile environments, and they often work under the auspices of different organisations such as NATO or the United Nations.

A British soldier's job is not easy. He or she must be capable of changing not only what they do but the way in which they react to particular situations. They are dedicated, brave and committed men and women, and I have no doubt that all hon. Members are justly proud of their commitment and service. This constantly developing role, which reflects not only the changing nature of warfare but the changing world in which we live, demands British forces who are even more responsive and effective while maintaining their reputation for professionalism and fairness—points made earlier in the debate. That is why changes are being made to the Army.

Today's debate is about the Territorial Army, but I emphasise that the TA is an integral part of the British Army, part of the "one Army" concept to which most hon. Members referred. The Territorial Army was set up almost 100 years ago. Since then, TA volunteers have time and again proved their mettle and their worth, from the battlefields of the first and second world wars to Bosnia, Kosovo, Iraq and Afghanistan. Indeed, the Chief of the General Staff, General Sir Mike Jackson, said that our forces are busy—they all are—but that our commitments are not unmanageable. He said that "the Reserves have always delivered everything we have asked of them".

He said that he was confident that they would continue to do so.

It is fair to say that there are few places in which the British Army has operated in the past decades where it has not had some TA colleagues alongside. The House does not need to be reminded that they are volunteers—a point made by Opposition Members—who give up their time for small reward to serve their country. They are serving right now, in the UK and around the world. Although they are called upon to serve less often than their regular counterparts, in some ways, the job is even more difficult—as colleagues fully understand. When they are deployed, they must be as professional and well disciplined as their regular counterparts.

Last year, the Government announced changes to the Regular Army that will help to prepare us for new challenges. We live in a world in which challenges to democracy, fundamental rights and freedoms, and the rule of law are more prevalent than ever. We cannot choose to ignore those global challenges in a global world. They require a different British Army to deal with them. The Regular Army is now far enough down the road of those changes for us confidently to say that we must now tackle the shaping of the Territorial Army in order that it can best support and be integrated with the Regular Army.

We are confident that we have found the right solutions not just because we have carefully analysed our future defence needs, but because we have consulted widely with members of the Territorial Army and others. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State paid tribute to the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) in the debate on the Floor of the House on 23 March, when he said that he had had a good meeting with the hon. Gentleman and that he was grateful to him for asking a range of questions that he put to his officials, thus helping him to be better informed when taking ministerial decisions. We have consulted on the need to adjust for the future and the manner of that adjustment. Only after careful consideration of all the relevant factors did we come to the right solution.

I do not want to spend too much time repeating what my right hon. Friend told the House less than a month ago, because the details are well known to colleagues. The changes are good for the TA, the Army and Britain. As colleagues know, the size of the TA will remain unchanged, with a current liability of 38,500, excluding the 3,500 in the Officer Training Corps. We will, however, deploy our men and women and their equipment more effectively.

At this stage, I should make a point about the proportion of the TA that is currently deployable for operations. That issue was touched on by Opposition Members. There have been several reports of late about manning shortages in the TA, and I would like to provide some context, which might help colleagues. About 13,000 TA soldiers are classed as being available for deployment, whereas our current requirement is about 1,200 a year—about 10 per cent. of those available for deployment. A similar number are classed as being unavailable due to the Army's intention that soldiers should not be mobilised more than once every five years. If we were to work to the less rigid provisions of the Reserve Forces Act 1996, which states that TA soldiers may not be mobilised more than once every three years, the number of soldiers available for mobilisation would be about 17,000. I accept the points made by the hon. Members for Congleton and for Hemel Hempstead (Mike Penning) about the numbers available for deployment, but the current requirement is about 10 per cent. of the number who are available.

Mr. Harper: The Minister is quite right, but the whole point of reserves is that they are available for unexpected situations. For example, when we were involved in the heaviest part of the Iraq conflict, more than 8,000 reservists were called out, which would be half the number available. There is supposed to be a large number of reservists available for deployment, but not necessarily used. It would be appalling if we were using the number who are available at all times. There is supposed to be a gap: it is an insurance policy against unexpected events.

Mr. Touhig: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. In a moment, I will respond to the hon. Lady's comments; she made an important point about morale. We must all be careful about what we say, although I do not suggest that anyone has said anything in this debate that would badly affect morale. There is sometimes a perception that the number of forces available is close to the numbers that we need at present; I was simply trying to get across the point that we currently need to deploy about 10 per cent. of the force that is available, and that the situation does not merit the extreme concern that some people have expressed in the media.

Mike Penning: There is some confusion, not least among Opposition Members, as to where those figures are from. It would be helpful for both the morale of the armed forces and the knowledge of Back Benchers if a breakdown of those figures could be placed in the Library today, so that we can see exactly where the Minister's figures are from, as they are completely different from those that have appeared in the press.

Mr. Touhig: Yes; I will certainly do that. Indeed, I am going to make one or two offers to the hon. Lady in my comments.

Ann Winterton: If the Minister's figures are just so, will he answer my question about civil contingency reaction force duties and my unanswered question about which people are signed up for which TA infantry units?

Mr. Touhig: I have made a note of the hon. Lady's questions, and will, if she will permit me, come to them when I respond to her remarks.

New specialisations are being created to reflect the changing demands placed on the Army as a whole. A new custodial capability will help to ensure that we continue to treat any prisoners we take with due respect and dignity. A new unit will be trained to support the Apache attack helicopter in the field, and a new military intelligence battalion will be formed to enable intelligence staff to focus more on specific areas of their specialisation. More opportunities are also being created through expansion in areas such as engineering and armour.

All that means a Territorial Army that is structured to be more relevant across a full range of operational requirements. The Royal Armoured Corps, the Royal Engineers, the Royal Military Police, the Intelligence Corps and the Army Air Corps will all increase in size, but in order to achieve those enhancements within the existing liability, reductions will have to be made elsewhere.

Let me stress that this is not simply a matter of balancing the books. If we had thought it necessary, we would have considered increasing the establishment of the Territorial Army, but it is not. We are aligning TA structures with those of the Regular Army so that the regulars have the support that they need when and where they need it. We are doing that by ensuring that the Territorials are available in the right numbers and with the right specialisations and the best and most appropriate training. We have reduced the infantry by one battalion, bringing the TA infantry structure into alignment with the Regular Army infantry structure, with most battalions adopting the new regimental names of their regular counterparts.

As well as new units being created, some units will change roles—from infantry to engineers, for example—and others will change their specialism within their branch, such as a Royal Artillery air defence unit changing to the 105 mm light gun. A small number of small and poorly recruited units will disband completely. Three centres will lose their TA presence, but will remain open to accommodate their existing cadet detachments.

Every soldier who finds himself or herself displaced by their unit being disbanded or re-roled will be offered a post in another unit as close as possible to their home or in a nationally recruited unit. However, I take the point that was raised by hon. Members that that there can be a problem with distance. I emphasise that no TA soldier's service will be compulsorily terminated as a result of the rebalancing exercise.

There will also be a reduction, on paper, in the size of Army Medical Services, which several colleagues mentioned in their speeches. The reduction must be understood in the wider context. First, changes to the regulars announced last year mean that regular medical units have about an extra 380 personnel, making them better structured and positioned to deal with operational demands. Secondly, for many years, the TA has had difficulty in recruiting the numbers of medical personnel required to fill all the established posts. As part of the integrated, "one Army" approach, we have chosen not to chase an impossible target by holding several hundred posts open with little chance of filling them. It is better to make expectations more realistic, but only after the enhancements to regular medical units announced by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State. That will not only enable better operational planning, but will allow us easily to increase the number of established posts in other specialisations with a greater chance of actually filling them.

Mr. Harper: The Minister said that the number of medical personnel in the regular forces was being increased. In the Ministry of Defence's own annual report and accounts for 2004–05, the medical area was deemed to be one of critical shortage. We touched on that during the Minister of State's statement about TA rebalancing and did not get a satisfactory answer. Will the Under-Secretary be clear about the number of medical personnel required in both the regular forces and the reserves, and the number that we currently have available?

Mr. Touhig: It might be helpful if we were a little more open in the way we tackle the recruitment issues. If I may, I shall refer to that later on, because it is important. We all have a role to play, because we all passionately believe in the success of our forces, and the TA in particular. Colleagues in all parts of the House could play a role that would be beneficial to our forces. I take on board the point that the hon. Gentleman makes.

The changes to which I have referred not only enable better operational planning, but allow us easily to increase the number of established posts in other specialisations with a greater chance of actually filling them. The reality, therefore, is that while there is no reduction in the operational requirement for the TA medical services or in the numbers employed, enhancements are under way to the regular medical services.

Earlier I mentioned that the TA faces a constant challenge in maintaining a level of training that enables it to operate effectively alongside its regular counterparts. That is why we must do our utmost to ensure that the training it receives makes the best use of the available time and other resources. Our aim is for TA soldiers, when mobilised, to be fully prepared for even the most difficult of environments. Rebalancing will pair TA units with regular counterparts, forming strong links between the units and, whenever possible, allowing TA soldiers to train alongside the regulars. Where limited, high-value equipment is involved, and if it is appropriate and realistic, regular units will make such equipment available for TA soldiers to train on. Such measures will enhance the training of TA soldiers. I assure colleagues that every TA soldier, whichever branch they are in, will be given the support and training needed so that he or she can continue to serve our country.

Hon. Members will be aware that much has been said in recent months about the TA losing "500 soldiers a month" and about recruitment being in decline. While those figures concentrate only on the numbers leaving and make no mention of the numbers recruited, it is fair to say that recruitment and retention, to which the hon. Member for Congleton referred, have been giving us cause for concern. That impacts on the other issue that she mentioned: morale. TA strength has stabilised in recent months, but we are not out of the woods yet, and we remain committed to concentrating our efforts in order further to improve manning and retention in the TA.

Mike Penning: If we are losing soldiers and gaining recruits, we are not gaining the experience. It will take a long time to get the catch-up required for those troops to be operational to the standards of the ones lost. If they are deployed so often, how is the training being done? I have spoken to TA soldiers who have returned. When they come back, they need some rest and recuperation and some TLC from their loved ones. The last thing that they want to do then is to go off again to training. If people are coming in and coming back, there will be a shortfall in the trained operational troops who can go anywhere in the world. That is where I think the figure that was mentioned is coming from; the pinch point will be in the experienced soldiers, not in the new recruits.

Mr. Touhig: I fully accept the hon. Gentleman's point. We cannot afford to lose experienced people. From his personal background, he knows the important contribution that they make. We need continuity, so that we get the quality of training and the continued recruitment.

Bob Russell: The Minister says that the numbers in the TA have stabilised. What is the approved strength? What is the actual strength?

Mr. Touhig: Currently, including our OTC, our establishment is about 42,000 and we are about 6,600 below that at the moment.

Since the 1990s, when the TA moved away from its cold war role towards a more flexible, mobilisation culture, members of that historic service have been increasingly asked to serve our country overseas. They have come to expect to be mobilised and deployed on a range of operations in support of our defence policies overseas. Indeed, the most frequent reason for joining given by new recruits to the TA is to be mobilised and serve on operations. About 12,000 reserves have deployed in Iraq alone since 2003. They have adapted, in just a few years, to the changing and very demanding circumstances of this new century, and the House has frequently acknowledged their courage and service, as I do again today.

Currently there are 495 Territorials serving in Iraq, 47 in Afghanistan, 23 in the Balkans and two in Sierra Leone. My right hon. Friend's announcement to the House last month on TA restructuring ensures that we give those brave men and women the training, opportunities and structures they need best to do their jobs.

I will refer to some of the points made by colleagues during the debate. I return to three important words used at the beginning by the hon. Member for Congleton: "recruitment", "retention" and "morale". They are all linked. I have tried to demonstrate that we believe that recruitment and retention are vital and that failure in those areas can have an adverse impact on morale. I parted company with her when she said that she thought that the numbers were in terminal decline; I note that in the debate in the House on 17 November she talked of "meltdown". I do not agree that that is occurring. Following remarks that I shall make in a moment, I hope that she might be persuaded that it is not taking place.

The hon. Lady went on to praise SaBRE—Supporting Britain's Reservists and Employers. I have the highest regard for its work, which makes a considerable difference. It helps our reservists, and ensures that they can deploy when we need them. She also said that uncertainty is a bad thing, and I agree with that. There is no doubt that there are always lessons to be learned. Leaving people in a vacuum in which they are unsure where they will be and what will happen is bad for morale, and that affects recruitment and retention. We return to that important triangle.

I shall examine the comments that the hon. Lady has made further when I get my copy of Hansard tomorrow. She has been properly persistent in asking questions. If she is willing and would like to come to the Department, perhaps I might arrange a briefing, during which we might get to the answers to some of the things that still concern her. I shall telephone her this afternoon on the issue.

Ann Winterton: That is the best offer I have had for some time.

Mr. Touhig: And you heard it here first. I shall telephone the hon. Lady this afternoon about the questions that she says have not been answered. Such a situation concerns me, because it is the responsibility of Government to answer questions when they are properly put. I shall look into her questions as quickly as possible.

Ann Winterton: I should be grateful to receive the answers to those questions. I am not pestering the Minister. I believe, like he does, that the answers should be in the public domain.

Mr. Touhig: I accept that. I made the point earlier that being more transparent about these matters helps everyone to understand the difficulties that we face and allows people to contribute. They could put forward solutions that might help, just as the hon. Member for Canterbury did in his meeting with my right hon. Friend, the Minister of State.

The hon. Member for Congleton asked which were the main areas of undermanning and the targets for recruitment. Medics, logistics and the Intelligence Corps are all areas where we have had difficulties and where we are seeking to put things right. She asked whether the Government have given up recruiting to establishment; we have not. As I said, we had the opportunity to change the establishment, but we did not feel it necessary at present. I have no doubt that more of these points will come out if she accepts my offer and comes to the MOD for a briefing.

The hon. Lady also asked why we did not know the figures for the time between deployments. The information is not held, as the key figure is about the total service in any one period, in accordance with the Reserve Forces Act 1996. Again, I would be happy to explain that in more detail if she were to come to the Department. My doing so would give her a better understanding of the situation. She also asked why we did not know how many members of the TA have left following service in Iraq. That information is held at unit level, but we are considering conducting exit surveys, which are a useful way of getting this information, so that we can have a better picture of what influences people.

Bob Russell: Is the Minister seriously saying that the Ministry of Defence has not been asking people why they are leaving the Territorial Army?

Mr. Touhig: We have extensive surveys about all aspects of the operation of our forces. The point I am making, in response to remarks by the hon. Lady, is that we are looking at exit surveys to try to get a better and more accurate understanding of this matter. We have a lot of anecdotal information, and other bits of information are fed in, but if we were specifically to target the group that causes concern—people who are leaving, for whatever reason, following deployment—that would give us the information we seek.

Ann Winterton: If the figures for those leaving the TA after being deployed in Iraq are known at unit level, surely the Department can easily obtain them?

Mr. Touhig: I have no doubt that, when I meet the hon. Lady, she will press me strongly on that point. I expect to be able to respond positively, because it is important that we get that information out to colleagues.

Mike Penning: We now see the blank expressions.

Mr. Touhig: Pained expressions are pained expressions, but we as a Government have a duty to be as open as possible about these matters. I strongly believe that—as, I know, does the Secretary of State. There are difficulties, which I have explained, but we will examine what we can do to ensure that this information can be provided to colleagues.

The hon. Gentleman brought to his comments the experience of having served in the forces. He welcomed the integration of the TA with the Regular Army, and I thank him for that. However, he was concerned about the TA being deployed too often, and he talked about morale and issues to do with pay. I think I have answered some of his points, but I will look further into that when I refer to Hansard tomorrow, and if there is a need to respond in more detail, I will do so.

The hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) can also speak with considerable authority because of his background: he represents a large garrison town, so he knows a lot about some of the key issues. He talked about the TA footprint being important in recruitment. I strongly agree; where we have that strong footprint, recruitment is good. That is clearly an important message for all of us to take on board.

I also welcome what the hon. Gentleman said about the employers who support the TA. The hon. Lady also mentioned that. Without the support of many employers, it would be difficult for people who have a life outside the forces to give the commitment and service that we often ask of them. I wish to take this opportunity to pay particular tribute to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, who last year held an event for employers at Highgrove. I met a number of employers there—not the large ones that we often think of, but those who employ two, three or four people, and who have somebody who is in the TA and on deployment. I understand the difficulties that they face as a result. They make a huge contribution by giving their support to our reserve forces. We cannot thank them enough for what they do.

The hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper) made some important points. He talked about our defence planning assumptions. They are, of course, kept under constant review. All Governments do that, and it is right and proper for them to do so. He also referred to the National Audit Office report on deployment. I tried to cover that when I explained that approximately 13,000 people in our force are available for deployment and our current need is about 1,200.

The hon. Gentleman went on to talk about the close links between the MOD and the NHS. That is an important point that we need to explore. Those two organisations must be brought together even more closely, as there would be huge benefits in doing so. When I visited Selly Oak last year, I saw evidence of the benefits of the close collaboration between our Army Medical Services and the national health service.

During the century of service that TA volunteers have given our country, they have proved their adaptability in meeting the requirements of national security in all its guises. They, like their regular colleagues, continue to be a force for good in dealing with the challenges of this new century, and they are a more integral part of our land forces than ever. They do a tremendous job for our country. We are hugely in their debt.

I have no doubt that the comments made by all colleagues were intended to reinforce the understanding that we value, appreciate and cherish the work that they do, and the service and commitment they give. It is up to all of us—Government, Opposition and all Members—to do everything that we can to ensure that they know that they are valued, and to make sure they have all the resources and everything else they need to carry out the tasks we set them.

From the tone of the debate, I have no doubt that there is a willingness on both sides of the House to ensure that our reserve forces know that they have the complete backing of Members, and that we will do everything we can to ensure that they continue to carry out their job effectively. I feel certain that that message will go back to our forces as a result of the comments made in this debate.

Retirement Age

12.30 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): My interest in this subject was prompted by a visit paid to my constituency office by a 74-year-old gentleman, Mr Tomlinson. Until having an accident recently, he worked as a lorry driver. He was productively employed, earning good money, not claiming benefit and working while claiming his pension. His visit led me to explore some issues around working after what we generally accept as retirement age.

I want to touch on two general themes. The first is individual freedom—ensuring that people are genuinely free to choose for themselves whether to work after retirement age—and the second the economic functionality of encouraging people to work after 65. The Government will address the former in October, when they seek to implement the European Community directive on age discrimination.

On current projections, a quarter of the population will be over 65 by 2051. Life expectancy continues to increase, as does active life span. We are not just living longer; we are living actively longer. Evidence suggests that continuing work, whether paid or voluntary, can assist in prolonging the health of an individual in retirement. In any case, many older people seek additional income to supplement what they receive in their retirement. It makes very little sense for a workplace to dispose of the valuable skills that many older people have. Research commissioned by the Chartered Institute of Personnel and Development showed that employers placed particular weight on the reliability, commitment and—importantly, nowadays—customer services skills of older people. Simply putting those people out to pasture, with a big sign on them saying "Post-65", is a tremendous waste of economic skills.

Furthermore, the choice to work on after retirement age has substantial economic impacts on our country. Mr. Tomlinson is a case in point: at 74, he was paying income tax and national insurance as a worker; but now—after being injured—he is receiving housing benefit and pension credit. From being a net contributor to our society in general, he has become a net drawer on it, although admittedly he has contributed substantially to his entitlement to that receipt.

There are many obstacles to working beyond 65 being considered something that anyone can contemplate. I shall run through some and then attempt to deal with them. First, there is the issue of expectations. Surveys show that most people recognise that we are living longer, and are living actively longer. The difficulty is that they do not personalise that with regard to their behaviour and choices. Somehow, they do not believe that that will necessarily happen to them, although it might be happening to people they know. They feel that they are likely to face an earlier death and that they should prepare themselves for a quiet period of retirement after their working lives. That slightly gloomier view still seems prevalent.

We can do more to make people understand that working beyond retirement age is likely to be an enduring opportunity. For example, my father is 81 and still does active voluntary work. He regards himself as someone who looks after older people, although they are actually a lot younger than he is. I see that as one model of retirement. He does not earn money from his work, but it is an important part of the social contribution that people can make.

A second obstacle is that there is a good deal of rhetoric of the "work 'til we drop" kind, which is propagated by some newspapers. That was particularly the case when there was discussion about fixing a retirement age. The assumption is that Government policy is somehow forcing people into a position whereby they must work until they die and so will never claim retirement. I have to say that trade unions provided additional support for that view by highlighting the fact that some people die before they receive a pension. That is undoubtedly true. Nevertheless, the evidence is clear that there are people with valuable working skills who are available to work beyond that point in their lives, and who are willing to do so. I want to turn to some reasons why that does not necessarily happen.

There is a belief that if we encourage people to work after 65, a requirement to do so will gradually be built into the rules of company pension schemes, and that, effectively, people will say, "That's fine. We can expect people to work longer, which should mean that we save money on our pension schemes." My retort to that is that, in an increasingly informed society, a pension scheme is a valuable recruitment tool. Frankly, companies with pension schemes that sought to take advantage of those changes would place themselves at a disadvantage when putting forward their package of employment emoluments. I do not think that a likely response by companies to people working beyond retirement age, but nevertheless it is one argument that is presented as a possible barrier.

The other obstacle, to which I shall return, is the lack of either fiscal or benefit encouragement to a work choice after 65. We can do more on that.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I have a constituent who is 65 and due to be retired against his wishes this June. His pension goes on until he is 72. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is quite outrageous for us to remove people from the workplace, irrespective of their ability to do their job, purely because of their age? We would not remove them because of the colour of their hair or eyes, so why because of their age?

Mr. Todd: I shall cover that point, and the hon. Gentleman will find that I entirely agree with what he says.

There is also the issue of companies compelling retirement at a particular age. In October, the Government are to take a step that I do not agree with, and there is evidence that some members of the Government do not agree with it either. There was a lively debate between the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department for Work and Pensions on the correct approach to allowing employers to continue to enforce a retirement age of 65. That is still seen by some people as a barrier to continuing to work.

Of course, there is also continuing prejudice against employing older workers. That has been shown to be declining, partly because the code of practice that the Government have promoted has been widely understood, although not widely enough, as only 37 per cent. of employers know that there is a proper code of practice for dealing with age discrimination. We have much ground to make up.

Next, there are poor employment practices. Older workers are not given proper advice on the interface between retirement and future working, and there is a lack of promotion of part-time opportunities to older workers. That would allow them to move gradually from full-time employment to retirement, using their skills valuably—often as mentors or by providing their specialist skills in a narrower time frame.

There is a great deal more to be done in terms of simply promoting better-quality employment practices among employers. Only 30 per cent. of employers offer employees part-time options in preparation for retirement, which is ridiculous. In the Norwich Union survey commissioned on the subject, 68 per cent. of respondents thought that they would move to part-time employment before retirement. However, 25 per cent. said that that would be determined by their behaviour at the time. The evidence is that if a relatively small number of employers offer that opportunity, many people who fully intend and wish to work part-time will not be given that opportunity.

Moving to my final point on this area of poor employment practice, there is very little monitoring of the age profile of employees. A major difficulty is the fact that employers do not properly understand their work forces. They are not able to analyse what proportion of their employees is coming towards retirement or to devise sensible policies to deal with that.

Steps have already been taken. I have referred to the code of practice and its weakness; after three waves of promotion, still only a minority of employers know about the code and have acted on it. There is also the European Union age discrimination directive, which I have touched on and which the Government intend to implement this October.

The directive has many welcome features—it will permit equal access to work-related benefits and employment protection for workers over 65—but it will still build in the potential for a review period in which employers can insist on retirement at 65 provided that, beforehand, they have given the relevant individual the opportunity to request part-time working. The employee would have the right only to make the request; the employer would have no obligation to provide such work. The individual could say, "I would like to continue to work beyond 65. Are there opportunities for part-time work?", and the employer would have to consider that, but he could then say no and terminate the individual's employment without recourse to law.

My view is that the Government have made the wrong choice. As the Turner commission felt, it would have been better to have fixed the retirement age higher than 65—perhaps at 70—or for there not to have been one at all. I think that there should be no retirement age and that employers should have adult discussions with employees about their capabilities and ability to perform duties at a particular age. They could then reach a normal decision that would be implemented through normal employment policies.

If we are to facilitate working after what is now the normal retirement age, we must consider other measures. First, we can consider reducing or even eliminating employer national insurance for workers over 65. The evidence from surveys—the Chartered Institute of Personnel and Development conducted a survey on this particular aspect—indicates that smaller employers in particular would find that useful. In fact, there was evidence that smaller employers particularly value older workers and would value direct encouragement to continue the employment, or to facilitate the new employment, of older people. Someone might apply for a new job after they were 65; they would not necessarily continue to work at the same place.

The first step is to consider the burdens on employers. Secondly, the workers themselves should be given specific advantages if they continue to work after 65; such advantages could be linked to tax or national insurance and allow them to reduce the costs of their continuing to work. There are strong economic arguments for discriminating in favour of those over 65 who continue to work in some way or other. I am sure that the precise rules—the hours required and so on—could be given greater thought, but there is a strong argument for continuing to encourage older workers' economic contribution to our country. We should be prepared to make appropriate provision in our national insurance and tax policies to do that.

There might also be benefit in giving greater help to those who defer taking the state pension. At the moment, that appears to be a direct, pound-for-pound transaction. If a person puts off taking the state pension for a year, their pension for that year is paid later. The person does not lose the money, but does not gain by deferring. However, they should be able to gain. That would be worth while for our state revenues, let alone the circumstances of the individual involved.

We need to examine the relationship between the state pension and other benefits. The fatal overlapping benefits rule means that once a person has drawn the state pension, they are not entitled to a variety of other benefits that are regarded as overlapping. I have always recognised that rule to be fair for some cases, but I have never fully understood its logic for many others, particularly when the relevant individual is involved in caring or something similar. The state pension is not a benefit, but an entitlement based on contributions made through national insurance during a person's working life. It should not be treated as another benefit, and a person should not be barred from other benefits because they receive a state pension.

There should be direct assistance for training courses aimed at older workers. The Learning and Skills Council has rightly focused considerable resources on younger workers who have failed or been failed in their education and who, at the start of their working lives, require additional assistance to get qualifications. We should also aim to provide extra resources for older workers to do exactly the same.

In future, healthy retirement will normally comprise a portfolio of activities to suit an individual's circumstances, including leisure and family commitments, which many older people have substantially as they enter retirement, as well as voluntary and paid activities. It is to society's benefit, as well as that of the individual, that that should be facilitated, and it should be an individual's free right.

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) on securing this debate and on his thoughtful contribution on what I consider a subject of key public policy importance on which we shall spend more time in the coming period.

My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the changing nature of the population. Many of our policies look at employment rates beyond the age of 50; at that age, men and women have life expectancies of more than 33 years and more than 36 years respectively. One can pull out very stark statistics on this issue. The one I have chosen to mention is that by the late 2020s, almost half the adult population in the UK will be over 50.

If we compare the employment rate of those over 50 with that of the general population of working age, we see a gap. Some 70.7 per cent. of people below state pension age but over 50 work, whereas just under 75 per cent. of the population as a whole work, so the gap is about 4 per cent. The other interesting thing is that most of those over 50 who are no longer in work did not volunteer to leave their jobs, yet once out of the labour market very few of them—only 8 per cent.—try to get a job again. There is genuinely an issue here, and my hon. Friend is right to draw attention to it.

Many of the issues that we are dealing with today come from the legacy that we inherited, and the most rapid decline in the employment of older men in particular came after 1979. That was due partly to the structural change and the decline of heavy industries, but also to the fact that company policies, to which the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) drew our attention, were pretty rigorous in using the pretext of age to reduce work forces. The stewardship of the economy meant that there were not as many job opportunities as we enjoy today.

Progress has been made since 1997, when the Labour party came to power. In 1979, the employment rate among those aged 50-plus was 72.4 per cent., but by 1994 it had gone down to 62.6 per cent. We have returned the figure to just over 70 per cent. Not surprisingly, the employment rate for women has also increased. It was at its lowest in 1984—54.7 per cent.—but at 68.4 per cent., it is now almost equal to that for men.

Our record of using the instruments of public policy to encourage the employment of older people is good and has been recognised as such by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development—we are about 10th out of the 30 OECD countries—and by the European Union. In relation to our European partners, we are second in respect of the employment rate for the over-50s. The unemployment rate for older people is now lower than that for other groups. If older people choose to stay active in the labour market, they are more likely to be in work than the rest of the working-age population. That is another interesting fact to consider.

Since we have been in government, we have brought more than 1 million extra people aged 50 or over into work. Of course, we want to go further and tackle many issues to which my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire alluded, but we are proud of our record. We have reduced the gap in employment rates between the over-50s and the under-50s by about 20 per cent. Again, we are proud of that. It is interesting to see where the over-50s work: about a quarter are self-employed—there is a greater propensity to self-employment among the over-50s—and 70 per cent. work part-time. My hon. Friend might not know that figure, but there is a lot of part-time working by older people.

There are problems that we need to tackle and there are structural questions. We need to think about whether we have the structure of the tax and benefits system right and whether we have the right rules on pension schemes. We have done a lot, but we need to do more. There are personal issues for people that we need to confront. Older people tend to be the ones who have issues relating to health and disability. Many of our welfare reform Green Paper proposals focus on that.

My hon. Friend drew attention to the lack of flexible working. The Green Paper also contains proposals on that. We are attempting to tackle lower qualification levels among older people through many of the employment and training programmes that we have introduced. There are also cultural issues, as individuals might have unrealistic aspirations on early retirement and employers might have outdated prejudices on the capabilities of older people and their capability to work.

I shall go through some of our plans and then briefly tackle the issues to which my hon. Friend alluded. We published our health, work and well-being strategy document about six months ago and it is very important. In it, we consider the links between the work undertaken by the Department of Health, the Department for Work and Pensions and the Health and Safety Executive, so that we ensure that people can get the benefits of work. I am talking about healthy workplaces and ensuring that efforts to secure early rehabilitation to keep people in their jobs or to bring them back into their jobs are co-ordinated across Government and all agencies that respond to individual needs.

I have talked about the welfare reform agenda, whereby we are trying to ensure that proper support structures are in place so that we can provide opportunities for older workers to stay in or return to work. Once those support structures are in place, there will be a responsibility on individuals to take up the opportunities.

I note that my hon. Friend does not think that the changes to the state pension go far enough, but there are now better financial incentives to defer taking the pension. I am referring to the rate of increment and the ability to access a lump sum, which is pretty generously calculated. It is set at 2 per cent. above the Bank of England interest rate and compound interest is built into the calculation.

We have made an important alteration to private pension schemes so that people can take their pension and carry on working. We have introduced improvements to personal allowances for those over 65. The personal allowance for someone over 65 who is working is £7,280 as compared with the general allowance of just over £5,000.

The welfare reform Green Paper contains a series of propositions, which we are taking forward. They involve giving older workers access to the new deals, piloting better one-to-one support for older workers and seeing whether we can take the introduction of flexible working further.

We are also considering how we implement the age discrimination legislation. My hon. Friend talked about that for some time. The legislation has just passed through the processes of the House and will come into force in October. He is right to say that, under the legislation, there is a default retirement age of 65, although we have promised that we will review that, as the measure beds in, over five years. I tend to agree with him that if we can get rid of that default age, we will improve the ability of older people to participate in the labour market. However, I hope he accepts that as we try to transform cultural attitudes in our society towards the employment of older people, we should bring all the stakeholders with us. As we set the default retirement age, we were conscious of the concerns of business. There were fears among those in the business community that if there was no retirement age, they would find it difficult to manage their work force and ensure that younger people had the opportunity to develop in the workplace.

My hon. Friend talked about the lack of knowledge of and information about the changes that the Government are introducing. I have been engaged in a number of changes, particularly involving individual rights in respect of equality, and I know that it takes time for such changes to become known to employers. I am thinking particularly of the work that I have done on disability. Despite pretty extensive publicity, there was still some reluctance among employers to understand and take on board their responsibilities under disability discrimination legislation.

We probably face a similar situation with the issue that we are debating today, but 37 per cent. is not a bad knowledge base, given that we have some months to go before implementing the legislation. I hope that our "Age Positive" campaign and the "Be Ready" campaign, which we are running with our partners, will help to build understanding of the new legislation so that there is compliance when it comes into force in October.

I agree with what my hon. Friend said about the advantages of older people staying in work. That is better for the individual in terms of their prosperity and status in society. There is also a growing body of evidence that work can benefit individuals' health and well-being and can prolong life rather than reduce life chances. He was also right to draw attention to the benefits to society—not only the gains from additional income, but those from less expenditure on benefits, health services, social services and social infrastructure to support individuals. There is also a loss of productivity to society if we do not take full advantage of the capabilities of older people.

My hon. Friend talked about whether we should waive employer national insurance for those over 65. He will know that that recommendation emerged from the Turner commission. We are considering it and we will report on the way forward that we want to pursue, having considered the Turner review.

My hon. Friend talked about whether we could go further on greater advantages to individuals through the tax and national insurance system. Again, we constantly review our position on that to see whether we can do more. He talked about greater help for those who defer taking the state pension. We have made huge progress in that regard, but I will take his views on board as we consider how we can better benefit from the undoubted huge strength that we have in older workers, whom we want to keep in work and contributing to the well-being of our society. We also want to ensure that they, too, feel that they make an individual contribution.

First World War Veteran (State Funeral)

1 pm

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): I rise to open this short debate on the proposal that we grant a state funeral to the last surviving veteran of the first world war resident in the United Kingdom. Unusually for an Opposition politician, I begin by thanking the Minister for his remarkable co-operation, help and support, and also that of his officials, who have been incredibly co-operative and positive. I commend them for that, and I hope that the House will recognise the spirit in which the Government have approached the proposal.

This proposal originated with an approach some time ago from a constituent who was himself a veteran of the second world war. The idea was not unique to him—I believe that it had been around for a little while. He said that a state funeral would be a good idea and asked me why we could not do such a thing. I asked about the veterans of the second world war and so on. My father was one, and they all fought incredibly bravely. My constituent immediately said that the first world war was different, and that everyone who fought in the second world war recognised that. There was something peculiar about the conditions and nature of that conflict.

My constituent's proposal gave me food for thought, but the issue really came home to me when my wife and I were clearing out boxes of papers that, like other families, we had accumulated over the years. I found her on her knees, pulling papers out of a battered old briefcase. I was struck by the fact that she had been crying. I could not understand why, so I asked her, "What is the problem?" She had in her hands a series of letters from her great uncle, who had fought in the first world war. He was 17 years old when he left school. He was a scholarship student—a very bright man with a phenomenal future. He left school early and joined up in 1914. He was sent to the western front in 1915, and in the autumn of 1915 was wounded in action and died about a week and a half later of septicaemia, which is something that today we can cure with antibiotics.

My wife said, "This is our son." Our son was just turning 18, and I immediately imagined what it must have been like for mothers across the land who would have been staring at letters like those at that time. That brought the matter home to me in a way that normal discussions might not have done. For so many families, the tragedy was enormous. It covered income scales, family backgrounds and social positions. Men of different positions and backgrounds died in the same way, and their mothers and fathers wept for them in the same way.

Therefore, I was enormously pleased that so many colleagues of all political parties, including those here today, supported my early-day motion, in which I proposed that we give a state funeral to the last surviving veteran of the first world war living in the United Kingdom.

Why make the proposal? It is, of course, not just about an individual but about the representative of an entire generation. The caveat is that the individual concerned and their family must agree to the proposal beforehand. As the Minister knows from our discussions, the fall-back position is that there should be some form of commemoration if the family do not wish to have a state funeral. Ultimately, we will be guided by their sense of what would be right.

I stress, however, that the priority position for me and many people to whom I have spoken about the matter is that we have a special occasion, and the most powerful way to commemorate it, even if it is not the only way, is through a state funeral. In the past, state funerals invariably have been granted only to members of the royal family or to those of the great and good, even if they were commoners, who rose in political or military terms. This state funeral would be unique: it would be for an ordinary person who had served their country, a representative of the peculiar generation that started a peculiar century—the 20th century, which was the century of the common man.

The suffering and the casualty lists show why such commemoration is necessary. Perhaps I could remind the House of some of the staggering figures. The number of British and empire soldiers, sailors and airmen who were mobilised and who served was just under 9 million, of which just under 1 million died and 2 million were wounded. I should remind the House that the bodies of 500,000—half the total who died in service—were never found.

Other aspects of the first world war that made it so peculiar were the nature and horror of it. Gassing occurred for the first time. Some 8,000 British and empire servicemen died directly and immediately as a result of gas attacks, but it is estimated—we will never know for sure—that some 200,000 of our servicemen suffered from wounds and long and lingering illness directly as a result of gassing, which did not happen in the second world war. Our servicemen were not alone: all around the world, the casualty lists were staggering.

The conditions were breathtaking. To give an idea of what that sort of warfare was like, perhaps I could read a small section from John Keegan's excellent book on the first world war. He states:

"A young British officer, Gerald Brenan, crossing subsequently captured ground in the fourth week of July, found the bodies of soldiers wounded on 1 July who had"—

as Mr. Brenan wrote—

"'crawled into shell holes, wrapped their waterproof sheets round them, taken out their bibles and died like that'. They were among thousands whose bullet-riddled bodies gave up life that day"— that was during the battle of the Somme—

"or afterwards, beyond the reach of stretcher bearers or simply lost in the wilderness of no man's land. Even among those found and carried back, many died as they lay waiting for treatment outside the field hospitals, which were overwhelmed by the flood of cases."

The conditions were peculiar, as was the nature of their service: that strange sense of duty and determination that carried them through such appalling conditions.

I have been most struck in the course of our debates and discussions by the attitudes of the young. I have received a flood of letters from people all over the country about this matter. I have been moved by many who have written to or contacted me or my office, but perhaps most moving has been the pile of letters from young people at school who, whether with their teachers or individually, have chosen to take up this subject and write about it. It has been heart warming to realise that they also understand the need to remember. I shall read short quotes from the letters of two young girls in year 9 at a school in Watford. The first one states that "holding a state funeral for the last soldier ... will bring back memories of all the soldiers and show all new generations how important those soldiers are to us."

Her classmate wrote:

"I also believe it would mark the end of a brave generation".

That generation included people such as my wife's great uncle, who wrote this about one small episode in the trenches on 2 June 1915:

"You can best imagine the state of things here when I tell you that Capt. Webb and myself are left to man the company alone, while no. 9 and 10's fighting strength is reduced to 25 or 30 apiece."

I remind the House that he was 17 and a half years old, and in charge of a company. He continues:

"Poor Davies, you know was last seen on the parapet of the Redoubt, and never returned: he is either ... a German prisoner, or was buried by them the next day".

I believe the matter to be important because we must mark and commemorate the passing of this generation and remind ourselves that all of our commemorations started with the burial of the unknown solider from the great war. A society that forgets its past and is embarrassed about remembering the sacrifice of those who have gone before is one that loses its past and, with that, loses its future. As those young people I referred to were able to remind me and many of my colleagues, there is something special about pausing to remember. We are not dwelling on or glorifying war, but remembering the sacrifice of those whose sole responsibility was to aid and abet their colleagues and to protect and defend the society in which they lived, and which nurtured them.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way, and for the splendid way in which he presented his case. As one who moved an amendment to his early-day motion. and as one of the parliamentary advisers to the Royal British Legion, I urge that whatever happens should be done with the full co-operation and involvement of the Royal British Legion. Although we are on the edge of history, there is always the possibility that the family of the last known surviving soldier may feel under pressure. The commemoration is well worth pursuing, but a state funeral may be a bridge too far.

Mr. Duncan Smith: I say to the hon. Gentleman that we have been in contact with the veterans association and the Royal British Legion throughout. Obviously, we have not tried to contact individual veterans directly because that would be quite wrong. We have left that to the associations. By and large, I understand that there is a compliant sense among many veterans: they think that this would be a good idea. However, that could change and there may be one or two who do not agree. Of course, we should have a commemoration if we cannot get a state funeral and the family's word is final, but I have gone for a state funeral because it is something peculiar and special in which the whole country would take part and in which we would celebrate, commemorate and recognise the peculiar sacrifice of not just this individual, but of the individual on behalf of the whole of their generation.

I urge the Government to do whatever they can and they have already expressed that wish to me. We have Remembrance Sunday, and to those who say that that is enough, I say that there is a problem with institutionalising commemoration. There is the idea that we have set this Sunday aside, but sometimes we must challenge ourselves a little more so that when we say "we remember", we really do remember, rather than just go through the motions. Something special, such as a state funeral, would be necessary to do that.

I conclude in the words of someone who is far more eloquent than me, who died a week before Armistice day and is now remembered as one of the greatest of the first world war poets:

"Move him into the sun—
Gently its touch awoke him once,
At home, whispering of fields unsown.
Always it woke him, even in France,
Until this morning and this snow.
If anything might rouse him now
The kind old sun will know.

Think how it wakes the seeds,—
Woke, once, the clays of a cold star.
Are limbs, so dear-achieved, are sides,
Full-nerved—still warm—too hard to stir?
Was it for this the clay grew tall?
—O what made fatuous sunbeams toil
To break earth's sleep at all?"

I hope those words come through clearly to all who read them. They are the words of Wilfred Owen.

1.15 pm

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I want to thank the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) for his initiative in suggesting that we commemorate the lives of all the people who participated in the great war by having a state funeral for the last known United Kingdom veteran of that great conflict.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to some of his family and I bear in mind my grandfather, Private Edward Joseph Beanes of the Royal Fusiliers, whose medals I proudly hold today, and his countless colleagues who participated in that conflict. It is important for us to commemorate and learn lessons. As the right hon. Gentleman suggested, schoolchildren in particular can draw a great deal from that and give us older ones an opportunity to reflect on the real meaning of conflict.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned how rarely we have state funerals and I draw your attention, Mr. Caton, to this very room. You can see opposite you the picture of the laying to rest of the unknown warrior by George V. That picture shows a state funeral. That was the beginning of the process and this proposal, if adopted, will be the end. I hope that there will be a comparable, contemporary picture marking the occasion in the House in future.

I suspect that this state funeral will take place this year or next year, so I hope that many hon. Members will join me on 1 July at the Somme in Thiepval. It will be particularly poignant and important to those people who want to commemorate the great war. I shall also reflect on the hon. Members who gave their lives in world war one. Every time we go into the Chamber, we notice the crest commemorating hon. Members who gave their lives during world war one, particularly Willie Redmond. Elsewhere in the Palace, Thomas Kettle is commemorated, among many others.

It seems to me that the first world war is a unique social and political watershed. It was the end of cavalry and the end of people going to war in ceremonial uniforms; the Highland regiments wore their kilts for the last time in conflict. It was the beginning of the tank. It was the first aviation war: in that short space of four years planes went from little more than kites doing a bit of scouting to the first bombers. Regrettably, it was the first time that weapons of mass destruction were used, such as chemical weapons and so on.

Moreover, Governments had to reflect on the conflict. Inadequate as the response was at Versailles and in the subsequent treaties, there was nevertheless a conscious theme that politicians had to reflect to try to avoid conflict. The creation of the League of Nations afterwards was not a failure; it was a start. The war trials that took place in Leipzig were not a failure; they were also a start, and we are still struggling today with the embryonic system of international norms for war crimes.

Most important of all, the war brought about the women's franchise: a universal franchise for the United Kingdom. After women had participated so fully on the home front, and on the western front in the various nursing services, there had to be a recognition of their efforts. There had to be universal adult suffrage. It was given grudgingly after the first world war—it was not given to women on the same basis as men immediately—but it was no longer resistible.

For those and many other reasons, I hope that the Minister and the Government will respond in the way suggested by the right hon. Gentleman. There would be overwhelming acclamation of such a decision, and we wish it God speed.

1.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): I begin by congratulating the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) on securing this debate on the topic of a state funeral for the last surviving veteran of the first world war living in the United Kingdom. I also thank him kindly for his opening remarks. The meeting that I had with him was very helpful; he made some good comments and gave very helpful advice, which I appreciated greatly. He made a powerful argument this afternoon, and everyone who listened to his comments was moved not just by the content, but by the tone in which he addressed this difficult and serious matter.

As the right hon. Gentleman knows, I share his concern that the passing of this special generation should not go unmarked. Their service and sacrifice deserve our admiration, respect and gratitude, and it is the Government's intention that all those who participated in that "war to end wars", as it was thought of at the time, should be suitably commemorated. I hope to be able to make a statement to the House shortly, setting out how we intend to do that. In essence, we have focused on two main options: either to provide a high-profile funeral for the individual as the representative of all those who served or, following the death of the last known veteran, to hold a national memorial event for the passing of the generation. The right hon. Gentleman made that point.

Today, however, I would like to outline the main issues that have exercised us as we have been developing our plans. Recent television programmes such as "The Last Tommy" and "Not Forgotten" tended to focus attention on the role of the soldier on the western front. Perhaps the most poignant and lasting image of the first world war is that of the Tommy in the trenches in Flanders. The roles of the Royal Navy and the Royal Flying Corps can, unfortunately, be overshadowed in the mind of the public and the media. They tend to be forgotten, as do the many other theatres of war and the vital support provided by service personnel at home. The first world war was, in every sense, truly a world war.

In our armed forces, every man or woman served in the capacity to which they were directed, and it would be unacceptable to single out any branch, trade, posting or theatre for greater prominence than any other. Every one of those people made a huge contribution to victory in that awful war. Some might have served for only a few weeks by the date of the armistice, some might not have finished their training or have left the UK, and many might not have seen a shot fired in anger. That should not debar them from receiving due recognition as veterans who served during the first world war. Those who survived were all veterans.

In formulating our plans, we also need to take account of any individuals who might live in the UK but who are not British citizens, although they joined and served with the UK armed forces during the first world war. Any surviving Irish veterans, who would have been British citizens at the time, need to be considered too.

We also have a practical problem, as we are not sure who the last veteran is, or who that person will be. More than 6 million men and women served in the UK armed forces during the first world war, and more than half the service records of that period were destroyed in the blitz in 1940. The situation is worse for the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps, as only 12 per cent. of its records were unharmed. Surviving records can tell us who served, but not whether they are still alive. Most of those who survived were demobilised after the war, and for the past 90 years they have had no reason to contact us. They have no obligation to notify the Ministry of Defence of their existence, nor do their next of kin have to inform us of their death.

The first world war veterans we know about are those who have identified themselves voluntarily. To monitor the existing veterans and, whenever possible, to identify others, I and my staff have regular contact with Dennis Goodwin, chairman of the World War One Veterans Association. He acts in an informal capacity as ambassador, spokesman and co-ordinator of the small band of known veterans. We are hugely grateful for his contribution to our discussions.

Inevitably, the number of surviving veterans of the first world war will dwindle, but the number of those known to us goes up as well as down. For example, the announcement of the death of our last known female veteran prompted claims that there are two others still alive. My officials are researching their backgrounds to confirm whether that is the case. The French have also just discovered a further two veterans, which is not a surprise. We estimate that there are in the UK more than 400 citizens of an age to have served at some time during the first world war. It is likely that there are others of whom we are not aware.

Some people signed up under assumed names, while many others falsified their age to join. Some known veterans emigrated after the war, and there is a high possibility that others of whom we are not aware did the same. Many women who served will have married subsequently and changed their names. Tracing them all is an impossible task.

In short, there is no complete list of surviving UK veterans, nor do I think there ever will be. Consequently, identifying the very last veteran with any certainty is impossible. The US and Australian Governments have acknowledged the same problem.

We must consider another key point. Whoever the last known veteran is, he or she is not just a representative of that generation. They are also somebody's parent, grandparent, great-grandparent, or somebody's husband or wife. We must be sensitive to what the family would want in the circumstances and to how they would want the commemoration or service to mark the death of their loved one.

Veterans of many conflicts seek to forget the traumas of warfare and often desire a simple family funeral without fuss or military overtones. The right hon. Gentleman made that point fairly. A number of the known first world war veterans have indicated that they and their families would not welcome any wider public intrusion. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman agrees that their preferences should be respected. Indeed, he said as much in his speech.

Even defining the parameters of the first world war is not as straightforward as it might at first appear. End dates range from Armistice day on 11 November 1918 to the official cessation of the war on 31 August 1921. Those are some of the key issues in our deliberations on this sensitive matter. I hope hon. Members appreciate that this decision needs careful thought.

I am encouraged by the high public interest in the subject, and that interest has read across more generally into veterans' issues. I am encouraged, too, by the comments of hon. and right hon. Members in this House. Being sensitive to the fact that veterans are still alive, I hope that the emphasis being put on what we should do after their passing translates into a public celebration of their remaining time with us. That has to be recognised, and it is proper that it should be.

When the last surviving veteran dies, their memory and the living link to the horrors of the first world war will continue for at least two generations through their children and grandchildren, some of whom are themselves veterans of later conflicts.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to letters that he has received from children in his constituency. Through education and the involvement of children and schools with veterans in "living history" initiatives, an understanding and appreciation of the sacrifices of that early 20th century generation will continue.

Whatever we do, we shall take all steps to ensure that first world war veterans and the sacrifices that they made are remembered, as the magnificent painting in this room helps us to remember the funeral of the unknown soldier. It is a duty of all of us in this place to ensure that we take the right decision. It will not be easy, and there are many sensitivities to explore, but I hope that colleagues understand that I fully take on board their points.

I pay tribute to the right hon. Gentleman, who initiated this debate, for his comments and advice. I hope shortly to make a statement to the House, so that colleagues understand how we shall take this matter forward.

Football Players (Behaviour)

1.28 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): I come to this debate not because footballers any more than MPs are the cause of society's ills, or because footballers reflect society's ills, but because they can help us to do something about them. In my constituency and city, we are attacking antisocial behaviour in one of the country's most deprived and educationally under-attaining areas. At every primary school, alongside literacy and numeracy, we are seeking to teach social behaviour to develop youngsters' emotional intelligence and empathy, and their ability to learn, resolve differences without violence and develop mutual respect. Those same youngsters go home, and those lessons are not always reinforced by their sporting heroes.

Just over 12 months ago, I asked the Minister about the insidious effect of footballers' bad behaviour on the behaviour of young people. He told me in a written reply that he had written to all football club chairmen in the hope that they would lobby their players to behave. It has not worked. However, the Minister does not run football. English football is run not by the state, but by three private companies—the Football Association, the Football League and the premiership. But even they cannot change the rules of football. That role lies with the global rule-setting body, FIFA, which has already failed to respond to the FA's calls for retrospective penalties and, at the other extreme, has responded to English football's request to attack racism in global football, but in a crude and disproportionate manner. However, football is now of such social significance that we should all reflect on our responsibilities.

I wish to use the debate to put on the Minister's agenda the issues that people have brought to my attention in the last two weeks of my local consultation. There is a remarkable similarity of views across the spectrum, from the local Crown prosecutor and the chief executive of Nottingham council through to local beat officers, teachers and parents. They see pictures of a referee surrounded by a mob of bawling players, who are showering the referee with foul language and physically intimidating him. That teaches youngsters that if they reject a decision made by someone in authority—be it a teacher, a policeman or a parent—it is acceptable to berate or intimidate him or her to get the decision changed.

My consultation shows that there is a public thirst for those footballers who are in the public eye to devote time to showing youngsters that football is not about immature, spoilt behaviour and making money. We need to demonstrate that football is about teamwork, honesty and fairness, as it is for most of the 37,000 football clubs in England, the vast majority of which are tremendous role models for our young people, and for the young athletes who show dedication in their lifestyle to get to the top. A small number of people are the problem, but none the less they are often the most important people in the game.

I want the Minister to address six key problems. The first is behaviour on the field. Cheating must be punished at the time of the offence when possible, and afterwards with the benefit of TV replay if not. The FA, to its great credit, has proposed that but cannot move without FIFA's okay. Penalties should not only be financial but, since many clubs and individuals can afford them, offenders should also be banned. How can we expect youngsters to learn the values of hard work and honesty when they see their idols grinning after their latest con, or disguising petulance and poor sportsmanship as "attitude"?

Young men, especially those with absent fathers, crave role models and—like it or not—footballers often meet that need. At the most extreme, those with a predisposition to violence find it endorsed or justified in football. Lame excuses about a few bad apples are no longer acceptable. Bad behaviour in football is unacceptable and needs to be tackled fearlessly. After appropriate public debate, will the Minister convene a summit of all the relevant organisations and authorities in football to agree and to thrash out a way forward?

My second point is about the treatment of referees. Referees' decisions should be final, not the start of infantile behaviour escalating to arguing, abuse and collective intimidation, and such behaviour should lead to immediate dismissal from the field. The FA must look again at referees' powers. Rugby union shows that such player misconduct can be eliminated, not least by an intelligent running commentary on the game from the referee and the convention—not law—that only the captain may ask to speak to the referee. Dissent is punished with a repeatable 10 yd penalty. I have asked the FA to propose such measures again to FIFA for football. Managers would soon teach players that such behaviour harmed their team and their wage packet. I hope that the Minister will take the opportunity unequivocally to back referees and extra powers for referees, as well as the FA as it proposes change to FIFA.

The third issue is the off-the-field conduct of parents and spectators. A trip to the local park at the weekend to watch a youth game is a chastening experience. The worst offenders are the parents. Often, referees are no more than 14 or 15 years old, yet they have to deal with intimidation from people old enough to be their parents. Most premiership academies, I am told, no longer allow parents to watch their children because of that problem. Although a better example must be set by professionals, parents, too, must play their part. The clubs also have a strong responsibility.

More pressure must be put on clubs to enforce better behaviour, either contractually or through a code of conduct that incentivises good behaviour. Players must be taught by clubs the social skills to recognise the impact that they have on others and be supported to become better role models on and off the pitch. As one police officer replied to my consultation,

"they need to become professionals in the moral as well as financial sense".

Although the FA is a not-for-profit organisation, and all funds go back into the game, one idea suggested was that the players' fines should go to the FA, and be more obviously put into a "community chest" to educate players about drinking, smoking, social responsibility and so on. Sponsors, too, can play an important part; they have a clear interest in associating their products with high standards of behaviour from the players who wear their logo each week.

We already enshrine into FA contracts the guidelines for a certain percentage of players' time to be devoted to community activities. I underline again that most professional footballers and most clubs act in a responsible way: 5 per cent. of gross TV royalties go on corporate responsibilities and an additional £12 million goes from the premiership clubs to the Professional Footballers' Association for education. Will the Minister consider rewarding more obviously and more publicly those clubs and individuals who serve the community, and introducing incentives and public recognition for those who behave well?

Already three UEFA cup places are awarded to the three national associations in Europe with the best fair play record—a great incentive. Accordingly, those three places are given to the clubs with the best fair play record for that season. Football in the community schemes, the "Kick It Out" campaign, and many other campaigns sponsored by those in and around football have already proved what football can do when it sets its mind to the task. Perhaps we can do something similar with the campaign on homophobia, with equal success.

As a focus for the effort and as a way of making a clean start, I suggest that the Minister considers a public declaration that the FA, PFA, premiership, league and the League Managers Association, as well as the media, will confront and eliminate bad behaviour. I ask him to organise that at the beginning of the next football season and publicly to sign up everyone in a ceremony that should be replicated on the first Saturday of the coming season at every ground from Wembley, where they will be playing the charity shield—perhaps not this season, but one lives in hope—to the local recreation ground. That ceremony should be replicated throughout the land, from the finest grounds to the local pub 11 playing their knock-about game, to signify a new start to a new season. I hope that the Minister will consider entertaining that idea and taking the lead, even given the limited powers that he has over the game.

My next point is about the basic education of the young athletes, which also has to be addressed. Most youngsters do not make it at football clubs and even for those who do their careers are short. Preparation for later life for both groups is essential, not least some financial education for those who make it. In the United States, colleges that take on young athletes—many of whom go on to become professionals—are allowed to take a certain number of young people on athletic scholarships if their grades are perhaps not as strong as they might be but show some academic potential. Those colleges then have a duty to ensure that their players reach a certain academic level. If they fail to do so, the number of scholarships the following year is cut down. In an age when we demand five good GCSEs of all youngsters, can we not insist on stretching personalised learning programmes for all young people in football? That should be the minimum standard for any football club that signs a teenage footballer. That would make every club take the same level of care and responsibility as the best. Education, discipline and standards would also improve young footballers' behaviour on and off the pitch. Again, I ask the Minister to use his good offices to negotiate that basic educational standard with the relevant football authorities.

We must recognise the media's role in helping footballers' behaviour to influence society—for good or ill. The media must report what happens on the field, but they can also influence our perception of it. The smirk or cynical wink of a commentator—a Lineker or a Hansen—in front of a viewing audience of millions, many of whom are youngsters, can undo much of the good work that is done at home or at school. The media must sign up not to glamorising violent, cheating players, but to exposing them for what they are. They have an even bigger responsibility when it comes to reporting off-the-field behaviour, and that is particularly true of the press. They have the power of choice, but if they continually choose to report only on the tiny minority of players who cheat on their wives and children or who are binge drinkers, drug users, excessive gamblers and criminals, they should not be surprised when, on the inside pages, they report on youngsters who follow the same example. It is not an easy issue to tackle, but I ask my right hon. Friend, who is well aware of the difficulties involved, to speak to the game's important non-playing players—the media—to see what can be done to achieve a stronger ethic in the coverage of sport, and particularly football, because that coverage has an influence on our young people.

The nation is reaching the conclusion that the current system is unacceptable, and we want to improve it. There are no easy answers, and we must all work together to find a way forward. Changes are necessary, and I have several clear questions for the Minister. First, what plans does he have to improve behaviour? Will he convene a summit to thrash out a way forward, support referees, reduce cheating and improve parental behaviour? Secondly, will he publicly reward clubs whose players set the best examples? Thirdly, will he use the first day of the season to launch a sportsmanship in football or a similar initiative, which will range from the premiership down to the local recreation ground? Fourthly, will he make representations to FIFA, which writes the rules of football, to ensure that the FA's sensible requests can be met? In that context, can he tell us when the independent European football review will report and what impact it might have on the issue? If FIFA and others refuse to play ball—if I can use that phrase—will he look at the domestic independence of English football and at whether we can have rules in the domestic context that we feel are appropriate? Finally, will he challenge the PFA to engage senior players who are clearly not engaged in promoting better behaviour?

I sought this debate not to score easy points or to talk about current issues in the media, such as diving, gambling abuses or wages, but to focus on an important issue for my constituency, where people are working night and day to improve young people's behaviour. At three consecutive Prime Minister's Question Times, I have raised with the Prime Minister the importance of promoting social behaviour as well as tackling antisocial behaviour. I hope that everything that professional footballers, MPs and everybody else does will be done with an eye to underpinning, rather than undermining, the efforts that all of us, particularly in tough constituencies with poor educational records, are piling in to help youngsters make a better life for themselves. We in this place can do more than anybody on that issue, but professional footballers and the game itself can also make a contribution, and I hope that the Minister will be able to move the professional game towards helping us some time in the next year or so.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Martin Caton (in the Chair): Order. I can call other hon. Members only if they have the agreement of the initiator of the debate and the Minister. Do other hon. Members have the agreement of the initiator of the debate to speak?

Mr. Allen: No.

1.45 pm

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) for securing this Adjournment debate. The issue is important and probably timely, given that the World cup, which will take place in Germany, is just a couple of months away. It is probably the greatest showcase for football in any four-year period and it will give the young players my hon. Friend mentioned a great opportunity to show their skills and technical ability to a worldwide audience. As he also said, we hope that those players will display the respect and on-the-field behaviour commensurate with such a great competition.

Let me mention in passing two great events that took place this weekend. After 44 years, the great football team of Accrington Stanley have returned to the Football League, where they rightfully belong, and I pay tribute to Eric Whalley, the club chairman, who stuck with it. He has been a teetotaller for 20 years, but I gather that he had the odd drop of champagne this weekend. Nevertheless, he deserves it, and it is great to see Accrington Stanley back. In addition, Sheffield United will be rejoining the premier league next season. With Sheffield United going up, the premiership will truly be able to call itself the world's premier league.

To return to the debate in hand, the World cup is taking place in two months. As my hon. Friend said, football has a huge profile, and huge influence goes with that. It is worth reminding ourselves that every week 800 million to 1 billion people in 195 countries watch the 20 teams in our premier league. As he also said, football affects young people in the UK, but it has massive influence worldwide, too. It is therefore incumbent on the football authorities to ensure that that influence is used as a force for good and it is important that a good example is set on the playing field.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): I rise as the chairman of the all-party Scottish football group and I certainly identify with the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen). He asked for a summit at the start of the season to discuss these issues. Will the Minister consider inviting representatives of the other home countries, because, as he rightly says, watching football on television has an influence on youngsters?

Mr. Caborn: I will try to answer some of the arguments put by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North, and then we might be able to see whether such a summit would be worth while. I agree with him that the football authorities should continue to take a tough stance on the issues that he outlined to ensure that players who misbehave are adequately dealt with. There must also be support for match officials, and let me say very clearly that referees and other match officials have my full support and that of the FA.

My hon. Friend raised five or six main points, and he was courteous enough to let me know in advance the issues that he would be covering, so let me go through them. First, as he indicated, I have written to the chairmen of all professional football clubs asking them to speak to managers and, through them, to players. I have done that on two occasions and I will continue to do so to raise the issue of responsibility, because the responsibility and leadership that we need to stamp out bad behaviour start in the boardroom. It is a matter of setting policy, and those in the boardroom are responsible for that.

Any business or organisation has corporate and social responsibilities. Those responsibilities rest with the people who make the decisions, and footballing decisions are made in the boardroom. It has to start with leadership from there. That is why I took it upon myself, as Minister for Sport, to write to all professional clubs and raise the issue once more, and I will do so again when I believe it to be necessary. I did so for a good reason: when I go round the country—and, indeed, Scotland—I hear time and again that, as my hon. Friend said, what happens on the park on Saturday also happens in the playground on Monday. The players have influence on young people, but their behaviour affects not only those referred to by my hon. Friend, but people right across society.

I underline again why there is no need for such indiscipline. In other tough team sports such as rugby union or rugby league—there is no tougher sport than that—or even in cricket, which may not be as tough but is certainly as well fought and competitive, respect for officials among the peer group far exceeds that in football. I see no reason why the conditions and the discipline that prevail in those tough sports should not prevail in football.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on securing this debate and endorse everything he said. When the Minister writes to the football clubs, does he also write to the rugby league and rugby union clubs? As he said, those sports involve far more physical contact than football. If not, what is his reasoning as to why football misbehaves as it does?

Mr. Caborn: I have not written to rugby league or rugby union clubs, nor to cricket clubs or those of other team sports. In that respect, we might even think of ice hockey, which is another contact sport. Yes, I have raised the subject with the football authorities, but I might also raise with them—indeed, I thank them for it—the fact that, as my hon. Friend said, the vast majority of players not only conduct themselves fairly on the park, but do a tremendous amount of good in the community. Later, I shall put down a few markers about the role of football and the majority of players.

My hon. Friend asked whether representations should be made to FIFA, requesting it to meet representatives of the FA, particularly on the question of discipline. It is not easy for FIFA to square up to that, but I have some sympathy with my hon. Friend. Indeed, I know that the FA has made strong representations to FIFA, asking it to consider recent issues that have affected football, especially the question of diving.

Although I acknowledge that my hon. Friend does not want to home in on the question, I believe that it is something FIFA could consider. I understand the position of FIFA's president on the question. FIFA has to give governance to the game internationally and its president will argue strongly that although the developed countries of western Europe have the facilities—for example, a premier division football match in England is filmed by eight television cameras—that is not the case in parts of Africa or Asia, nor in other parts of the world. FIFA wants to ensure that the rules are universally applied and that governance of the game is universal.

That argument has some merit. However, other arguments are being made by football authorities in England, and I have discussed them with a colleague and friend, Keith Hackett, who is the senior referee. He heads up the referees' organisation. As an aside, Mr. Caton, I can tell the House that he sent me off once—I got a red card—which shows what an objective man he is. However, that was some years past. The discussion going on inside football is one that FIFA could consider, and we should consider whether to run some trials, as Keith Hackett tells me that one of the most difficult things a referee has to do is decide whether someone is diving.

We could consider what happens in rugby league. In that sport, players can be put on report and incidents can be considered on video after the match. Other options could be considered by the FA, but an experimental period over a season could also help to inform FIFA decisions. I acknowledge that the president of FIFA has a problem: he is the president of an international organisation and I know he wants to ensure that governance is as fair internationally as it can be. There is some merit in his argument, but it is a finely balanced one. Football has changed dramatically over recent years and perhaps, as in other sports—even international ones—we ought to bring in new technology.

My hon. Friend referred to the independent European football review on the governance of football in the European Union. Without going into too much detail, Heads of Government said in 2000 that sport has a particular role to play in the Community. That was specified in the Nice declaration, and EUFA is interpreting the declaration to see how it fits with football. It will be considering the governance of football in relation to the EU. Many know that EU and Commission regulations and directives have had a considerable impact on football, and the review is being undertaken in that context.

I assure my hon. Friend that social inclusion is not specifically about behaviour on the park; it is also to do with supporting grass-roots football and examining ways to support, encourage, educate and train new players. The health of young players is also very much part of that review, which I hope will be completed by the end of May.

What we have been doing in England, and in the UK, is an exemplar for football—I am thinking of football in the community and the playing for success initiative. The latter has had one of the biggest impacts on education, numeracy, literacy and information, communications and technology, or ICT, skills of almost anything the Government have undertaken in the past seven or eight years. It was driven largely by football professionals putting at our disposal the grounds, players and know-how of the clubs, and it has made a massive contribution to social cohesion.

My hon. Friend also asked whether we would consider the domestic independence of English football if insufficient progress was made through FIFA. We have FIFA, EUFA and the FA. That is the line of command for the sport, and I would not want the FA to break away from that. I know that dialogue continues between FA and FIFA on a number of issues, which is how it should be. There should be no political interference and the two should work for the good of the game. This is about the good governance of the game. I am sure that much of what we are developing in England will influence Europe and the world. That is how it should be. As with every other game or sport, developments should be within that broad governance.

My hon. Friend asked whether I would wish the Professional Footballers Association to engage those players who are not engaged in promoting better behaviour. In my view, the PFA does a first-class job in this area, and I know that Gordon Taylor promotes it strongly through the Prince's Trust, helping many young people to get back into society through football. The commitment of two to three hours a week to community work for each player is part of the charter and the contracts that the professionals sign up to.

Mr. Allen: In the few seconds that remain, will my right hon. Friend address the question of a summit and the relaunch of sportsmanship?

Mr. Caborn: I will give that consideration, but I cannot say this afternoon—

Mr. Martin Caton (in the Chair): Order. I am afraid that I have to send the Minister off again.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

Wednesday 19 April 2006

[MR. MIKE HANCOCK in the Chair]

Belarus

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Joan Ryan.]

9.30 am

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): I am pleased to contribute to this Adjournment debate on the important country of Belarus.

Belarus, which is a country of 10 million people, was formerly part of the Soviet Union and is on the doorstep of the European Union. It abuts Poland, Lithuania and Latvia, which are all former Soviet Union countries and now full and welcome members of the EU. Like Poland, Belarus has had a difficult history. It is wedged between Germany to the west and Russia to the east. As my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) with his expertise in military history knows only too well, sadly Belarus has seen occupying troops from west and east rampaging over its soil many times during the centuries. Its capital, Minsk, was particularly badly treated during the second world war. Unlike Poland, Belarus remains in poor shape to meet the challenges of the 21st century and a globalising world. Belarus adjoins Ukraine, which was also once a mainstay of the communist bloc, but is now a young and emerging democracy that aspires to join the EU, an aspiration that has my full support.

Unfortunately, Belarus, which is a European country, has become stuck in a negative time warp. Since 1994, it has been run by Alexander Lukashenko, who is sometimes described as the last dictator in Europe. I shall illustrate what he and the country are like. I was in Minsk just before the recent presidential elections and it was like stepping back in time. While I was there, Mr. Lukashenko spoke to a national convention in the capital for three and a half hours. His speech was punctuated with Soviet-style applause by the great and the good who were proudly displaying their medals. Every word of that speech was broadcast live by the state-owned television service, and when our meetings were over for the day we could rush back to the ambassador's residence and watch it again on an extended news broadcast. That was only a summary of the highlights, but it lasted one and a quarter hours. All that was just one week before the country went to the polls.

Since 1994 Mr. Lukashenko has systematically closed down the free press, banned most non-governmental organisations, stopped Churches meeting freely, imprisoned political opponents on trumped-up charges, outlawed street protests and filled all key positions in the Government, the judiciary and the electoral commission with his supporters. His party piece, which I did not witness, is to sack Cabinet Ministers on live television, showing firmly who is in charge. I hope that the Government here do not intend to follow that practice.

Our excellent ambassador in Minsk, Brian Bennett, demonstrates a real commitment to the people of Belarus and is a credit to the Foreign Office. He describes Mr. Lukashenko as someone who is not yet quite a dictator but is a coming dictator. He is slowly eradicating dissent and eliminating opponents. I heard that assessment with a growing sense of foreboding. He presides over an old-fashioned, centrally planned economy that is dependent on heavily subsidised Russian gas and oil. The state-controlled media daily reinforce the message that life in Belarus is good and stable, unlike in the volatile neighbouring countries where, they say, unemployment is soaring. All public sector employment contracts are for 12 months only and if employees do not do what the president demands their contracts are not renewed. It is as simple as that. The public sector in Belarus accounts for well over 50 per cent. of its gross domestic product, so a significant number of people live their lives on 12-month contracts at the president's whim. Any student who takes part in dissident activity is banned from further study.

It is chilling that the president, who is only 52, has a growing iron grip on his fellow countrymen that is becoming tighter by the day. When he was first elected in 1994, not long after the Soviet Union had collapsed, the constitution permitted a president to stand for only two terms. He has recently cajoled the citizens of his country into voting through a change in the constitution to permit him to stand again and, I suspect, again and again. It is worth emphasising that that unacceptable form of leadership is not on the other side of the world or in some bygone era. It is happening now, today on our very doorstep.

I was in Belarus to meet Opposition party leaders in the run-up to the presidential election on 19 March. They were campaigning bravely despite constant intimidation, harassment, the risk of imprisonment and personal risk to themselves and their families. Many had been imprisoned several times and accepted that part of being in Opposition politics in Belarus is that they would spend some time in prison. That is part of political life there, rather as we think of campaigning and knocking on doors as being part of political life in this country.

I am pleased that many democracy-building organisations in the west, including America, other European countries and Britain through the Westminster Foundation for Democracy, have worked for many years in Belarus to try to support and build capacity in fledgling parties and would-be politicians who struggle to usher in a new dawn of freedom and democracy in their country.

We all respect the Minister for Europe and I want to say in his hearing that much of the democracy-building work by political parties through the Westminster Foundation for Democracy in many parts of the world is unseen, long term and difficult to measure, but its contribution is one of the most important that the House makes to the developing world and to many countries that have no history of democracy.

One of the good things that happened in the run-up to the election was that most of the Opposition forces agreed to form a coalition around an outstanding man, Alexander Milinkevich, who is as brave and honourable a man as anyone could wish to meet. I had a meeting with him for one and a half hours and left it feeling very humble and that I had been in the presence of a very special person.

One evening, I witnessed 3,000 courageous freedom fighters assembled in the centre of Minsk against the diktat of their Government and despite the best efforts of the police and the state storm-troopers who did everything in their power to deter them. I watched those brave souls march through the snow singing their songs of freedom while the riot police snaked around them. It was a truly inspirational moment that I will never forget. Mr. Milinkevich addressed the crowd and made it clear that they did not seek a revolution but simply wanted free and fair elections so that the people of Belarus could genuinely decide for themselves who should govern them.

It is not a matter for me, for this Chamber or for this country who runs Belarus. It is a matter for the people of Belarus. Our only concern lies in ensuring that they make the decision in verifiably free and fair elections. However, that is not what happened on 19 March when Mr. Lukashenko received an astonishing vote of 82.6 per cent. of popular support. We knew that it would be more than the 79 per cent. that he had predicted, but it takes some gall to suggest that 82 per cent. of the population voted for him.

Was that a genuine result? The preliminary report of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe, which is an experienced organisation that we all greatly respect, stated:

"It is clear that this election did not meet OSCE commitments and international electoral standards. The arbitrary abuse of state power, obviously designed to protect the incumbent President, went far beyond acceptable practice. The incumbent President permitted State authority to be used in a manner which did not allow citizens to freely and fairly express their will at the ballot box."

It continued:

"A pattern of intimidation, and the suppression of independent voices, including those remaining non-State print media, was evident throughout the campaign. Such actions impeded the possibility for vibrant campaign discourse, and raise doubts regarding the authorities' willingness to tolerate political competition on the basis of equal treatment before the law and by the authorities."

It goes on to talk about early voting, which is a very significant point. Whenever we talk about rigged voting—I shall come on to that point in a moment—the crucial question is how it is done. The report says that

"regulation of early voting is non-transparent and fails to provide safeguards. The lack of any official protocols to document the record of voting on each day of early voting, as well as the lack of security provisions for the closing and overnight storage of the ballot box, increases the possibility for electoral malfeasance".

It is not enough, it seems, for Mr. Lukashenko to brutalise all opposition forces, or for him to have sole control of all media outlets. He has gone on to ensure that voting procedures can be completely abused.

This is what happens: people who vote early can turn up at the polling booth seven days before election day. It turns out that 31 per cent. of the people voted early. That night, votes are taken away by the election officials, under no scrutiny and with no one overseeing what goes in the ballot boxes, and the boxes are put out the next day with no check made of them whatever. That is one clear possibility of abuse for 31 per cent. of the vote.

On election day itself, when the rest of the population vote, the system of informing the world of who has voted for whom consists of one person, a member of the precinct electoral commission. Unseen by anyone else or any of the opposition forces and not checked by any independent verifiers, in a small room on his own, he fills in a piece of paper saying who voted for whom. Would we accept that in this country as a fair way of recording who voted for whom? We would not. The situation is ripe for vote rigging and I have no doubt that this vote was completely rigged by President Lukashenko of Belarus.

It was announced that the president had won 82.6 per cent. of the vote, but what has happened since? Many brave citizens took to the streets to protest in larger numbers than ever before, but, sadly, the riot police were deployed in far greater force than before and many citizens were attacked and arrested. Hundreds have been imprisoned since 20 March and many of them were imprisoned by judges appointed by Mr. Lukashenko and those loyal to him, and, of course, he is quite capable of removing any judge. Some of those prisoners have not been heard of since.

On 20 March, I took part in my first ever street demonstration, outside the embassy of Belarus in Kensington. Standing there with people from Belarus, singing "Zhive Belarus", which means "long live Belarus", and waving their former white and red national flag was a very moving moment. We were there for about two hours. It was very cold—we were extremely brave—and the police were called three times by the people inside the embassy because they were frightened of our street demonstration.

I shall read an eye-witness account of some of the action in Minsk at about the same time. One person has written of her experience of demonstrating about the presidential election results in Minsk:

"Buses came to the square. We were surrounded. Riot police jumped out of the buses. They ordered us 'lie down on the ground'. We lay down, and every second or third policemen began to beat us. I held on to Vera."

That is her daughter. She continues:

"Some girl stood in the middle of the tent camp and began to pray. It was so dramatic. I couldn't believe I really was there ... One policeman grabbed Vera by her hair and pulled. Another screamed at him, 'Don't beat her, don't you see that she is totally young'. The other one beat her nevertheless.

They pulled her away. Then they threw me head towards ... the asphalt pavement. Falling down, I hit the ground with the back of my head. Then they hit me in the face. Now the left side of my face is injured, I have a bruise under my left eye.

They grabbed me as some pig, thrown into the bus. They screamed at us, called us pigs, asked what we were doing here, with this revolution. In the bus they kicked me in my back all the time.

I lie on the floor and thoughts are stirring in my head, 'Where is Vera?' I didn't recognise them. I fainted. When I regained my consciousness, I still haven't been able to recognise them for several minutes.

Then they prevented us from talking to each other ... they brought us to the prison ... the whole corridor was jammed with people. They treated us as real criminals, screaming, 'Face the wall! Stop talking! ... ' Then they went from one to another, asking, if there were underage children.

So we stood near the wall, I have no idea, how long. They arrested us around 3 a.m. And we had to stand facing the wall till around 1 p.m."

I am really sorry if there are people in the embassy of Belarus in Kensington who were scared of 30 people in suits standing peacefully on the street corner chanting a few slogans, but that is as nothing to what the Government of Belarus did to their own people who had the audacity to protest and campaign for freedom in their capital city. But the election is over, the protests, for now, are quelled and Mr Lukashenko remains in office with all the apparatus of the state to keep him there.

What is to be done? My purpose in raising this issue is to ask the Government of the United Kingdom to do all in their power to play their full part in putting the Government of Belarus under pressure to change their ways and provide for free and fair elections. I hope to hear the Government's strategy for seeking freedom for the people of Belarus. I also ask the Minister to spell out his understanding of what the European Union intends to do to keep up this pressure on this European country.

I know that there is no magic solution. No one, of course, is suggesting military intervention—let us get that out of the way right now. There is no silver bullet, but there are some things that can be done and I have three suggestions. First, the people of Belarus lack basic information about the true state of their nation, their president and the true nature of the EU and the surrounding states. In the absence of a free press, how could they get a balanced picture? Many are poor and have no access to electronic media. Could more be done, perhaps by the BBC World Service, to ensure that more broadcasts in Belarusian are transmitted to get the message across?

I understand that during the past three or four months the EU has sponsored radio transmissions into Belarus, which is a good thing. However, I was told while I was in Belarus that it is transmitted in such a way—I will not say, "Typical EU"—that hardly anyone can receive it. There is a technical problem, but I am not qualified to say what that is. Will the Minister please look into that? It is important that transmission of what is really going on in the outside world takes place and it is important that the EU takes a lead in that. Will the Minister ensure that whatever is being done is done as effectively as possible, and will he say what resources the Government are prepared to commit to getting a message of freedom to the people of Belarus?

Secondly, a key to this situation is clearly the giant of Russia, right on the eastern border of Belarus. Although I understand that President Lukashenko and President Putin do not enjoy a harmonious personal relationship, Russia is no doubt keen to see a non-democratic neighbour on its doorstep, in contrast to recent events in Ukraine and elsewhere. The economy of Belarus is kept afloat by heavily subsidised gas and oil. I do not wish the people of Belarus ill in any way, shape or form, but sometimes it can take the harsh wind of economic reality to bring a nation to its knees and to its senses. What pressure are the UK Government and the EU putting on President Putin about these subsidies and the Russian approach to Belarus generally? If the President of Russia is keen to portray himself as a democrat and world leader, is it not the case that he should be encouraged to take a more robust approach with this rogue dictator on our doorstep?

Thirdly, are we listening to the man who has managed to unite almost all opposition forces in Belarus, namely Alexander Milinkevich? He has called for the west to be tougher and more resolute. He has called for us

"to send a stronger message that Belarus has experienced a constitutional coup that brought to power a man who is not eligible for it."

He has called for "targeted repressive sanctions" against officials and judges responsible for arrests and jailing of opposition supporters, as well as the state media journalists for "deceitful" coverage of the protests. The EU currently bans visits from about six of the top officials from Belarus, and I ask the Minister whether it is time to extend that travel ban to make it bite more widely and deeply. What does he say in response to Mr. Milinkevich's calls for targeted, repressive sanctions? Does he agree that it should be a priority for the EU to bring about change in Belarus?

What is democracy about? It is about the rule of law, freedom of speech, an independent judiciary, a strong civil society, respect for human rights and, above all, the ability of a people to elect and remove their leaders through verifiably free and fair elections. None of those elements is present in Belarus.

The Conservative party has committed itself, through the Westminster Foundation for Democracy, to working alongside opposition forces in Belarus to stay the course until freedom finally comes to that European country. I appreciate that the Government and our friends in the Liberal Democrats feel just as strongly about the issue as we do. We will continue to raise our concerns about Belarus on the Floor of the House. Some people will say that this matter has nothing to do with us and that our foreign policy should be narrowly in the national interest, but it is in our national interest to help to spread freedom and democracy to all parts of the world. It is offensive to have that tinpot dictator on our doorstep.

I invite the Minister at the end of the debate to satisfy hon. Members that the Government and the EU will marshal all their resources, harness all their political will and do all that they can until the freedoms that we take for granted in this country are present also in Belarus.

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): Thank you, Mr. Streeter, for that fair presentation of a very difficult situation.

9.51 am

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) on obtaining the debate. That is the formula that we always use on these occasions, but in this case I sincerely mean it, because the debate is both timely and important. It is timely, coming so soon after the rigged election, and it is important because, as the hon. Gentleman explained, Belarus matters both to our country and in the context of the wider Europe. It matters in a more general sense almost at a global level.

One of the simple realities is that Belarus as it exists at present cannot continue indefinitely. The future for Belarus is either a soft landing, whereby it becomes acceptable to and will receive support from the wider Europe, or an abrupt, hard landing, which is not in the interests of the people of Belarus, of the people of the European Union or, in the end, of the people of Russia. None of us needs instability and a political or social black hole in the heart of what is an enormous piece of territory in central and eastern Europe.

[Tony Lloyd]

We have a national interest in Belarus. I notice that the broadcasting signs are on, but I do not suppose that millions of people are glued to this debate. However, even though the debate may be dismissed as not of immediate relevance to people in this Parliament and this country, I emphasise that it matters enormously that Britain and the wider Europe begin to get the debate about Belarus right.

A rather odd thing about Belarus is that it is a member of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe—the hon. Member for South-West Devon quoted from the OSCE's interim findings on the election. One of the ironies about the OSCE is that to become a member a country has only to say that it subscribes to the organisation's values and does not have to do anything to conform to them. It is interesting that Belarus wants at least that level of international approval.

Belarus is not a member of the Council of Europe, which makes it unique in the European family of nations. It is the one country that has not been allowed to join. Some people would say that there may be other countries whose standards are not of the highest Council of Europe order, but it is interesting that Belarus is the one country on which there has been agreement that not only does it not approach the standards of democracy and the rule of law that we would expect from a modern European state, it does not even try to approach them. That is a tragedy for the rest of Europe, although it is mainly, of course, a tragedy for the people of Belarus, because they are the ones who, in the end, become the victims of the process.

There is another oddity—I am not disagreeing with the hon. Member for South-West Devon but nuancing what he said—in that President Lukashenko almost certainly would have won a free and fair election, partly because the people of Belarus, perhaps wrongly, still see themselves as better off than many of their neighbours who have gone through the upheaval of economic and political change. I strongly suspect that Belarus has much of that to come, so it is a difficulty deferred rather than a difficulty avoided. Nevertheless, President Lukashenko would probably have won a free and fair election, although obviously with a significantly smaller majority than that which he claimed to have obtained.

Mr. Streeter: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's assessment: that was the view of most people on the ground while I was in Belarus. Does he not agree, though, that if someone feeds their citizens a regular diet of positive media reporting about themselves and negative media reporting about their opponents, that does not necessarily give a true picture—even though it sometimes happens in this country?

Tony Lloyd: I might just nuance my answer on the totality of the hon. Gentleman's comments, but what he says is right in the Belarusian context. We know that the election was stolen probably by ballot rigging, but also by the total suppression of proper access for alternative voices—democratic voices—to the media. The media simply were not able to perform their role in the run-up to the election. Nor is there the structure of alternative voices through non-governmental organisations and civil society that we would expect in a society such as ours, or even in a much newer democracy. Those processes simply have not been allowed to exist, and where they do exist, they have not been allowed to take root and flourish. Again, that is a tragedy for Belarus because it means that it has been denied the opportunity to examine its future in all the different ways that that would mean.

The conclusion that everyone draws is that the election was rigged. I think you were there last week, Mr. Hancock, when the Romanian chairman-in-office of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe made a strong statement on Belarus, making it clear that, across the whole European family, there was no ambiguity about the issue. There is one proviso, but the Council of Europe as a whole was of the view that the election was severely rigged. The oddity is that at the same time as the Council of Europe, the OSCE and most reputable bodies were condemning the election as rigged, the Commonwealth of Independent States concluded that the election was substantively free and fair. That is a significant shame, because it demonstrates a polarisation of views on Belarus between the European Union and those who take a similar view, and Moscow.

Our relations with Russia are of massive significance, but we have to say to the Russians that they are getting it consistently wrong about Belarus by going through a pretence that an election that was clearly flawed was free and fair. It was claimed that President Lukashenko obtained 82.6 per cent. of the vote—a ridiculous figure by almost any standard. I was almost inclined to ask the hon. Member for South-West Devon whether he could give me an accurate prediction of the result next time, as it is clear that President Lukashenko is ambitious to increase his share of the vote on each occasion. Such predictions may already exist in the presidential palace in Minsk. That cynicism, alas, is what we end up with. There is absolute cynicism about the capacity of Lukashenko to deal as an honest broker on behalf of the people of Belarus with the wider Europe and the wider world. He ends up with little credibility through this flawed or even non-electoral process.

Perhaps I should comment on another important issue that the hon. Member for South-West Devon raised: what happened after the election. There were not only protests outside the embassy in London, although I congratulate him on that. We have not only written witness accounts. Because of the wonders of the modern media, even in Belarus it was possible to see violence of a level that is simply unacceptable being meted out by the security forces and police to non-violent protesters on the streets of Minsk. I know not what happened elsewhere, but I could see on my television screen innocent people being savagely beaten by the security forces in a way that, frankly, ought to have led to criminal charges being brought against them, rather than against those innocent protesters, who were taking part in events that would pretty much be taken for granted in countries such as ours—and, indeed, throughout the entire European family. Even if such events had taken place in Moscow, they could not possibly have been met with the same kind of reaction by the security forces in Russia as we saw in Belarus. In that regard, Belarus is the back marker: things can take place in Minsk that would not take place in any other capital city or society in modern Europe.

What should we do? I again share the agenda of the Member who secured the debate. There is no magic wand or silver bullet; instead, there is a need for consistent pressure over time. It is easy for us all to become agitated at the time of an election, and to say, "Yes, the election was fraudulent, let's protest—and then let's gently allow this to be forgotten as we move forward." For all manner of reasons, it is necessary to ensure that we maintain an interest in the Belarusian agenda, because—returning to my initial comments—it is an important country within the European family. It is important that Britain works through the European Union. There is no unique British position on this: there must be a common EU position. We should say to our colleagues in the EU that there must be consistency, and there must be a determination to maintain that consistent approach over the weeks, months and indeed years to come.

We must examine what level and package of sanctions can be made available that does not strike against the ordinary Belarusians. It is not a rich country by any standards, although it may be better off than some of its immediate neighbours. It is a fragile society, and its people are entitled to expect better than blanket targets that damage the ordinary Belarusian. However, we are entitled to study the roles of those who run that society, and to consider how we might target sanctions against the leadership and those around it. That is absolutely legitimate—it is absolutely normal and proper.

We must also look into how we can support free media. That may be done by broadcasting from outside, although there are limitations on that: during the cold war, it was always possible to block signals coming in from the outside. I was rather interested in the concept of an EU radio-wave mountain somewhere, because transmissions are not getting across on the uniform plane in Belarus. However, it is certainly worth examining how we can support media being delivered from outside.

The most important thing is to support free institutions inside Belarus, where that is possible. I am aware that it is difficult, but we ought to try to do it. How do we support civil society, NGOs and free media?

We must also address the role of Russia. One of the big debates we must have with Moscow in the months to come is about how it sees itself in relation to that part of the world, and how it sees its relations with the EU and the rest of Europe. Frankly, the days of the Russian client states ought to be disappearing, as in the long run the alternative will not be in Russia's own interests. Not long ago, we saw how the client state that it felt it had in Ukraine disappeared and turned into something much more unpredictable, and much more difficult from Moscow's perspective. Moscow now needs to wrestle with the question of how it works with Belarus to get that soft political and social landing, and to do so in a way that allows Russia to maintain good relations with that important neighbour. If we engage with the Russians, it is possible—I do not say likely—that we could come up with a common agenda, allowing us to say that we share an interest in helping Belarus to move forward in a direction that is acceptable both to Moscow and the EU. I urge the Minister to look seriously at how we can do that.

In the end, the assessment must be made that Belarus is left in a much more fragile position than the election result would suggest. It is fragile because the economic and political winds will continue to blow, irrespective of whatever is done by the EU or in Moscow, and of whatever is done in the presidential palace in Minsk. Everyone has an interest in trying to move Belarus forward. If we can do that together and in a way that is consistent with the needs and interests of the people of Belarus, we will have achieved a significant victory not only for the Belarusians but for the wider Europe.

If we fail to do that, I do not predict doom and gloom—it would be ridiculous to do so—but Belarus could cause us headaches in the future, so it is worth putting in the effort to try to ensure that we get real progress. That is worth effort in London and Brussels, and it is worth effort with us all, with Moscow, in Minsk.

10.6 am

Mr. Jeremy Browne (Taunton) (LD): I pay tribute to the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) for securing this debate on what I think everyone accepts is a pressing matter for Europe. At the conclusion of his speech, he asked rhetorically whether the subject of Belarus and the situation there ought to be of concern to this House. The answer to that question is emphatically yes. There are people throughout the world who live in circumstances that we would not wish upon ourselves, and who look to the British Parliament to be a beacon of liberty and to articulate concerns and fears that they are not always able to articulate themselves. Although this debate does not have as high a profile as those attending it would wish, we are making an important contribution by making it clear that we in the United Kingdom are concerned about the state of affairs in Belarus.

In passing, I might add that it is also worth pausing to reflect on how important it is that we maintain our own standards of democracy, not least with regard to some of the new voting procedures that have been introduced, so that we can continue to uphold the highest standards, and to ensure that when we talk about other countries we are not seen to be in any way vulnerable to counter-charges from people in those countries.

To take into account a broad sweep of history, some people might think that the most memorable single day or event of the past 50 years or so was the terrible things that happened in the United States of America on 11 September 2001. We will certainly continue to witness the ongoing struggle to counter al-Qaeda and its threat to the way of life of people in the west and throughout the world. However, although there was not such a dramatic single image to illustrate it, perhaps the most significant event in international affairs during that period was the collapse of the Soviet Union. As a result, hundreds of millions of people who had not previously enjoyed the liberties, freedoms and values that we in this country often take for granted suddenly had exposure to them in their everyday lives. Those people might not have been able to read newspapers that were produced independently of the state, to gather or form organisations in the way they wished, to speak freely, or to stand in free, fair and open elections. Suddenly, such opportunities presented themselves to those people in a way that they had never done before. That was tremendously significant for the development of the world and of the values that we in this country and this Parliament hold dear. More importantly, that was tremendously significant for the people who live in those countries.

This debate is of particular interest because for many people there is a sense of unfinished business about Belarus; there is a sense that it is a throwback or hangover from an era that in many other ways has receded and passed. I am not making a party political point; but all those in this House who are keen to champion the liberal cause—I think that is pretty much all Members of this House, and of the House of Lords, for that matter—see before us an opportunity to make sure that we continue to roll out such values in Belarus.

I, for one, was heartened by the developments in Ukraine a year ago. I say that not only because I am always an enthusiast for an orange revolution—I think that many other countries would benefit from one—but because it is a country with a population of similar size to ours that was suddenly exposed to not only freedom of speech and media, but a more liberal economic situation.

I add a cautionary note: we in this House should be careful not to oversimplify the subject. I say that because when one reads media coverage about Ukraine, it appears to be a good-news story, from a British or EU perspective. We read about all those people, many of whom were brought up under a relatively repressive regime, now being exposed to the great opportunities and freedoms previously denied to them, yet when one reads those articles more deeply, or speaks to those who are knowledgeable about the country, one finds that under the surface there remains a degree of discontent.

Many people—how do I put this bluntly?—are concerned about their day-to-day living, their circumstances, and their economic well-being. That follows on from a point made by both previous speakers: the irony is that in Belarus, in other circumstances, the election result may have been less emphatic, but there would probably have been the same overall outcome. That is because for many people, particularly those in fairly dire—certainly by European standards—economic circumstances, their day-to-day concerns about pension payments and employment are perhaps of greater importance to them than some of the concepts that we have discussed, such as freedom of speech and of media. That does not mean that those concepts are not important—they are extremely important, and that is why this debate is so welcome—but we have to try to understand the motives for people voting as they do.

Even taking into account allegations of vote-rigging and a heavily skewed media, we should not assume that all people in Belarus—or, for that matter, in other countries that we are similarly concerned about—are voting in a state of ignorance. In many instances, they may be voting for what they perceive to be their self-interest, and—we should say this with a degree of humbleness—they may even be right in their assessment of their self-interest, at least in the short term, although I accept that in decades to come they may be proved to have made a short-sighted decision on their own behalf.

It is right that every country should be free to make decisions about its own economic policies. I, for one, think that the economic policies being pursued by the Government in Belarus are not likely to lead to a prosperous country with happy people, but, for that matter, they may think that the policies being pursued by the British Government are not likely to lead to a prosperous country with happy people. Those are decisions that we need to make in free, fair and open elections. I am cautious about lecturing the people of Belarus about which economic policies are wise for them, because that is a decision that they have to take. However, they may care to look at which countries have been most successful economically and at the policies that those countries have pursued, and they may then come to a conclusion that the policies offered by the Government in Belarus are unlikely to achieve their objective. None the less, that is their decision. Civil liberties issues are quite different; those are universal values, and we should look to promote them, even aggressively, throughout the world.

I finish with a series of questions or challenges to the Minister, and I hope that he will address them. On my first question, a day or two ago I read in the newspapers an unfavourable report about the Minister that I thought was unfair. He had been asked during a radio interview—I think on Radio 4—to describe what benefits the European Union brought the people of Britain. The report appeared to imply that the Minister had not been able to think of a sufficiently robust and impressive case for British membership of the European Union. I think that the Minister cited cheap flights as a good example of how British people directly benefited from our membership of the EU. I do not disagree with that answer, but if we are looking to make a wider point that appeals a bit more to British people's altruism, or at least not to their direct economic self-interest, Belarus is a perfect case study of how we benefit from a joined-up, collective EU approach.

There is no particular reason or need for individual countries in the European Union to take different approaches to Belarus; we share the same values and we all share our criticism of the recent election in broad terms. We speak more effectively, and in a way that is more likely to gain results, when we are a collective voice championing freedom of speech, free economics, freedom of assembly, freedom of media and all the other freedoms that are the common goals and values of the European Union.

Secondly, I would be interested to know the Minister's view on how Russia can help with the situation in Belarus; is Russia part of the problem, or part of the solution? How can we in the EU, and how can the British Government, engage Russia in seeking that solution, or at least progress in Belarus? Thirdly, in what way can the United States play a part? The United States Administration has used particularly strong language in describing Belarus. If one reads background briefings about the country, the most strongly articulated case against the president and the conduct of the recent election is in the official briefing notes from the State Department in Washington. Is there an opportunity for the US to offer a more practical role, rather than simply articulating its concern in particularly strident terms?

Fourthly, what can the UK Government and the EU do to bring internal liberalisation to Belarus? Earlier, we touched on whether that could involve greater access to information. Broadcasting was the example given by previous speakers, but perhaps the internet would also be a suitable way of bringing more information about the outside world to the attention of people of Belarus. Also, contacts, exchange schemes with students, and greater opportunities for people to travel would allow the residents of a country that is, in a way, sealed off from outside opinion to gain greater access to how the rest of the world sees its own Government, regime and way of life.

Finally, what assessment have the Government made about the external security concerns that arise from the current Administration in Belarus, particularly in terms of nuclear material? Although our primary concern in this debate is the well-being of the 10 million or so Belarusians, having a rogue state within Europe is also a legitimate concern of ours. What implications would that have in terms of organised crime, nuclear material, or any other threats that may project themselves beyond that country's borders?

I conclude by once again welcoming this debate, which the hon. Member for South-West Devon secured. The subject is tremendously important for liberals across the parties, across the countries of the European Union and across the world. I hope that the very fact that we are holding this debate sends a powerful message about the attitude of the British Parliament. I hope also that the British Government, in their ongoing activities—both in the EU and on their own—will continue to send that strong message in the months and years ahead.

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): Thank you for that thought-provoking speech, Mr. Browne.

10.19 am

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) on securing this important debate. I remind the Chamber that the debate is about the progress of democracy in Belarus; we are not just discussing a sort of endgame in itself. My hon. Friend has a long track record of promoting democracy, not only for Belarus but for other countries. He is effectively the Conservative party's chairman for the Westminster Foundation for Democracy, which involves all the main political parties and does a tremendous amount of valuable work.

In one sense, my hon. Friend lost his political virginity by demonstrating outside the Belarusian embassy; no doubt he now has a police record. He may decide to ascertain its details under the Freedom of Information Act 2000. All who have spoken so far have warmly congratulated him on raising this subject.

I am tempted to take a historian's walk down memory lane, although I shall try to restrict myself. It strikes those of us of a certain age that 30 years ago, when I taught military history and defence studies to many generations of British officers, none of us envisaged that the cold war would end as it did. We used to game that out, and the gaming was always pretty bleak: either the cold war would end in Europe with a massive nuclear exchange after political instability and a clash between NATO and the Warsaw pact countries, or there would be a collapse in eastern Europe, but one that involved violence on a vast scale. That is a lesson for many pundits as they consider current crises.

We have discussed central and eastern Europe, and also the middle east, on other occasions. When doing so, we ought to bear in mind how difficult it is for countries in such regions to move from what they had to what we think they should have today—a pluralistic society, democracy and tolerance.

A number of hon. Members have touched on the history of Belarus; it is pretty awful by anybody's standards. People there have been trampled on by surrounding great powers, whether Austria-Hungary, Germany, the old imperial Russia or the Soviet Union. Belarusian relations with the Poles have been pretty insensitive at times, to say the least. Belarus lost one third of its population in the second world war, and before and after that war it suffered a series of massive purges.

If anything, I am struck not by the fact that the countries of central and eastern Europe have had major problems in adapting to the changes, but by the fact that they have adapted surprisingly well. Whatever the main problems still faced in Belarus, it is something to say that only 15 years after the end of the cold war, there is only one European country left in which there is a serious and major problem, although I do not say that there are no problems in other countries.

My final point about the history is that Chernobyl is very close to Belarus. We are commemorating the 20th anniversary of the Chernobyl disaster; on television this morning there were depictions of the problems still faced by families hundreds of square miles around the site and of what has been happening to a new generation of children. Belarus has been dumped on from a great height by history and natural events.

I agree with those who have said that the great irony is that President Lukashenko would probably have won the election if he had carried on, as far as he could, in a normal democratic way—perhaps with a bit of the arm twisting and ballot rigging that happens in many democracies, including ours and that of the United States. The supreme irony is that he probably would still have won the election.

As far as I can see, the problem for democracy in Belarus is the apathy and indifference of the majority of the population, who have been brought up among the horrors of their history and have an ability just to survive. As my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) pointed out, Lukashenko has delivered a degree of economic stability, even if that is propped up by Russia.

The purpose of this debate is to ask the Minister questions about how the British Government can further progress on democracy. In the immediate aftermath of the elections, the Minister said that the Foreign Office was actively discussing with partners specific measures to take in response. Will he elaborate on what further measures the Government might take to bring pressure to bear on the Belarus Government? I accept that that will not be easy.

[Mr. Keith Simpson]

My party welcomes the conclusions reached at the meeting of EU Foreign Ministers in Luxembourg on 11 April this year and the European Council's decision to take restrictive measures against President Lukashenko and the Belarusian leadership. However, although it is an important first step, what real impact does the Minister believe a travel ban will have on the Belarusian regime? There is no easy option, but we have seen the limited impact of the travel ban on the regime in Zimbabwe, which in many respects carries out even more horrendous acts against its own people.

I draw the Minister's attention to human rights. Have the Government made it clear to Minsk that it will receive international respect only when it ceases violating the human rights of its citizens and recognises that the detention of individuals for politically motivated reasons is utterly incompatible with democracy? Does the Minister have available, through our Government or EU Governments, a list of individuals arrested purely for exercising what we would understand to be their democratic rights? If he has, what are we doing actively to publicise the fact that such men and women are being held under what we would regard as illegal measures?

What progress, if any, have the Belarus Government made on their obligation to co-operate fully with the Commission on Human Rights and in particular with the special rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Belarus? As the special rapporteur's already extended mandate is due to expire, what are the prospects for an independent, credible and full investigation into the cases of forced disappearances and/or summary executions?

I turn to the issue of support for democracy, a strong element in the debate so far, and pushed by my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Devon. I agree that it is important to keep the issue on our parliamentary agenda; we should not just have a debate and then forget the issue until the next elections in however many years' time. Secondly, that should be done EU-wide. The Government's White Paper on UK priorities for their 2005 presidency of the EU did not mention Belarus; in retrospect, some of us might find that somewhat surprising. I am sure that the omission did not reflect any lack of interest in the issue on the part of the Government, but future major official Foreign Office publications, particularly those that deal with European matters, should highlight Belarus next time.

However, the UK presidency issued numerous statements on behalf of Belarus. What progress has been made since then to increase contact with the Belarusian people and strengthen our support for civil society? I link the question to what my hon. Friend said. What support can we give Belarusian groups that represent democratic parties—those that visit and those domiciled in the United Kingdom? What resources can we allocate to provide opportunities to inform the population of Belarus? As the hon. Member for Manchester, Central said, it is sometimes difficult to quantify what impact that might have. Even though a large majority of the people in Belarus do not have the opportunities that we have through the internet or even through television, the fact that things are being beamed to them will get the attention of quite a significant minority of the Belarusian electorate.

In the light of the deteriorating situation in Belarus, do the Government still consider that their decision to close the British Council in Minsk in November 2002 was appropriate? Following the elections, what concrete actions will now be taken to bolster the freedoms of assembly, association and expression in Belarus?

Finally, I shall discuss two of the neighbours of Belarus. Poland has a great interest in what goes on there because of the large ethnic Polish population that is involved. I recognise that persuading the Poles to intervene politically to influence events in Belarus could be regarded as counter-productive. Nevertheless, they have a direct interest. Poland is a fine example of a country that has moved from the horrors of occupation and totalitarian communism to an open democracy. We should use as much influence as we can to persuade the Poles to do what they can in a practical and constructive way to influence events in Belarus.

Russia is obviously the key to persuading the current president of Belarus at least to moderate his policies. We are in a quandary because we currently wish to persuade the Russians to moderate the policies of a large number of countries, not least those of Iran. However, I hope that we will continue, in a drip-drip manner, like water on a stone, to persuade them that, as the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne) said, the continuation of the current regime in Belarus is not in their long-term interests. It would not be to Russia's disadvantage if there were eventually free and open elections in Belarus.

As Churchill said, democracy is in many respects a bad form of government, but the alternatives are far worse. We sometimes have to live with the election—in pretty broad democratic terms—to office of parties that we do not like and that we regard, to a certain extent, as a threat to regional security at least. Such a situation has occurred in Palestine with the election of Hamas. We have not reached that stage in Belarus, where the progress of democracy will involve a long struggle over the next few years. The raising of this debate by my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Devon is a small way of publicising to the President of Belarus that the United Kingdom does not accept what he is doing. We hope that raising this debate gives comfort and aid to those brave men and women who wish for Belarus to have the open democracy that we are lucky enough to have in the United Kingdom.

10.34 am

The Minister for Europe (Mr. Douglas Alexander): I welcome the opportunity that the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter) has given the House to discuss Belarus. As other hon. Members have done, I acknowledge and welcome his personal commitment to democracy promotion generally, particularly his important work with the Westminster Foundation for Democracy. We are grateful for the important efforts of all parties in taking forward its work. I also thank him for his generous words about Britain's ambassador in Minsk. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office is also proud of his work, and I will ensure that a copy of the remarks made is relayed to him at the Minsk embassy.

Today's wide-ranging debate does great credit to the House. It is based on the experience of my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd), who spoke wisely about the need for consistent pressure on the Belarus regime, and on the insights and historical perspective given by the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Browne). He had my sympathy until he urged all parties to embrace the liberal cause. Knowing, as I do, the Foreign Secretary's clear views on liberal democracy, I do not relish return to King Charles street this morning and casually mentioning that in the course of an Adjournment debate I had embraced such a cause.

The hon. Member for Taunton asked a specific question about an interview that I undertook while, it appears, he was enjoying the sun during the recess last week. For clarification, I was asked to list five specific benefits for an individual British citizen. In the course of doing so, I mentioned that the operation of the single market had allowed for cheap flights, which the hon. Gentleman has perhaps enjoyed during the past few days.

I went on to say that those were individual benefits to individual citizens, but one must also recognise that the European Union has been hugely successful during the past 50 years in establishing peace, stability and democracy across the European continent. I hope that there would be agreement in all parts of the House that those are hugely important gains, which the EU has played a role in securing. I am thinking in particular about the transformation of central and eastern Europe to liberal democracies in recent years, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. By any measure, that is an historic achievement that will be judged hugely important and successful.

The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) gave us a lower-key historical tour d'horizon than he tempted us with at the outset of his remarks. The Army's loss has clearly been Parliament's gain in terms of the historical perspectives that he brought to bear. He made several important observations about the historical context in which we debate Belarus today. I will endeavour to answer the specific questions that he put to me.

The backdrop to this debate is that Belarus briefly hit the international headlines last month following presidential elections that yet again delivered a win for Lukashenko, with, as we have heard, an implausible 83 per cent. of the vote. The Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe election monitors declared the elections flawed and undemocratic. As a result, Belarus has been the subject of considerable debate within the EU, and sanctions are being imposed to apply pressure to Lukashenko's regime.

As hon. Members have said, it is all too easy to forget the daily struggle of the people of Belarus when the story slips from our headlines. It is critical that we maintain our support for the vast majority of the Belarusian people who will continue to fight for democracy, despite the risk involved, when the election monitors have gone. It is crucial that we maintain the pressure on Lukashenko to change his approach and recognise the democratic wishes of his people. I therefore greatly welcome the contribution that this debate has made to increasing the profile of the problems facing Belarus, and I sincerely hope that there will continue to be debates in this House on the subject.

I echo the sentiments of the hon. Member for South-West Devon. We do not support individual candidates or individual parties, because it is for the people of Belarus to choose their future and their future leadership. I, too, have had the opportunity to meet Mr. Milinkevich and to hear directly from him about his desire for a genuinely democratic state and about the struggles that opposition politicians have faced. Speaking, as we do, from the relative comfort and safety of Westminster, as democratic politicians in a longstanding, settled democracy, hearing of such struggles for democratic rights is humbling, as the hon. Gentleman suggested.

Belarus is an anachronism. It is a European country lying on the borders of the European Union. It claims to be at the heart of Europe politically and economically, but the policies of its leadership prevent its developing into that role. As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary said in a debate after the European Council,

"it is a disgrace that Belarus remains a dictatorship—the last in Europe—and it cannot continue in that way."—[Official Report, 27 March 2006; Vol. 444, c. 559.]

There is indeed no place for dictatorship in modern Europe.

Over recent years, the political and human rights situation in Belarus has worsened as Lukashenko has sought to isolate the regime and its people. In answer to the specific question put to me by the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk, we have no comprehensive list of the disappeared. The European heads of mission have been trying to ascertain how many people have been arrested over the past few weeks, but have been able to establish only that about 800 people have been arrested. Opposition figures have been arrested, beaten and imprisoned on trumped-up charges, and the European humanities university has been closed. It was the only independent university in Belarus before it was closed because of its promotion of diverse ideas and vigorous debate, and its refusal to promote state ideology. There has been harassment of political parties, a restrictive law on non-governmental organisations, the closure of independent newspapers, new limits on freedom of worship and a new anti-revolution law designed to muzzle any form of dissent.

United Kingdom and European Union policy towards Belarus has been and will continue to be a two-pronged approach. First, we are applying restrictive measures against those who are responsible for the serious deterioration in the human rights situation in Belarus to encourage them to change their ways. Secondly, we will reach out further to the Belarusian people through support for civil society, NGOs and independent media. We will not forget the Belarusian people and their attempt to make their voices heard in a flawed election and in the subsequent demonstrations against a result that they felt was rigged.

In a statement on 20 March, I expressed the Government's deep regret about the way in which the Belarusian authorities had held the elections. I commented again on 24 March in reaction to the violent breaking up of an opposition rally. EU declarations have also detailed our strong concern about the regime's actions in suppressing legitimate democratic expression.

Depressing as the events of last month were, there is some cause for hope. The election showed that there are people in Belarus who are ready to unite in the fight for democratic values. They showed extraordinary bravery in standing up for the right to vote freely, as we heard in the testimony read to us today, and a determination to change Belarus for the better.

[Mr. Douglas Alexander]

Lukashenko blames such activity on external interference, but, in doing so, he misreads and demeans his own people. The people of Belarus expect honesty and accountability from their Government, and they expect to choose who governs them. No Government who ignore that can be sustainable in the long term.

Before I discuss the EU's response to the elections, I shall briefly review the history of its approach to Belarus. EU relations with Belarus stalled in 1997 as a consequence of serious setbacks in the development of democracy and human rights in that country. A particular trigger was the replacement of the democratically elected Parliament with a National Assembly nominated by the President in clear violation of the constitution.

The EU immediately froze talks on concluding the partnership and co-operation agreement with Belarus, and restricted ministerial contacts. At the same time, the EU established clear political benchmarks on democracy and human rights which, if met, would lead to improved relations. However, Lukashenko has made no attempt to improve the situation.

Under the UK's presidency last year, the EU laid down a clear marker that it expected the forthcoming presidential elections to be free and fair, and that it was prepared to take further appropriate restrictive measures if they were not. The EU's concerns mounted throughout the election campaign. During the demonstrations that followed the 19 March election, approximately 800 political activists were detained, some without charge, for up to 15 days. One of the leaders of the Opposition and an ex-presidential candidate, Alexander Kozulin, remains in prison charged with organising group actions to disturb the public peace. He faces up to six years in prison.

As a result, at the 10 April EU General Affairs and External Relations Council, Ministers agreed to impose travel bans on 31 individuals deemed responsible for the fraudulent election, the violations of international human rights law, and the crackdown on civil society and democratic opposition. The travel ban includes Lukashenko. Ministers also stated their readiness to consider further restrictive measures. They condemned the treatment of political detainees, urged the regime to allow freedom of expression and assembly, and reiterated the EU's commitment to Belarusian civil society.

Members have asked about the BBC World Service and the action that is being taken by the EU to support free broadcasting in Belarus. Let me first set out the position on the World Service. It broadcasts in Belarus in the Russian, Ukrainian and English languages via its shortwave transmitters. A key issue facing the World Service in Belarus is the practicality of reaching its audience. Shortwave transmission is not as audible in some regions as FM transmissions, which are broadcast locally and produce a strong signal. Ideally, the World Service would like to work with FM partners to deliver its product in Belarus, but the media market is tightly controlled and regulated. Given the current political situation, there is no possibility of the World Service or any other western broadcaster getting air time on an existing FM frequency or hiring a new frequency within the country. Therefore, the World Service offering remains shortwave only in a market that is largely FM-dominated. We are aware of no jamming issues.

On several occasions in recent years, the World Service has examined the possibility of special programming for Belarus. The problem that I have just set out surrounding delivery of the product into the region remains the key stumbling block. The World Service product is available on-line, but, again, access in Belarus is difficult, as home internet usage is low. On-line facilities are mostly available in work places or in public internet cafes.

Following pressure from EU member states, not least the United Kingdom, the Commission launched a second media project at the start of this calendar year. The project is for two years and will cost approximately €2 million. It comprises TV and radio broadcasts from Poland, Lithuania and Germany into Belarus. It also provides funding for internet print media and training of journalists. The radio broadcasts started in February on various frequencies. However, as I said, the media market is tightly controlled, and the EU project faces challenges that are similar to those faced by the World Service because of the current political situation. I hope that the British Government's strong support of the Commission's efforts gives some comfort to the hon. Member for South-West Devon that we will continue to take an interest in the matter, notwithstanding the hurdles that we face in ensuring that the messages are heard by a wide section of the Belarusian population.

Support for the Belarusian population and for civil society is, of course, fundamental to our approach. While holding the regime to account, we must also reach out to the Belarusian people and help them in their struggle for democracy. The UK actively uses bilateral programme funds to support civil society, particularly in the areas of human rights, independent media, good governance, and youth participation in events that are designed to increase awareness of democratic principles.

We are working with EU partners to consider further steps to increase the EU's contact with the Belarusian people and to strengthen support for civil society, including technical assistance and the opening of an EU office in Minsk. To provide practical support, the EU has transferred €2 million from its TACIS programme to the European initiative for democracy and human rights and decentralised co-operation programmes.

However, we must make it easier to get assistance to NGOs and independent media that work on human rights, good governance, democracy and freedom of expression, and which face constant pressure from the Lukashenko regime. We are investigating with our partners the means of developing more flexible EU funding mechanisms to allow us to increase our direct engagement.

As the hon. Member for Taunton said, it is not only EU partners who remain focused on the current deplorable situation in Belarus. The United States also takes a close interest. President Bush has repeatedly indicated his personal concern for the people of Belarus and has pledged "to seek justice for the disappeared, as well as for all those who seek to return freedom to Belarus."

US policy closely follows that of the EU: the US demands the same improvements in Belarus before building closer relationships, and the US and the EU co-sponsored last year's UN Commission on Human Rights resolution on Belarus. I assure Members that the EU and the US closely co-ordinated their response to the 19 March presidential election.

The new Canadian Prime Minister, Stephen Harper, said in a statement immediately following the presidential elections that he was "shocked that a dictatorial and abusive regime, such as this one can continue to exist in today's Europe. We will work with other free and democratic societies in developing our response to this situation."

The UK and the EU will continue to work closely with the US, Canada and others to co-ordinate and unite our approach for future support of civil society and the people of Belarus.

I shall write separately to the hon. Member for Taunton on the nuclear issue that he raised, and ensure that a copy of my response is placed in the Library. Belarus has no nuclear power stations, and all nuclear weapons were withdrawn by Russia in the early to mid-1990s when Belarus joined the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Chernobyl is in Ukraine, but, as we heard earlier, Belarus got much of the fallout as a consequence of that terrible disaster.

In bringing my remarks to a conclusion, I shall focus on a couple of further points, in particular the issue of Russia, which was central to the comments of the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk.

I applaud the commitment of the hon. Member for South-West Devon, who continues to put Belarus on the public agenda. In turn, I assure him that the Government are committed to supporting the Belarusian people in their efforts to build a lasting democracy. We cannot and will not ignore those who seek to suppress their efforts.

As a number of colleagues have said during the debate, there is no magic wand, nor any easy and immediate solution. Therefore, I turn to the issue of engagement with Russia. When I visited Moscow at the beginning of March, I raised the issue of Belarus and, in particular, the issue of pricing parity and greater transparency in energy pricing. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary raised the issue of Belarus with its largest neighbour, Russia, following the elections that took place last month.

The United Kingdom and Europe uses every available opportunity to raise Belarus when appropriate with Russia. The European Union troika met Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Grigory Karasin on 12 April to set out the EU's concerns about the deteriorating human rights situation, and to explain the decisions taken by Ministers at the General Affairs and External Relations Council on 10 April. We continually stress to the Russians the shared objective that we have—including the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe—of encouraging Belarus to meet its international commitments to democracy and human rights. I can assure the House that we will continue to outline to our Russian counterparts our concerns about the deteriorating situation in Belarus.

Tony Lloyd: It is right and proper to urge Russia to share our view about the absence of acceptable legal norms and democratic standards. Although it is difficult for Russia to see this, is not the central point, however, that it is not in Russia's own interest to have a failing state on its own borders? A Belarus that lapses into criminality, corruption and gangsterism is not a healthy neighbour for Russia any more than it is for the European Union.

Mr. Alexander: I wholeheartedly agree with my hon. Friend's intervention. His sentiments are similar to the points that I communicated when in Moscow. All of us are concerned about one of the principal challenges that we face in the 21st century, which is failing states. If states fall into criminality and end up with the status of failed state, they create problems not only for their immediate neighbour, Russia in this case, but for the region generally. That is why today's debate is of such importance to us.

I also made the point when I was in Russia about the reputational damage that I believe was caused in the minds of many western Europeans by the reporting of the Russia-Ukraine gas dispute at the beginning of the year. If Russia were to make it clear that there is a level playing field and a commercial approach to gas supplies, it would contribute significantly to setting right some of the perceptions that took hold at the beginning of the year about the commercial treatment of Ukraine on the one hand and Belarus on the other.

I share with the hon. Member for South-West Devon no ill will whatever towards the people of Belarus. However, when the Russians tell the British Government that they wish to see a more commercial approach to the provision of gas supplies generally, it should necessarily and appropriately include Belarus in the same way in which it includes Ukraine and other countries. There will be a strong focus on those issues, not least with the spotlight falling on Russia ahead of the G8 summit taking place at St. Petersburg in July.

There is a real opportunity in the months between now and July to continue to impress on the Russian authorities not only the importance of their conduct in relation to democratic standards within their own borders but the importance of the messages that they send out through their comments about Belarus and other neighbours.

We shall continue to impress those points on the Russians. We shall try to persuade them that it is in all our interests to have a democratic, prosperous and stable Belarus. The future of democracy within Belarus rests on a credible political alternative to Lukashenko's dictatorship. We will continue to support that ambition.

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): I was hoping the Minister could have spun the debate for another couple of minutes, because we now have to suspend the sitting. I should like to thank all Members for their contributions. It has been a thoughtful and interesting debate. Congratulations to the hon. Gentleman who secured it, the hon. Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter), and to the Minister on the way in which he replied.

Northern Ireland (Fishing Industry)

11 am

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): I thank the Minister for the opportunity to raise matters of great urgency, upon which the future success of entire communities along Northern Ireland's eastern seaboard rests.

Six years on from the introduction of the cod recovery scheme and the closure of the Irish sea cod fishery, fisheries scientists are unable to tell us in Northern Ireland whether it has had any effect whatever on cod stocks in the Irish sea. Six years on, the Northern Ireland fishing fleet is a shadow of its former self and hundreds of jobs have been lost. Six years on, factories and businesses have disappeared and the industry is approaching a point of critical mass beyond which it might not recover. Six years on, the Government cannot indicate whether the measures that have contributed greatly to the demise of our fishing industry have had any impact. Those left in the industry are exasperated as the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development and its scientists continue to do little other than talk, while the industry crumbles outside.

In 1993 213 commercial fishing vessels were registered in the Northern Ireland fishing fleet, but by this year that figure had fallen to a staggering 130. Whereas there were 44 white fish boats in the Northern Ireland fleet five years ago, there are now only 12. In Portavogie, where there were once more than 100 boats in the fleet, there are now just 40. Between 1999 and 2003, the average profit before depreciation of a Northern Ireland-based white fish trawler fell by 76 per cent. to just £10,400. The average profit of a nephrop trawler fell by 48 per cent. to £15,600.

Since 2003, fishermen have had to deal with other factors, such as the huge rises in the cost of fuel oil and the cost of leasing quota, and income will have fallen further still. I spoke to one skipper during the week who told me that whereas fuel for his vessel had once cost 15p a litre it now costs 40p a litre, and that the fuel costs for operating his boat were now up to £1,914 a week.

Of course we must accept that to a certain extent the price of fuel is beyond the control of the Government. We do not ask for any preferential treatment. We merely ask that the issue is acknowledged and taken on board by the Government in order to understand the lengths to which the industry is being stretched. The cod recovery scheme was implemented six years ago on the basis that it would last for three years. The measures have been repeated each year since and were extended when the Scottish Executive imposed a closure in the north channel that was targeted at Northern Ireland trawlers.

The EU Commission has stated that additional recovery measures are needed only where there is a biological urgency, but where is the biological urgency in the Irish sea, where the science shows that stocks are nowhere near as bad as assumed? Without a grain of evidence to justify the closure of the cod fishery, DARD scientists now tell us that without any substantial evidence they hold out little hope of the scheme—itself based on erroneous evidence and interpretation—ever being lifted.

So what have DARD scientists been doing for the past six years, as countless skippers have been forced to decommission their boats, hundreds of fishermen have lost their jobs, factories have closed and countless jobs have been lost in the fish processing sector? Despite the enthusiasm of Northern Ireland Office Ministers, it has become increasingly clear during this period that the approach of fisheries scientists and the spin used in interpreting results has been a significant obstacle.

Progress has been made in improving relationships and attempting to work co-operatively to address the problems faced. Despite that, fisheries scientists have acted in a counterproductive manner. Fishermen are urged to work with DARD to provide the data required for officials to argue their case in Europe. However, whenever that information is collected, fisheries scientists always seem to identify something negative and run with it, at all times ignoring the positive aspects of the data.

Despite the poor reputation that DARD scientists have earned for themselves, local fishermen and producers' organisations remain committed to working with DARD. At a meeting with Lord Rooker last Tuesday, DARD scientist Peter Jan Schon came under enormous pressure from representatives of the catching, selling and processing sectors of Northern Ireland's fishing industry. He claimed that there was no co-operation from the fishing fleets in Kilkeel and Ardglass, except for Portavogie. That is absolute nonsense and was totally refuted by all present.

Mr. Jan Schon was unable to substantiate his claim. He said that there was no data on the cod stocks in the Irish sea because fishermen were not co-operating. However, thanks to his work, fishermen are barred from fishing the area as a result of the annual cod fishery closure. When asked what he had been doing for the past six years, Mr. Jan Schon had no response.

An associated issue is the barring of prawn boats from fishing in the area closed as part of the cod fishery closure. Mr. Jan Schon stated at the meeting, as DARD has before, that the prawn boats are barred because cod represents a substantial by-catch of prawns. Dick James of the Northern Ireland Fish Producers Organisation then presented the meeting with a copy of a multi-million euro report published in 2002 entitled "Monitoring of Discarding and Retention by Trawl Fisheries in Western Waters and the Irish Sea in Relation to the Stock Assessment and Technical Measures". The findings of that report included the fact that no cod was caught as by-catch of a conventional prawn trawl—and who should be named as a participant and contributor to that report, but Mr. Peter Jan Schon. No wonder he had so little to say for himself at the meeting.

It gets worse, however. At a meeting with DARD officials on Thursday last week, Dick James again raised the matter, this time directing it to Mr. Richard Briggs, the Department's senior scientist. Mr. Briggs stated that it was his opinion that the nephrops fishery in the Irish sea was completely sustainable. One scientist has held up progress on the basis that prawn fishing is not sustainable, while another says that the whole thing is news to him. The right hand does not seem to know what the left hand is doing. It is that fundamental level of inconsistency on the part of DARD scientists that has led to the strain in relationships between those who work in the industry and DARD.

Another associated issue is the shape and location of the box, which fishermen are adamant are incorrect. Currently there is derogation in the centre of the box, where prawn fishing is permitted. However, there is an important fishery to the north-east of the box where fishing is prohibited. When the box was created, the Department used a geological survey, but it quickly became clear that it was not accurate. As a result, one of the most important prawn fishing grounds was included in the closure. When the tides run high—specifically in the spring, during the period of the closure—the area supports a significant nephrops fishery. Boats need to be able to get into the area at least every other week to maximise their catch and ensure their continuing viability. The problem has been raised with DARD officials on more than 12 occasions, yet once again they have failed to act in any way to resolve the anomaly. It must now be addressed as a matter of urgency.

At the same time, however, it is clear that DARD as a whole has failed to represent the interests of the Northern Ireland fishing industry effectively. Last year the Food and Drink Federation announced that it was setting out to assess the amount of UK-sourced prawns consumed in the UK. Its findings indicated that the Irish sea could provide a sustainable fishery with a 30 per cent. increase in the nephrops total allowable catch. The Scottish and English Departments ran with those figures and used them to argue for increases in their nephrops quotas, obtaining increases of 31 and 39 per cent. for the west of Scotland and the North sea respectively.

DARD officials denied ever receiving the findings, which were forwarded to them by local fishing organisations. At the same time, they attempted to argue that because they are the poor relations within the UK, they do not stand a chance of getting a fair hearing. Those in the Northern Ireland fishing industry are sick, sore and tired of the Department's abdication of responsibility when representing their best interests in Europe.

There is serious concern about the lack of urgency shown by DARD scientists in completing those scientific studies that have been commenced. During August, September and October last year, five boats from Kilkeel kindly gave their permission to be used as part of a DARD study, but eight months later the Department still does not have a date for publishing the findings. Scientists complain about the lack of data, but their performance in turning around the data that they do have is abysmal. They claim that such data are like gold dust, so their performance hardly illustrates a real commitment to helping address the problems experienced by our fishermen.

As for the tie-up scheme, suffice it to say that DARD owes the industry an apology for being so wide of the mark in its interpretation of the legislation, after having been embarrassed in Europe by Jim Allister MEP. Despite that embarrassment, Lord Rooker has this year refused to grant that lifeline to many of Northern Ireland's fishermen.

We are informed that the decision to refuse aid was based on the fact that the scheme does not provide value for money. If that was the case, why was the scheme operated during 2004 and 2005? If it was value for money in those two years, what has changed in 2006? What has changed is that the cod quota has been decreased by 15 per cent., the haddock and whiting quotas have been slashed, and days at sea have decreased. In fact, given the new and increasing pressures placed on the industry since 2004, it could be argued that it would be better value this year than it was in the previous two years.

Lord Rooker also states that there is insufficient funding to support a tie-up scheme and that money is already committed to projects in and around our harbours. That is well and good, and I commend the work of the fishing villages initiative in its work to attract millions of pounds of investment into fishing communities, but we must face the facts. What is the point in supporting fishing communities and investing in harbours when the time will soon come when there will cease to be a fleet to support?

We must now look to the future and to a plan submitted to DEFRA that has the Department's support. With the assistance of the Irish Sea regional advisory council, it is proposed that from January 2007 the fleet should start with a clean sheet, subject to certain criteria. The fleet would be allowed to catch what it wanted, but it would have to report exactly what was landed. Scientists would then assess that data and apply models to get an accurate picture of the health of Irish Sea fish stocks. From those results, they would be able to establish whether quotas were lower than the fishery could sustain, in which case they could be increased, or whether quotas were too high, in which case they could be reduced. Ultimately, we would arrive at the best possible package for both the industry and the conservation of the fish stocks in the Irish sea. The plan has the support of DEFRA and the EU Commissioner, and it has the potential to allow positive progress for the local fishing industry.

One problem remains, however. It will have taken DARD scientists eight months to report back on five boats being studied over a three-month period. How will the Department fare if it is studying more than 100 boats, 365 days a year? The danger is that DARD will apply the same tired old science to the new data, and the fleet might once again have to pay for the scientists' desire to highlight and emphasise the negative and ignore the positive. There is potential for recovery, but we have a mountain to climb before we can claim it.

In summary, this is the seventh year of the closure of the cod fishery in the Irish sea, but scientists still cannot tell us what effect, if any, it is having on the cod stocks. We were told that the closure would be for three years, yet seven years on we are still being told that DARD cannot go to the EU and argue for its removal, as it has no science to back it up.

The fishing industry in Northern Ireland should always have been a team effort between DARD and those in the industry. Given the precarious state of the industry, I cannot emphasise sufficiently how crucial it is that fishermen, sellers, processors and the fisheries division of DARD work hand in hand, striving to create a sustainable and viable fishing industry.

We need more effective science, more effective processing of information and more effective interpretation of results. To continue on the current course will lead only to the destruction of the local fishing fleet, which will have a colossal impact on the lives of those villages and communities that have for so long been bound together by the industry.

[Mrs. Iris Robinson]

The bottom line is that we should not be arguing about the creation of a tie-up scheme, which is open only to a fraction of vessels, and we should not be scrambling around attempting to secure transitional aid. Instead we should have a Minister for fisheries, committed to fighting the corner for the local industry, changing EU "wisdom" and striving to create a strategy that would facilitate the recovery of the local industry, not its destruction.

11.15 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Angela E. Smith): I congratulate the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) on securing this debate. I know that she is passionate about the fishing industry, and about the problems of her constituents. She is always well informed, and is forthright in putting across her views. It is clear that she cares deeply about the future of the fishing industry in Northern Ireland.

I assure the hon. Lady that my ministerial colleagues and I share her concerns. We may not always have total agreement, but we all want to see a long-term sustainable future for the fishing industry, which means restructuring and changing it. No one wants to see short-term measures taken that do not deal with the underlying and ongoing problems.

The hon. Lady highlighted a range of complex issues and the need for change. She spoke about restricted fishing opportunities and increased operating costs, particularly for fuel—an increase that we are seeing across manufacturing industry as well. The fishing industry needs to face up to and meet changing attitudes to the marine environment. That is a significant challenge, but the Government want to help, because we want to see a long-term sustainable future for the fishing industry in Northern Ireland.

I shall do my best to address the various points raised by the hon. Lady. She spoke about the tie-up scheme of financial aid for the fishing industry, and claimed that the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development owes fishermen an apology. That claim is not justified. As she said, the industry has faced grave economic difficulties. She said that financial support was the way forward. However, that would address the short-term problems, not the longer-term underlying factors.

I appreciate the disappointment of the industry that the tie-up scheme was not run for another year. It was not an easy decision, although full account was taken of all the issues involved, including affordability—the hon. Lady mentioned value for money—sustainability and priorities within the fishing industry. Lord Rooker, who is listening to the debate, was very mindful of all those issues. He said that it was not an easy decision, but that it was taken in the best interests of the fishing industry.

The hon. Lady also made a point about having a Minister who fully represents the Northern Ireland fishing industry. I place on record the strong commitment of the Government and the ministerial team, including my noble Friend Lord Rooker, to doing their best to ensure support and sustainability for the fishing industry. We would all have preferred to have a single Minister dealing with the issue. Once the Assembly is up and running and a devolved Minister is in place, we will not have Ministers trying to run several Departments, although we do the best that we can under the additional time pressures that it creates.

It is worth noting that, for the second successive year, the Irish sea prawn total allowable catches were increased. In addition, the Northern Ireland industry was able to avail itself of the significant additional prawn quotas secured for the North sea and the west of Scotland. It is also worth remembering that the Irish sea still has a more generous allocation of days at sea than other areas of the cod recovery zone. Those achievements are worth placing on the record.

The hon. Lady also raised concerns about scientific information. Scientists need to obtain as much information as possible from various sources, for which they need the co-operation of fishermen. I challenge what the hon. Lady said about scientists concentrating on the negative. Scientists give a view of the scientific facts of the case. There is no interest for anyone involved in not presenting the facts as they stand. It is vital, when considering the long-term future of the industry, that we have accurate and precise information, for which we need scientists and the industry to work together. The fear is that if we fail to achieve that, the Commission is likely to adopt a harsher view and take a highly precautionary approach to its decisions, which would give us all cause for concern.

The only way for the industry to have a sustainable, long-term future—I am sure that the hon. Lady and her constituents seek that, just as we in Government do—is with accurate, reliable information so that appropriate action can be taken. There is no interest in anyone having anything other than that. Scientists and fishermen should recognise that they have the same objectives. They will not always have the same views or make the same assessments, but if they do not work together to get a true picture and understand the priorities, we will not be able to take the right approaches or make the case that we want to make.

The hon. Lady made her case about the cod recovery scheme. A considerable amount of work has been undertaken on that, and much more will be undertaken in the next 18 months, but marine science depends on data collected over a long period. It is not possible to take a snapshot of information that will be meaningful to the Commission or anyone else. We are optimistic that next year's exercise will be a significant step forward, but I cannot promise the hon. Lady any quick fixes. However, she must not think that a considerable amount of work has not been undertaken by scientists and the Department. That work is ongoing, because we need reliable, long-term data to make the case adequately.

The hon. Lady also raised the issue of the purchasing quota. I understand her concerns about the price of the quota increasing, but that is its market value. This is another reason why we need important, accurate information, because if we do not have that, we might not do quite so well with the quota. We have done particularly well with the European Commission to be able to get that information. Unless we continue with that, we cannot give any guarantees for the future.

The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and DARD are jointly funding a programme with the Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science for fishery independent monitoring of cod recovery by means of egg production surveys. The hon. Lady nods; she must be aware of that. She made proposals in that regard, which we will certainly give full consideration. I welcome her positive steps forward on this issue, which we are keen to pursue. DEFRA and the European Commission are already holding meetings to discuss that, and we want to pursue it urgently. Scientific analysis will not handicap the effectiveness of the exercise in the years ahead.

I was a little disappointed by the hon. Lady's comments about an individual scientist. It is important to recognise the professionalism of the staff who deal with these issues. I hope that she will accept that nobody has any interest in not getting accurate information with which to do their best for the fishing industry. The scientists employed by the Department are working on this issue because they want to ensure that we get the best deal for Northern Ireland fishermen. I hope that she will understand that point.

I hope that I have addressed all the hon. Lady's points. I have already stated that the prawn total allowable catch for 2007 is a top priority for Northern Ireland. Enthusiastic work is being done to ensure that the TAC is increased in the following year. There is a deep commitment in the Department to ensure a long-term, sustainable future for the industry, but there is no quick-fix solution. The industry is under enormous pressure, and the Government would do it a disservice if we failed to establish what the long-term issues are and how they can best be addressed. We should not simply offer quick fixes that would undermine the industry in the long term.

Democratic Republic of Congo

2.30 pm

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk) (Lab): My aim today is to introduce a debate arising from a visit by the all-party group on the great lakes region and genocide prevention to the Democratic Republic of Congo. Other hon. Members will want to catch your eye, Mr. Hancock, and develop their own themes, so I shall explain the general context of the visit and mention a couple of points that particularly struck me. I hope that the Minister will reply to those points.

I shall start with a specific matter that struck everyone on the visit. Panzi hospital, at Bukavu on the shores of Lake Kivu where eastern DRC meets Rwanda, is a remarkable place. A small number of doctors and nurses provide health care for women who have been victims of sexual violence and injured, often gravely, at the hands of the illegal militias that roam the forests of eastern DRC. To walk around Panzi hospital and talk to the patients, their carers and sometimes their children is a sobering and serious experience, but it was essential that those of us on the visit did so to set our perspectives clearly.

The group travelled across the DRC, which is a vast country, and met politicians such as Dr. Bahamba Hamba, the governor of South Kivu, which includes Bukavu. We also met a chief of the Batwa pygmies and, at the other end of the visit, we met Vice-President Ruberwa and President Kabila, who were extremely generous with their time. We also met representatives of civil society and international figures such as Bill Swing and Ross Mountain who run MONUC—the United Nations organisation mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which is the world's largest such mission—as well as met former child soldiers, international non-governmental organisations and local NGOs that are supported by international NGOs.

The hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) and my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) will present their own views, but I think that the group collectively formed the view that Panzi hospital represents a good prism through which to see many of the problems that beset the DRC. The United Kingdom Government could help to tackle those problems both bilaterally and internationally in conjunction with allies in other countries.

In 1994, the civil war in Rwanda, accompanied by the genocide perpetrated on the Tutsi minority, led to bandits and killers—they were given a number of names, including exFAR and Interahamwe—being displaced into eastern DRC. Initially they were assisted by the UN and semi-settled on the border. Hindsight shows that to have been a mistake, because it led to them running riot in the camps that were set up by the UN. In time, as the UN realised its error and as Rwanda began what has become a remarkable recovery, those bandits and semi-organised militias were displaced into the forests. There, in large part, they remain, augmented occasionally by new recruits, often children and teenagers who are taken forcibly from local communities to provide slave labour and fighters. During the Rwandan genocide, women and children were targeted to remove the next generation of Tutsis; that ruthlessness is now deployed to terrorise communities and enable the militias to subsist in the forest in preference to ending armed struggle and returning either to Rwandan justice or to an attempt to live decent and productive lives in Rwanda or the DRC.

Sexual violence is not confined to eastern DRC, but there it remains a potent tool of subjugation. Women are routinely raped, tortured and murdered as a crude means of dominating communities and eking out a feral existence in the forest. The fear inspired by the militias frequently leads to families to reject abused women. Such women can be seen as a burden due to their injuries, which are often extreme, and sometimes they are a source of shame for their partners, who often rapidly become former partners.

Most of those women have no access to health care and live painful lives, with many dying a painful death. A small minority make the long and hazardous journey to Panzi hospital where they are welcomed and provided with the best health care—modest, but the best—that the region can muster. Some of those women were deliberately injured during and after rape to make childbirth impossible, which leads to a massive requirement for gynaecological assistance and health care. Others have been subjected to such inhuman violence that it is breathtaking that they are still alive and receiving treatment in a place such as Panzi hospital. Dr. Mukaweye, the head of the hospital, told the group about the practice of most militias of following a rape by discharging a round of ammunition into the victim by the same entry point: those who do not die instantly suffer massive internal injuries. Unbelievably, some of the victims have been saved and have, after many months and sometimes years, been rehabilitated back into their home communities. I had never met anyone like Dr. Mukaweye but I know that there are others in the DRC and all over Africa doing similar work. His and his colleagues' work is inspiring, but the need is so great in eastern DRC that they must constantly fight for funding.

A recent EU initiative funded by emergency provisions to provide financial assistance to Panzi hospital is soon to end. I am happy that the Department for International Development is stepping in to help the hospital to extend its capacity by constructing a new surgical wing. However, I wonder whether it is entirely appropriate for the emergency to be interpreted in that way by the EU, given the post-war environment in the DRC and the emergence of a large number of women now reporting with injuries following sexual violence, which, ironically, is consequent on the post-war context rather than on the civil war, which has now ended.

Sexual violence is the sharp end of a series of challenges relating both to security and to wider political development. The hon. Member for South-West Surrey will speak about the security question and what the UK can do to help to expand the capacity of DRC forces in the post-election context. Clearly, it is difficult for the international community judge whether to help to expand the capacity of the armed forces of an unstable state that is not democratic or properly organised and whose Government's remit does not extend across the whole country, perhaps not even outside the most heavily populated places. It is a difficult judgment to make to assist such a country to build up its armed forces when they might be used for the wrong purpose.

The coming election may provide an opportunity and a cause for optimism. If everything goes well it may become appropriate for the international community—perhaps the British Government in conjunction with our allies—to consider ways in which security forces in the DRC be helped to develop their capacity. Without that capacity, there can be no proper infrastructure development: hospitals and schools cannot operate properly unless people can live safely and use them safely. During our visit, all members of the group were struck by the way in which all the local and international NGOs focused on security, which is not what one would normally expect. One would expect them to focus on services and issues such as justice, human rights and so on, but everyone we spoke to emphasised the importance of security and of building up the capacity of the FARDC—the DRC's own armed forces—after the election.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I apologise for missing the first couple of minutes of my hon. Friend's speech. I know that he is talking about the east of the country, and he may have been about to make the point that I wish to raise. When talking about security issues, will he also discuss the Lord's Resistance Army and the fact that Otti is still in the DRC? I was in northern Uganda with other Members at the time that the International Criminal Court served its warrant for the arrest of Kony, Otti and three others, but MONUC chose—there was some confusion—to give Otti a wide berth. If the UN sanctions mean anything, we have to deal with the LRA. Will my hon. Friend deal with the fact that the DRC is in the midst of all those problems and has to be helped?

Mr. Joyce: I thank my hon. Friend for that very valuable contribution. I was not going to mention the LRA, but I shall now that he has mentioned it. It is crucial to recognise that some of these groups are still operating. There has been some progress in that bordering countries have, officially at least, withdrawn their military forces from the DRC. Rwanda has certainly done so. President Museveni, who has recently been recently elected in Uganda—one can say good things about his time in government, but it is harder to find good things to say about his more recent comments—spoke of the possibility of making an incursion into the DRC to deal with the problem of the Lord's Resistance Army. It would clearly be far better for the international community to deal with that problem than for Uganda or any other country to make incursions.

MONUC is the UN body in the DRC and to give it some credit, it is doing very good work. Although it is a very large force, comprising between 16,500 and 17,000 personnel, that is a limited number when dealing with 10,000 or so members of the Interahamwe and various other militias, which are only semi-organised in any case. In time, the problem will be a matter for the international community, and the DRC forces, when they have the capacity to deal with it themselves. In the meantime, there is very much a patching-up mentality. MONUC does its best to keep areas safe—it is deployed, it moves those people around and it catches and kills the odd one—but until we have a proper democracy in a post-election context and a big effort is made by the international community after that election, the LRA will remain a problem. The LRA is a major problem for the whole region and it is time that the international community focused on it more. I am sometimes concerned, however, that President Museveni uses the LRA as a way of pursuing other political objectives.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree, further to the intervention of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), that establishing domestic security, including the build-up of stable armed forces committed to providing it, demands robust international action to end the illicit sale of small arms and light weapons? Given that each year in developing countries in Africa, Asia, the middle east and Latin America about $22 billion is spent on the sale and illicit transfer of such weapons, which kill 400,000 people, is it not vital that we secure the passage of the international arms trade treaty as quickly as possible, then ensure its rigorous implementation?

Mr. Joyce: I wholeheartedly agree with the hon. Gentleman. All over Africa, and particularly in the DRC, there are millions of small arms, and that situation requires robust action by the international community. There are a number of things we can do. As well as the treaty, one of the ideas raised while we were there was the possibility of instituting air traffic control, which I know has been raised in the past. In Africa, there is very little air traffic control, which explains how arms get moved around. A fairly modest-sized project was proposed a few years ago by the UK Government, but it did not go ahead—it was quite a contentious issue at the time. I am not sure whether the Minister is in a position to comment on that, but one of the things we could do, besides the international treaty that the hon. Gentleman suggests, is look again at the possibility of establishing some means of air traffic control to monitor who is moving what around. At the moment, people can move weapons around pretty much with impunity.

As well as physical solutions to the security problems in the DRC, we need political solutions. At the beginning of our visit, we were fortunate enough to meet Dr. Murigande, the Rwandan Foreign Minister, together with the Rwandan ambassador to the great lakes region. It is clear that Rwanda has had some success in encouraging some of the Interahamwe back to Rwanda. There is a package and some have semi-settled back in Rwanda peaceably, but that process has had limited success so far. Some people will not return to Rwanda because they will be brought to justice, and not necessarily through the Gachacha system. They may well be put in prison, so they are reluctant to go back, and often they are the most powerful people in those communities. Clearly, the UK Government, who are listened to very intently by all the Governments of the great lakes region, could have some influence in encouraging more diplomatic efforts to get all the people we can back to Rwanda. Not all of these people are Rwandans, of course—many may be recruited Congolese—so the problem is fairly opaque. Rwanda has been doing a great deal, it deserves to be commended, but there is a great deal more that we can all do.

On a more specific level, I would like to mention briefly an ongoing problem with marginalised and abused children. My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield will speak a bit more about this. In an impoverished society, it is difficult, and sometimes impossible, to look after children. There is a series of mechanisms by which people in the DRC simply reject their children, who are left to live in the street or in the forest, if they survive at all. There is a phenomenon that has received quite a lot of publicity in the UK press recently. In essence, where the unreconstructed aspects—if I can put it that way without being too pejorative—of the theology of some of the more evangelistic Churches comes into contact with people who are not able to afford their children, the children are accused of witchcraft or some such superstitious nonsense as a mechanism to explain problems in the family and the difficulties that beset extremely impoverished people—and as a means for people to divest themselves of a troublesome child.

We met quite a large number of churchmen—they were all men, I think—and a fair number of them were using a rather odd qualifying argument. Not all of them made the argument, but enough did to make it quite worrying. They argued that the problem was not that there was witchcraft among children, but that sometimes the wrong children were accused of witchcraft. In other words, some of the churchmen were saying, "We think that witchcraft exists among children but the problem is that far too many kids get accused of it when they just have psychological problems". That exacerbates the whole problem by bedding in and giving validity to the idea that such a phenomenon exists. There may be ways in which the Government and other agencies can encourage Churches, which in other modest but important ways operate extremely well—they provide social services and churches, schools and so forth—to look again at those practices.

Those practices do exist, that argument is deployed and we came across it. The phenomenon is seen in the UK because some children from London have been sent back to the DRC and remain there. The UK embassy and the ambassador in the DRC have their eye on the problem, but there is little they can do except monitor it. However, it is important to raise it here and perhaps other agencies, including some of the Churches, will look again at the problem.

The UK Government, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretary of State for International Development, the Foreign Secretary and Members of all parties in this House, take a great interest in the role of education in the developing world. We had the opportunity to chat to President Kabila about the possibility of some kind of modest link between some schools in the DRC, probably in Kinshasa, and some in the UK. I think that it will be possible to facilitate that in one way or another. Mr. Andy Sparkes, the UK ambassador in Kinshasa, was very encouraging. I wonder whether it might be possible for the Minister to commend the idea of having a link-up because it would benefit kids in the UK as well as kids in the DRC, although it would be fairly modest and, of course, Francophone.

The DRC is led by President Kabila at the head of an interim Government. Elections will take place soon. The UK Government, particularly through our ambassador to the country, Andy Sparkes, and through the Minister and others, have played an invaluable role in facilitating those elections. Not every party is taking part, although I think that most people will vote. It is a pity that it looks as though the Union for Democracy and Social Progress—a major opposition party with a good record in opposition under Mobutu—will not take part, but I think that many of the DRC's voters will take part in the elections.

At one level, it is a little odd that Britain will soon be the largest donor to the DRC. We have no great history there—it is a Francophone country—but that is the way things are currently. Belgium and France could perhaps take more of a leading role. Who knows who will win the election? There must be a modest chance that President Kabila will win it. We got the impression on the trip that if he does, he will take an inclusive approach to choosing his Government and to governing, as opposed to a winner-takes-all mentality, which would send people straight back to the bush and alienate very talented people such as Vice-President Ruberwa and others whom he needs on board.

Let me mention the groups that made the trip, which we found to be invaluable, possible. They include Oxfam, Christian Aid, Tearfund, the Rainforest Foundation, War Child, Save the Children and Amnesty International. All those organisations have hugely valuable programmes in the DRC. They help to support local non-governmental organisations and to build capacity among those NGOs, which will perhaps be their most important role in the longer term. In addition, our embassy in Kinshasa is doing a sterling job—a magnificent job. Andy Sparkes, Jo Gauld and their colleagues deserve recognition for that.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give us the benefit of his experience of a recent visit to the DRC and tell us what he learned about the preparations for the June elections? Those elections are a vital precursor to further stability in the DRC. Did he learn how the European troops were to operate with the UN troops already in the country to ensure that there is at least a semblance of free and fair elections?

Mr. Joyce: That is a good point and that matter formed one of the main focuses of our visit. There is room for some optimism that there will be more or less effective elections across the DRC, although perhaps not to the standards of the UK. The position will be more difficult in rural areas. We were struck by how many people had their IDs to vote and by the apparent effectiveness with which MONUC is preparing. We had a lot of time with Bill Swing, Ross Mountain and a commander of a Pakistani battalion—one of the generals on the ground in the Bukavu area. They will give a lot of confidence to people, especially in more populated areas, that it will be safe to vote. No one is suggesting that there will be violence against those who vote. The militias are largely staying out of the process, so I think that there will be a pretty good turnout. Clearly, one has to put that in context. One can look at what happened in the early 1960s, but the forthcoming election will probably be the first real election in Congo at which there is pretty much universal suffrage.

Let me mention Oona King, who founded the all-party group during her period in the House. It is largely because of her efforts that we are having this debate and the issue is being raised today on Sky television and "Channel 4 News" by the team that we took with us. Today's edition of The Guardian carries a good article on the issue. We also took Johann Hari of The Independent with us and that newspaper, too, is providing coverage.

I believe that the interest in the DRC in Parliament—at this debate there has been a good turnout of hon. Members from both sides of the House—and the interest in the media presage a period when the country will step out of the shadows. Four million people have died there, but that figure comes from epidemiological surveys, not daily bombs, so the issue is less media-friendly. I cannot blame the media for that, but now, in the pre-election period, we have a chance to raise the profile of the Democratic Republic of Congo. We hope that the election will be successful, I look forward to hearing what the Minister and other hon. Members have to say.

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): Thank you very much for that thoughtful presentation, Mr. Joyce. I shall start the winding-up speeches at 3.30 pm, and four hon. Members want to speak. If hon. Members are generous to one another and we co-operate, everyone who wants to should be able to speak. I ask hon. Members to bear that in mind.

2.55 pm

Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Falkirk (Mr. Joyce) both on his excellent speech, which I wholeheartedly endorse, and on the excellent way in which he chairs the all-party group. I, too, was a member of the group that went to the DRC. I should also like to add to his praise for the work done by Oona King, the former hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Bow. The fact that in 2003 the DRC did not feature at all in the top 10 recipients of UK aid but by 2004 was the second biggest recipient after India shows the success of Oona King's work in setting up the group and raising the profile of a part of the world whose profile certainly needs to be raised.

Africa, for all its vibrancy, sometimes seems to prove the inverse of the saying, "The grass is always greener on the other side of the fence." One could say that in Africa the grass is always browner on the other side of the fence, because wherever one goes and whatever appalling poverty one finds, there always seems to be somewhere even worse off. One goes to a Nairobi slum, where children with HIV eat charcoal because they are so hungry, and one wonders what could be worse. Then one goes to the DRC. There, despite the street children, the begging and the hunger, security is so bad that poverty alleviation is barely on the agenda. People simply do not have the luxury of worrying about starving: they face the even more immediate danger of being raped or murdered as they sleep in their beds at night.

On the all-party parliamentary group trip, we met villagers who slept in the tea plantations at night, terrified that if they slept under their own roof they would be attacked as they slept. In visiting Panzi hospital, to which the hon. Member for Falkirk referred, we visited what is perhaps the world's only specialist rape hospital, where hundreds of women wait for operations because of rapes that are often so bad that multiple operations are needed. I met a woman who witnessed militia kill her five children and husband and put their bodies into sacks. She was then raped by three men. I heard of a 22-year-old woman who was raped by seven soldiers, after which a gun was fired into her genitals. Remarkably she survived, although she needed six operations. Now, amazingly, she wants to become a nurse.

With no justice system to speak of, rape in the DRC can barely be called a crime. It is more a weapon of mass destruction. It is the means by which militia know that they can destroy a village: if they rape the women, they destroy the slender fabric on which some of the poorest and most fragile communities in the world depend. The lesson of this terrible madness is simple. There can be no poverty alleviation without security, no AIDS drugs without security, no agricultural development without security and no democracy without security. But there is no security.

The army, whose soldiers are supposed to be paid a meagre $10 a month, remains unpaid. The salaries are issued by the central bank and then lost in a giant river of corruption that has as many tributaries as the River Congo. Government soldiers therefore end up practising the rape and extortion that they are supposed to be stamping out. For example, four senior officers are currently being sought for various offences, including a lieutenant colonel who is being sought for the rape of a 14-year-old girl. The army is refusing to hand the officers over—[Interruption.]

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): Order. We shall adjourn for 15 minutes for the Division in the House. I am sorry about that, Mr. Hunt.

2.59 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3.15 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Hunt: The point about these terrible stories of rape and the atrocities that one encounters somewhere like the DRC is that, time after time, when one asks local people what they really want, the answer is very simple: they want to end the culture of impunity. That culture of impunity in the DRC started with the infamous article 15 of an earlier Kasai constitution, which encouraged people to débrouiller, or manage for themselves. That was a kind of licence for people to look after themselves, whatever it involved. It continued through the Mobutu kleptocracy and has now spread like a cancer beyond looting and extortion to rape and murder.
